

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

Scotch ^{re-opening}
Cases

Scotch reports Cases

CASES

DECIDED IN

Best and.
THE COURT OF SESSION, COURT OF JUSTICIARY,

AND

HOUSE OF LORDS, 723

FROM AUGUST 1, 1886, TO AUGUST 1, 1887.

REPORTED BY

MIDDLETON RETTIE, JAMES PATTEN, C. C. MACONOCHIE, H. J. E. FRASER, AND G. R. GILLESPIE, ESQUIRES, ADVOCATES.

FOURTH SERIES.—VOL. XIV.

EDINBURGH:

T. & T. CLARK, LAW BOOKSELLERS.

LONDON: STEVENS & SONS.

M.DCCC.LXXXVII.

PRINTED BY GEORGE ROBB & CO., THISTLE STREET, EDINBURGH.

279723

Y8A9811 0807MAY8

J U D G E S
OF THE
COURT OF SESSION
DURING THE PERIOD OF THESE REPORTS.

FIRST DIVISION.

Lord President, The Right Hon. JOHN INGLIS.
Lord MURE.
Lord SHAND.
Lord ADAM.

SECOND DIVISION.

Lord Justice-Clerk, The Right Hon. Lord MONCREIFF.
Lord YOUNG.
Lord CRAIGHILL.
Lord RUTHERFURD CLARK.

PERMANENT LORDS ORDINARY.

Lord LEE.
Lord FRASER.
Lord M'LAREN.
Lord KINNEAR.
Lord TRAYNER.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICIARY.

Lord Justice-General, Right Hon. JOHN INGLIS.

Lord Justice-Clerk, Right Hon. Lord MONCREIFF.

LORDS COMMISSIONERS OF JUSTICIARY.

Lord YOUNG.

Lord MURE.

Lord CRAIGHILL.

Lord ADAM.

Lord M'LAREN.

Lord Advocate, The Right Hon. J. H. A. MACDONALD.

Dean of Faculty, WILLIAM MACKINTOSH, Esquire.

Solicitor-General, J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Esquire.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

P E E R S

WHO DELIVERED JUDGMENTS IN SCOTCH APPEALS DURING THE PERIOD OF THESE REPORTS.

Lord Chancellor, LORD HALSBURY.

Lords BLACKBURN, WATSON, BRAMWELL, FITZGERALD, HERSCHELL, and MACNAGHTEN.

INDEX OF NAMES

IN

VOLUME XIV.

For Index of Names in Registration Appeal Cases, see p. xii.,— Lands Valuation Appeal Cases, see p. xii.,— Court of Justiciary, see p. xii.,—House of Lords, see p. xiii.

I.—COURT OF SESSION.

	Page
Aberdeen Harbour Commissioners, Wisely v. - - -	445
Accountant of Court v. Clark (Crumpton's Curator Bonis), - - -	55
Accountant of Court, Tweedie v. - - -	212
Adam v. Crowe, - - -	800
Adamson, Brough v. - - -	858
"Afton," Owners of s., v. Northern Marine Insurance Co., Limited, - -	544
Ailsa, Marquis of, Bowie v. - - -	649
Ainslie v. Ainslie, - - -	209
Alexander, &c. (Byars' Trustees) v. Hay, - - -	1034
Allan v. Hamilton Water-Works Commissioners, - - -	485
Alley & M'Lellan, M'Gregor v. - - -	535
Alliance Heritable Security Co., Limited, v. Heritable Property Trust, Limited, - - -	34
Anderson, &c. (Buchanan's Trustees) v. Kilmarnock Magistrates (Buchanan Bequest Trustees), - - -	284
Anderson, Thomson v. - - -	1026
Andrews v. Drummond & Graham, - - -	568
Angus, Congleton v. - - -	309
Angus, Findlay v. - - -	312
Angus Brothers, M'Lean v. - - -	448
Archattan and Muckairn, Inspector of, Inspector of Kilmore and Kilbride v. - - -	539
Armour, Govan Police Commissioners v. - - -	461
Arrol Brothers, Daly v. - - -	154
Arrol v. Inches, - - -	394
Bain v. Lady Seafield, - - -	939
Bank of Scotland v. Gudin, - - -	213
Barr (Fraser's Trustee), Stronach (Wilson's Trustee) v. - - -	504
Beaton v. Ivory, - - -	1057
Begg v. Begg, - - -	497
Begg, Williamson v. - - -	720
Bell, Fraser v. - - -	811
Bell's Trustee v. Coatbridge Tinsplate Co., Limited, - - -	246
Benhar Coal Co., North British Railway Co. v. - - -	141
Bethune, &c. (St Andrews Ladies' Golf Club) v. Denham, - - -	686
Black v. Jehangeer Framjee & Co., - - -	678
Black & Co., Macfarlane v. - - -	870
Blair (Farquharson's Curator ad litem), Farquharson v. - - -	231
Bonnar v. Roden, - - -	761
Bowie v. Marquis of Ailsa, - - -	649
Boyd, Smillies v. - - -	150
Boyle, Earl of Glasgow v. - - -	419
Brady v. Parker, - - -	783
Bransby's Trustees, Breatcliff v. - - -	307
Breatcliff v. Smith and Another (Bransby's Trustees), - - -	307
British Canadian Lumbering and Timber Co., Liquidator of - - -	160

	Page
British Finance Co., Limited, English's Coasting and Shipping Co., Limited, v. -	220
British and Foreign Metaline Co., Gordon v. -	75
British Legal Life Assurance and Loan Co., Limited, v. Pearl Life Assurance Co., Limited, -	818
Broddelius v. Grischotti, -	536
Brough v. Adamson, -	858
Brown, MacLagan (Collector of Ministers' Widows' Fund) v. -	1083
Bruce, Hogg v. -	887
Buchanan's Trustees v. Buchanan Bequest Trustees, -	284
Buchanan & Johnson's Trustee, Ogilvie & Son v. -	399
Buckner v. Jopp's Trustees, -	1006
Byars' Trustees v. Hay, -	1034
Campbell, Filshill v. -	592
Campbell, M'Murphy v. -	725
Campbell, &c. (Russell's Trustees) v. Russell, -	849
Cardross Parochial Board, North British Railway Co. v. -	478
Carrick (Glasgow Master of Works), Glass v. -	567
Carswell & Son v. Finlay, -	903
Chayne and Others (Findlay's Trustees) v. Findlays, -	167
Chiene (Liquidator of the British Canadian Lumbering and Timber Co.), -	160
Clark (Crumpton's Curator Bonis), Accountant of Court v. -	55
Clark, Incorporated Society of Law-Agents in Scotland v. -	161
Coatbridge Tinplate Co., Limited, Sharp (Bell's Trustee) v. -	246
Commercial Bank of Scotland, Limited, v. Lanark Oil Co., Limited, -	147
Congleton v. Angus, -	309
Cook v. Stark, -	1
Couper, M'Kechnie v. -	345
Cowan v. Cowan, -	670
Cowan v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, -	682
Crowe, Adam v. -	800
Cruickshank's Trustees v. Magistrates of Glasgow, -	603
Crumpton's Curator Bonis , Accountant of Court v. -	55
Cunninghame (Glengarnock Iron Co.) v. Walkinshaw Oil Co., -	87
Cunningham and Others (Miller's Trustees), Websters v. -	501
Cuthbertson v. Gibson, -	736
Daly v. Arrol Brothers, -	154
Davidson, Macleod v. -	92, 298
Davie, Samson (Kirkmuir Inspector of Poor) v. -	113
Denham, Bethune and Others (St Andrews Ladies' Golf Club) v. -	686
Dickson's Trustees, Law, &c. (Somerville's Trustees) v. -	770
Dill, Smillie, & Wilson, Oastler v. -	12
Dixon, M'Quade v. -	1039
Dodsworth v. Rijnbergen, -	238
Dougans, Young v. -	490
Dow v. Imrie, -	928
Drummond & Graham, Andrews v. -	568
Dun, Monkland Iron Co., Limited, v. -	242
Duncan, Property Investment Co. of Scotland, Limited, v. -	299
Dundee, Magistrates of, Keiller v. -	191
Dundee, Magistrates of, Scott v. -	191
Duthil Kirk-Session v. Lady Seafeld, -	939
Edinburgh, Magistrates of, Cowan v. -	682
Edinburgh Street Tramways Co., Limited, Haston v. -	621
Educational Endowments Commissioners, Ferguson Bequest Fund v. -	624, 717
Elgin County Road Trustees v. Innes, -	48
Elphinstone, Lord, v. Monkland Iron and Coal Co., Limited, -	449

INDEX OF NAMES.

vii

	Page
English's Coasting and Shipping Co., Limited, v. British Finance Co., Limited, - - - - -	220
Erskine, &c. (Erskine's Trustees), Masterton v. - - - - -	712
Fairbairn, Foulis v. - - - - -	1088
Falkirk Iron Co., Hunter, Walker, & Co. v. - - - - -	1072
Faria, Magistrates of Glasgow v. - - - - -	346
Farquharson v. Blair (Farquharson's Curator ad litem), - - - - -	231
Ferguson Bequest Fund v. Educational Endowments Commissioners, 624, - - - - -	717
Fife, Earl of, Marquis of Huntly v. - - - - -	1091
Filshill v. Campbell, - - - - -	592
Findlay v. Angus, - - - - -	312
Findlay's Trustees v. Findlays, - - - - -	167
Finlay, Carswell & Son v. - - - - -	903
Finlay, &c. (Dickson's Trustees), Law, &c. (Somerville's Trustees) v. - - - - -	770
Fleming, &c. (Jarvie's Trustees), Martin (Jarvie's Trustee) v. - - - - -	411
Forrest, Manson v. - - - - -	802
Foulis v. Fairbairn, - - - - -	1088
Fraser v. Bell, - - - - -	811
Fraser v. Macdonald, - - - - -	181
Fraser's Trustee, Stronach (Wilson's Trustee) v. - - - - -	504
Free Church of Scotland, Trustees of, v. Maitland, - - - - -	333
Gibson, Cuthbertson v. - - - - -	736
Gibson v. West Lothian Oil Co., - - - - -	578
Glasgow City Parish, Collectors for, Magistrates of Glasgow v. - - - - -	319
Glasgow, Countess of, Earl of Glasgow v. - - - - -	59
Glasgow, Earl of, v. Boyle, - - - - -	419
Glasgow, Earl of, v. Countess of Glasgow, - - - - -	59
Glasgow Educational Endowments Board, Guild (Macmillan's Judicial Factor) v. - - - - -	944
Glasgow Feuing and Building Co., Limited, v. Watson, &c. (Watson's Trustees), - - - - -	610, 718
Glasgow, Magistrates of, v. Faria, - - - - -	346
Glasgow, Magistrates of, v. Hall, - - - - -	319
Glasgow, Magistrates of, Lamont, &c. (Cruickshank's Trustees) v. - - - - -	603
Glasgow, Magistrates of, Lower Ward of Lanarkshire Road Trustees v. - - - - -	890
Glasgow Master of Works, Glass v. - - - - -	567
Glasgow Provident Investment Society v. Westminster Fire Office, - - - - -	947
Glasgow Royal Infirmary, - - - - -	680
Glass v. Carrick (Glasgow Master of Works), - - - - -	567
Glengarnock Iron Co. v. Walkinshaw Oil Co., - - - - -	87
Gordon v. British and Foreign Metaline Co., - - - - -	75
Gourlay (Millen & Co.'s Trustees) v. Mackie, - - - - -	403
Govan Parish Heritors, Trades' House of Glasgow v. - - - - -	910
Govan Police Commissioners v. Armour, - - - - -	461
Govanhill Burgh Surveyor, Robertson v. - - - - -	822
Gow v. Gow, - - - - -	443
Gracie, Pulsometer Engineering Co., Limited, v. - - - - -	316
Gray, Ross v. - - - - -	768
Gregory's Trustees, Murray v. - - - - -	368
Grischotti, Broddelius v. - - - - -	536
Gudin, Bank of Scotland v. - - - - -	213
Guild (Macmillan's Judicial Factor) v. Glasgow Educational Endowments Board, - - - - -	944
Hall, Magistrates of Glasgow v. - - - - -	319
Halliday's Executor v. Halliday's Executors, - - - - -	251
Halden v. Liquidator of the Scottish Heritable Security Co., Limited, - - - - -	633
Hamilton, Duke of, White, &c. (White's Trustees) v. - - - - -	597
Hamilton Water-Works Commissioners, Allan v. - - - - -	485

	Page
Harvie v. W. & T. Ross, - - -	71
Haston v. Edinburgh Street Tramways Co., Limited, - -	621
Hay, Alexander, &c. (Byars' Trustees) v. - - -	1034
Heritable Property Trust, Limited, Alliance Heritable Security Co., Limited, v. - - -	34
Hill, &c., Nicoll, &c. (Nicoll's Executors) v. - - -	384
Hillhead Police Commissioners, - - -	18
Hogg v. Bruce, - - -	887
Honeyman & Wilson v. Robertson, - - -	163
Hood, &c. (Gregory's Trustees), Murray v. - - -	368
Hope Vere v. Young, - - -	425
Horsbrugh's Trustees v. Welch, - - -	67
Houldsworth v. Burgh of Wishaw, - - -	920
Hunter and Others (Owners of s. "Afton") v. Northern Marine Insurance Co., Limited, - - -	544
Hunter v. School Board of Lochgilphead, - - -	135
Hunter, Walker, & Co. v. Falkirk Iron Co., - - -	1072
Huntly, Marquis of, v. Earl of Fife, - - -	1091
Hutchison, J. & P., Macrae (Lightbody's Trustee) v. - -	4
Imrie, Dow v. - - -	928
Inches, Arrol v. - - -	394
Incorporated Society of Law-Agents in Scotland v. Clark, - -	161
Incorporation of Tailors in Glasgow v. Inland Revenue, - -	729
Ingليس' Trustees v. Inglis, - - -	740
Inland Revenue, Incorporation of Tailors in Glasgow v. - -	729
Inland Revenue, Scottish Mortgage and Land Investment Co. of New Mexico v. - - -	98
Inland Revenue, Society of Writers to the Signet v. - - -	34
Inland Revenue, Town and County Bank v. - - -	528
Innes, Elgin County Road Trustees v. - - -	48
Ivory, Beaton v. - - -	1057
Jack v. North British Railway Co., - - -	263
Jackson, Youden (Clerk to the Leven Police Commissioners) v. -	1001
Jameson v. Neilson (Sharp's Factor), - - -	643
Jameson v. Sharp, - - -	643
Jardine v. Stonefield Laundry Co., - - -	839
Jarvie's Trustee v. Jarvie's Trustees, - - -	411
Jehangeer Framjee & Co., Black v. - - -	678
Jopp, &c. (Jopp's Trustees), Buckner v. - - -	1006
Keddie, Gordon, & Co. v. North British Railway Co., - -	233
Keiller v. Magistrates of Dundee, - - -	191
Keith, Shepperd (Skinner's Trustee) v. - - -	553
Kerr (Halliday's Executor) v. Halliday's Executors, - -	251
Kilmarnock Magistrates (Buchanan Bequest Trustees), Anderson and Others (Buchanan's Trustees) v. - - -	284
Kilmore and Kilbride, Inspector of, v. Inspector of Ardochattan and Muckairn, - - -	539
King's Trustees, M'Inally v. - - -	8
Kirriemuir Inspector of Poor v. Davie, - - -	113
Knox, &c. (Millar's Trustees), Mackinnon (Millar's Judicial Factor) v. -	22
Lamont, &c. (Cruickshank's Trustees) v. Magistrates of Glasgow, -	603
Lanark Oil Co., Limited, Commercial Bank of Scotland, Limited, v. -	147
Law, &c. (Somerville's Trustees) v. Finlay, &c. (Dickson's Trustees), -	770
Lawson Seed and Nursery Co., Limited, v. Lawson & Son, Limited, -	154
Leishman, Macpherson v. - - -	780
Lerwick Superintendent of Customs v. Rijnbergen, - - -	238
Lealie, Sinclair v. - - -	792
Lealie (Murray's Trustee) v. Wood - - -	856
Lealies v. Walker, - - -	288

INDEX OF NAMES.

ix

	Page
Leven Police Commissioners v. Jackson, - - -	1001
Lightbody's Trustee v. J. & P. Hutchison, - - -	4
Lightbourne, &c. (Reid's Trustees), Reid v. - - -	770
Linlithgow Police Commissioners, - - -	444
Liverpool and London and Globe Insurance Co., Smith v. - - -	931
Livingstone v. Livingstone, - - -	43
Lochgilphhead School Board, Hunter v. - - -	135
Lovat, Lord, Mackintosh v. - - -	282
Lower Ward of Lanarkshire Road Trustees v. Magistrates of Glasgow, - - -	890
M'Craig (Maitland's Judicial Factor) v. Maitland (Maitland's Executor), - - -	295
M'Craig v. Sinclair, - - -	539
M'Culloch's Trustees, M'Whirter v. - - -	918
Macdonald (Clerk to Govan Police Commissioners) v. Armour, - - -	461
Macdonald, Fraser v. - - -	181
Macdonald, Moncur v. - - -	305
Macfarlane v. Black & Co., - - -	870
M'George v. Paton, Son, & Co. (M'George's Creditors), - - -	841
M'Ghie v. North British Railway Co., - - -	499
M'Gilvray, Sweeney v. - - -	105
M'Gregor v. Alley & M'Lellan, - - -	535
M'Inally v. King and Others (King's Trustees), - - -	8
M'Intyres, Muir v. - - -	470
M'Kechnie v. Couper, - - -	345
Mackenzie, Gardner, & Alexander, Stirling v. - - -	170
M'Kenzie, Urquhart v. - - -	18
M'Kercher v. M'Quarrie, - - -	1038
Mackie, Gourlay (Millen & Co.'s Trustee) v. - - -	403
Mackill & Co. v. Wright Brothers & Co., - - -	863
Mackinnon (Millar's Judicial Factor) v. Knox, &c. (Millar's Trustees), - - -	22
Mackintosh v. Lord Lovat, - - -	282
M'Kittrick, Ross v. - - -	255
MacLagan (Collector of Ministers' Widows' Fund) v. Brown, - - -	1083
M'Lean v. Angus Brothers, - - -	448
M'Lellan, North British Building Society v. - - -	827
M'Lennan, Macpherson v. - - -	1057, 1063
Macleod v. Davidson, - - -	92, 298
MacMaster's Curator Bonis v. Accountant of Court, - - -	212
Macmillan's Judicial Factor v. Glasgow Educational Endowments Board, - - -	944
M'Murphy v. Campbell, - - -	725
Macpherson v. Leishman, - - -	780
Macpherson v. M'Lennan, - - -	1057, 1063
Macpherson, Scottish Rights of Way and Recreation Society, Limited, v. - - -	7, 74, 875
M'Quade v. Dixon, - - -	1039
M'Quarrie, M'Kercher v. - - -	1038
Macrae (Lightbody's Trustee) v. J. & P. Hutchison, - - -	4
M'Whirter v. Rankin, &c. (M'Culloch's Trustees), - - -	918
Maffett v. Stewart, - - -	506
Maitland's Judicial Factor v. Maitland (Maitland's Executor), - - -	295
Maitland, Trustees of Free Church of Scotland v. - - -	333
Manson v. Forrest, - - -	802
Martin (Jarvie's Trustee) v. Fleming, &c. (Jarvie's Trustees), - - -	411
Martin v. Wards, - - -	814
Masterton v. Erskine, &c. (Erskine's Trustees), - - -	712
Millar's Judicial Factor v. Millar's Trustees, - - -	22
Millen & Co.'s Trustee v. Mackie, - - -	403
Miller's Trustees, Websters v. - - -	501
Ministers' Widows' Fund, Collector of, v. Brown, - - -	1083
Moncur v. Macdonald, - - -	305

	Page
Monkland Iron Co., Limited, v. Dun, -	242
Monkland Iron and Coal Co., Limited, Lord Elphinstone v. -	449
Montgomerie, &c. (Stirling Crawford's Trustees), -	131
Montrose, Duke of, v. Provan's Trustees, -	378
Montrose, Duchess of, Stirling Stuart v. -	131
Morrison v. Neilson, -	452
Muir v. M'Intyres, -	470
Muirhead (Police Commissioners of Hillhead), -	18
Munro, &c. (Munro's Trustees) v. Young, -	574
Murray v. Hood, &c. (Gregory's Trustees), -	368
Murray's Trustee v. Wood, -	856
Napier, &c. (Inglis' Trustees) v. Inglis, -	740
Neilson, Morrison v. -	452
Neilson (Sharp's Factor), Jameson v. -	643
Nichols v. Scottish Union and National Insurance Co., -	1094
Nicoll, &c. (Nicoll's Executors) v. Hill, -	384
North British Building Society v. M'Lellan, -	827
North British Railway Co. v. Benhar Coal Co. -	141
North British Railway Co. v. Cardross Parochial Board, -	478
North British Railway Co., Jack v. -	263
North British Railway Co., Keddies, Gordon, & Co. v. -	233
North British Railway Co., M'Ghie v. -	499
Northern Investment Co. of New Zealand, Smiles (Surveyor of Taxes) v. -	734
Northern Marine Insurance Co., Limited, Hunter and Others (Owners of s. "Afton") v. -	544
Oastler v. Dill, Smillie, & Wilson, -	12
Ogilvie & Son v. Taylor (Buchanan & Johnson's Trustee), -	399
Parker, Brady v. -	783
Paterson (Inspector of Poor of Cardross Parish), North British Railway Co. v. -	478
Paton, Son, & Co. (M'George's Creditors), M'George v. -	841
Pearl Life Assurance Co., Limited, British Legal Life Assurance and Loan Co., Limited, v. -	818
Pirie, Westlands v. -	763
Pringle, Robertson v. -	474
Property Investment Co. of Scotland, Limited, v. Duncan, -	299
Provan, &c. (Provan's Trustees), Duke of Montrose v. -	378
Pulsometer Engineering Co., Limited, v. Gracie, -	316
Rankin, &c. (M'Culloch's Trustees), M'Whirter v. -	918
Reid v. Lightbourne, &c. (Reid's Trustees), -	770
Reid v. Reid Brothers, -	789
Reid v. Strathie, -	847
Richardson, &c. (Horsburgh's Trustees) v. Welch, -	67
Riddell, Smith v. -	95
Rijnbergen, Dodsworth v. -	238
Robertson, Honeyman & Wilson v. -	163
Robertson v. Pringle, -	474
Robertson v. Thomas (Govanhill Burgh Surveyor), -	822
Roden, Bonar v. -	761
Ross v. Gray, -	768
Ross, W. & T., Harvie v. -	71
Ross v. M'Kittrick, -	255
Russell's Trustees v. Russell, -	849
Salem Flour Mills Co., Limited, Smyth & Co. v. -	441
Samson (Kirkriemuir Inspector of Poor) v. Davie, -	113
Scotland, Bank of, v. Gudin, -	213
Scott v. Magistrates of Dundee, -	191

INDEX OF NAMES.

xi

	Page
Scott's Trustee v. Scott, - - - - -	1043
Scottish Heritable Security Co., Limited, Halden v. - - - - -	633
Scottish Mortgage and Land Investment Co. of New Mexico v. Inland Revenue, - - - - -	98
Scottish Rights of Way and Recreation Society, Limited, v. Macpherson, - - - - -	7, 74, 875
Scottish Union and National Insurance Co., Nichols v. - - - - -	1094
Seafeld, Lady, Bain v. - - - - -	939
Sharp (Bell's Trustee) v. Coatbridge Tinplate Co., Limited, - - - - -	246
Sharp, Jameson v. - - - - -	643
Sheppard (Skinner's Trustee) v. Keith, - - - - -	563
Sinclair v. Leslie, - - - - -	792
Sinclair, M'Caig v. - - - - -	539
Skinner's Trustee v. Keith, - - - - -	563
Smiles (Surveyor of Taxes) v. Northern Investment Co. of New Zealand, Limited, - - - - -	734
Smillies v. Boyd, - - - - -	150
Smith and Another (Bransby's Trustees), Breatcliff v. - - - - -	307
Smith v. Liverpool and London and Globe Insurance Co., - - - - -	931
Smith v. Riddell, - - - - -	95
Smyth & Co. v. Salem Flour Mills Co., Limited, - - - - -	441
Somerville's Trustees v. Finlay, &c. (Dickson's Trustees), - - - - -	770
St Andrews' Ladies' Golf Club v. Denham, - - - - -	686
Stark, Cook v. - - - - -	1
Steedman v. Steedman, - - - - -	682, 1066
Stewart, Maffett v. - - - - -	506
Stewart & Co., United Horse Shoe and Nail Co., Limited, v. - - - - -	266
Stirling Crawford's Trustees, - - - - -	131
Stirling v. Mackenzie, Gardner, & Alexander, - - - - -	170
Stirling, &c. (Urquhart's Trustees) v. Urquhart, - - - - -	112
Stirling Stuart v. Duchess of Montrose, - - - - -	131
Stonefield Laundry Co., Jardine v. - - - - -	839
Strang v. Stuart, - - - - -	637
Stathie, Reid v. - - - - -	847
Stonach (Wilson's Trustee) v. Barr (Fraser's Trustee), - - - - -	504
Stuart, Strang v. - - - - -	637
Surveyor of Taxes v. Northern Investment Co. of New Zealand, Limited, - - - - -	734
Sweeney v. M'Gilvray, - - - - -	105
Tait (Webster's Trustee), Webster v. - - - - -	90
Taylor (Buchanan & Johnston's Trustee), Ogilvie & Son v. - - - - -	399
Thom (Clerk to the Linlithgow Police Commissioners), - - - - -	444
Thomas (Govanhill Burgh Surveyor), Robertson v. - - - - -	822
Thomson v. Anderson, - - - - -	1026
Thomson v. Thomson, - - - - -	634
Town and County Bank v. Inland Revenue, - - - - -	528
Trades' House of Glasgow v. Govan Parish Heritors, - - - - -	910
Tweedie (MacMaster's Curator Bonis) v. Accountant of Court, - - - - -	212
United Horse Shoe and Nail Co., Limited, v. Stewart & Co., - - - - -	266
Urquhart v. M'Kenzie, - - - - -	18
Urquhart's Trustees v. Urquhart, - - - - -	112
Walker, Hunter, & Co. v. Falkirk Iron Co., - - - - -	1072
Walker, Leslies v. - - - - -	288
Walkinshaw Oil Co., Cuninghame (Glengarnock Iron Co.) v. - - - - -	87
Wards, Martin v. - - - - -	814
Watson, &c. (Watson's Trustees), Glasgow Feuing and Building Co. v. - - - - -	610, 718
Websters v. Cunningham & Others (Miller's Trustees), - - - - -	501
Webster v. Tait (Webster's Trustee), - - - - -	90
Welch, Richardson, &c. (Horsbrugh's Trustees) v. - - - - -	67

	Page
Westlands v. Pirie, - - - - -	763
West Lothian Oil Co., Gibson v. - - - - -	578
Westminster Fire Office, Glasgow Provident Investment Society v. - - - - -	947
White, &c. (White's Trustees) v. Duke of Hamilton, - - - - -	597
Williamson v. Begg, - - - - -	720
Williamson v. Williamson, - - - - -	226
Wilson's Trustee v. Barr (Fraser's Trustee), - - - - -	504
Wisely v. Aberdeen Harbour Commissioners, - - - - -	445
Wiseman (Scott's Trustee) v. Scott, - - - - -	1043
Wishaw, Burgh of, Houldsworth v. - - - - -	920
Wood, Leslie (Murray's Trustee) v. - - - - -	856
Wright Brothers & Co., Mackill & Co. v. - - - - -	863
Writers to the Signet, Society of, v. Inland Revenue, - - - - -	34
Youden (Clerk to the Leven Police Commissioners) v. Jackson, - - - - -	1001
Young v. Dougans, - - - - -	490
Young, Hope Vere v. - - - - -	425
Young, Munro, &c. (Munro's Trustees) v. - - - - -	574

REGISTRATION APPEAL CASES.

Ballingal v. Menzies, - - - - -	127
Cunninghame v. Grossart, - - - - -	121
Grossart, Cunninghame v. - - - - -	121
M'Donald, Smith v. - - - - -	125
Menzies, Ballingal v. - - - - -	127
Smith v. M'Donald, - - - - -	125

LANDS VALUATION APPEAL CASES.

Allan, Assessor for Kilmarnock v. - - - - -	581
Edinburgh Gas-Light Co. v. Assessor for Leith, - - - - -	583
Haddingtonshire, Assessor for, Prestongrange Coal and Firebrick Co., Limited, v. - - - - -	589
Kilmarnock, Assessor for, v. Allan, - - - - -	581
Kilmarnock, Assessor for, v. M'Nally, - - - - -	582
Lanark, Assessor for, v. Selkirk, - - - - -	579
Leith, Assessor for, Edinburgh Gas-Light Co. v. - - - - -	583
M'Nally, Assessor for Kilmarnock v. - - - - -	582
Prestongrange Coal and Firebrick Co., Limited, v. Assessor for Haddingtonshire, - - - - -	589
Selkirk, Assessor for Lanark v. - - - - -	579

II.—COURT OF JUSTICIARY.

Advocate, Her Majesty's, v. M'Lean, - - - - -	1
Bremridge v. Gray, - - - - -	60
Cadenhead, Heslop v. - - - - -	35

INDEX OF NAMES.

xiii

	Page
Cadenhead v. Milne, - - - - -	58
Caledonian Railway Co., Thom v. - - - - -	5
Clelland v. Sinclair, - - - - -	23
Clyne v. Keith, - - - - -	22
Dickson v. Linton, - - - - -	13
Eglinton Chemical Co., Limited, Fletcher v. - - - - -	9
Fletcher v. Eglinton Chemical Co., Limited, - - - - -	9
Fraser, Macbeath v. - - - - -	16
Gourlay v. Lang, - - - - -	31
Gray, Bremridge v. - - - - -	60
Healop v. Cadenhead, - - - - -	35
Jack v. Nairne, - - - - -	20
Keith, Clyne v. - - - - -	22
Lang, Gourlay v. - - - - -	31
Linton, Dickson v. - - - - -	13
Linton v. Sherry, - - - - -	46
Macaulay v. Macdonald, - - - - -	43
Macbeath v. Fraser, - - - - -	16
Macdonald, Macaulay v. - - - - -	43
Macdougall v. Macullich, - - - - -	17
Mackenzie v. Pitcaithley, - - - - -	19
M'Lean, Her Majesty's Advocate v. - - - - -	1
Macullich, Macdougall v. - - - - -	17
M'Neill, Nicol v. - - - - -	47
Milne, Cadenhead v. - - - - -	58
Morrison v. Morrison, - - - - -	28
Nairne, Jack v. - - - - -	20
Nicol v. M'Neill, - - - - -	47
Pitcaithley, Mackenzie v. - - - - -	19
Sinclair, Clelland v. - - - - -	23
Scott v. Thomson, - - - - -	45
Sherry, Linton v. - - - - -	46
Thom v. Caledonian Railway Co., - - - - -	5
Thomson, Scott v. - - - - -	45

III.—HOUSE OF LORDS.

Advocate, Lord, and North British Railway Co., Young v. - - -	53
Auld v. Glasgow Working-Men's Provident Investment Building Society, - - -	27
Burns v. Martin, - - - - -	20
Caird v. Sime, - - - - -	37
Glasgow Working-Men's Provident Investment Building Society, Auld v. - - -	27
Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. - - - - -	33
Inland Revenue, Commissioners of, v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., - - - - -	33

	Page
Kelvinside Estate Trustees, Lanarkshire Lower Ward Road Trustees v. -	18
Lanarkshire Lower Ward Road Trustees v. Kelvinside Estate Trustees, -	18
M'Clure, Naismith, Brodie, & Macfarlane, v. Stewart.*
Martin, Burns v. - - - - -	20
National Bank of Scotland, Limited, Union Bank of Scotland, Limited, v.	1
North British Building Society, Tosh v. - - - - -	6
North British Railway Co., Young v. - - - - -	53
Sime, Caird v. - - - - -	37
Tosh v. North British Building Society, - - - - -	6
Union Bank of Scotland, Limited, v. National Bank of Scotland, Limited,	1
Young v. North British Railway Co., - - - - -	53

* Reserved for next volume.

ERRATA.

At p. 610, transpose names of pursuers' and defenders' counsel.

At p. 1003, tenth line from top, for "1882" read "1862."

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE HOUSE OF LORDS,

1886-87.

UNION BANK OF SCOTLAND, LIMITED, Second Party (Appellants).—

Sir H. Davey, Q.C.—Macnaghten, Q.C.—Low.

NATIONAL BANK OF SCOTLAND, LIMITED, First Party (Respondents).—

Balfour, Q.C.—Murray.

No. 1.

Dec. 10, 1886.
Union Bank
of Scotland,
Limited, v.
National Bank
of Scotland,
Limited.

Right in security—Absolute disposition with back-letter—Advances by third party on assignation of reversionary interest intimated to the disponee.—A bank held a recorded absolute disposition granted by A of certain subjects, which by back-letter it agreed to hold “in security, and until full and final payment of all sums of money now due, or which may hereafter become due.” The back-letter was not recorded. Some months afterwards A, for onerous considerations, granted to another bank a deed by which she alienated, assigned, and disposed her whole right and interest and right of reversion in the subjects. Intimation of the assignation was made to the first bank. Thereafter advances were made to A by both banks. In a competition between the two banks, held (rev. judgment of the Court of Session) that, in a question between the two banks, the first bank’s security was limited to advances made prior to the date when the assignation was intimated.

(In the Court of Session, 18th December 1885, 13 R. 380.)

The Union Bank appealed.

At delivering judgment,—

LORD CHANCELLOR.—Two propositions appear to be established beyond dispute in the discussions of the learned Judges on this question. One, that the National Bank held an absolute disposition of the lands in question, dated 12th February 1879, and recorded some days later. Another, that the terms of a back-letter, the meaning and construction of which I will refer to presently, qualified the absolute disposition, and restricted the title to one in security.

Ld. Chancellor
(Halsbury).
Lord Blackburn.
Lord Watson.

The interesting historical retrospect of the Lord President of the mode in which this form of transaction came to be adopted by Scotch conveyancers in order to avoid the common law and the Statute of 1696 is, I think, very relevant to the question of what is the substantial nature of the transaction in question. It certainly bears a very close analogy to the English mortgage of land, which conveys in the most absolute form the estate to the mortgagee, but which nevertheless is only held as a security for money advanced.

In the language of the back-letter the National Bank were to “hold the said disposition in security, and until full and final payment of all sums of money now due or” (and these are the cardinal words) “which may hereafter become due.” These words, it is contended, are enough in construing the personal con-

No. 1.

Dec. 10, 1886.

Union Bank
of Scotland,

Limited, v.

National Bank

of Scotland,

Limited.

tract to establish that by the contractual relations between the parties the National Bank were entitled to prevent Mrs M'Arthur borrowing elsewhere than from themselves anything upon the security of the lands in question.

The first observation that strikes one is that no such express contract appears on the face of the instrument. It might be that Mrs M'Arthur would continue to borrow to the full extent of the security, and, if she did so borrow from the National Bank, there is no doubt that the security would (as the language I have quoted obviously intended that it should) form a security for such further advances. But does it follow, because the back-letter makes provision for what in that event would be a natural and proper course of dealing, that thereby Mrs M'Arthur entered into a contract not to deal with the reversionary interest with anyone else?

It is certain that no obligation is imposed on the National Bank to advance any more money than they have already advanced, and the result would appear to be that by Mrs M'Arthur's entering into a contract to allow her property to be security for all sums already due, and for all sums which, upon terms to be afterwards settled between them, the bank might advance to her, she thereby undertook that she would remain with that bank as a customer (to use the language of one of the learned Judges) until the value of her security was exhausted.

It appears to me that this is the real ground of difference upon which the learned Judges have been divided. It is not denied—indeed it is insisted—that upon payment of all sums due Mrs M'Arthur would be entitled to demand reconveyance, and it cannot therefore be denied that if instead of fresh advances obtained from the National Bank Mrs M'Arthur had proceeded to some other bank, which was in a position to advance the whole of the sums already due and make to Mrs M'Arthur a further advance, such a transaction would have been perfectly competent. But although that would seem to shew that Mrs M'Arthur's interest in the unpledged value of the security was such as to enable her to get further money value for it, nevertheless, as long as the National Bank remained the absolute unqualified disponees she could not treat for, or dispose of in any effectual manner, her reversionary interest.

It would seem to be a strange result of what, the Lord President has pointed out, was a pure conveyancing expedient to avoid the operation of the common law and the statute law, that an admittedly valuable property is no longer at Mrs M'Arthur's disposition, but that on the personal contract, as distinguished from the feudal relation created by absolute disposition, she was not at liberty to seek for further advances elsewhere than from her original creditor. We are dealing here not with the rights of third parties, but with the rights of the immediate parties to the transaction, and I gather from the reasoning of some of the learned Judges that they think there is an implied term (for it certainly is not expressed) in the contract in question that she is not to seek elsewhere to borrow on the security of what is nevertheless admitted to be her own remaining interest.

If I am right as to the true nature of the contract between the parties, each fresh advance must have been the subject of a fresh agreement, in this sense, that the bank must have consented to advance it, and upon that consent Mrs M'Arthur's previous contract would make such fresh advance a charge upon her interest in the reversionary right. But the question is, whether Mrs M'Arthur, having bargained away and made an assignation of her reversionary right to the knowledge of the National Bank, could then obtain further advances upon the security of an interest which she had for valuable consideration already assigned to a third person. It seems to me, that such a proceeding is contrary to good faith, and the decision of your Lordships' House in Hopkinson v. Rolt (9 Clark's House of Lords cases, 514) establishes the principle, and establishes it upon the broadest grounds of natural justice. I am not impressed with the completeness of the feudal ownership created by the absolute disposition. No question arises here which diminishes that complete and absolute character. Whether what remains in Mrs M'Arthur be regarded in the light of a pactum de retrovendendo, or whatever be the character of her interest, the real question comes back, not to the form of the transaction but to its substance, and to what is the actual bargain between the disponent and the disponent, as evidenced by the back-letter. Doubtless each of the two parties may be said to have proceeded upon a bona fide belief in their respective rights, and to have acted in pursuance of them, but how it can be suggested that Mrs M'Arthur could in good faith affect to charge with further sums borrowed that which she had already purported to assign I am at a loss to understand, and it is to be observed that the National Bank made the advances for which they now claim priority with the knowledge that Mrs M'Arthur had done so.

No. 1.
Dec. 10, 1888.
Union Bank
of Scotland,
Limited, v.
National Bank
of Scotland,
Limited.

I think the principle upon which Hopkinson v. Rolt was decided is one which governs this case, that its application is not confined to the law of England, but is applicable to the law of Scotland also, and I should feel myself bound by that case even did I not agree with the principle upon which it was decided. For these reasons I move that the interlocutor be reversed, and that the respondents should pay to the appellants the costs both here and below.

LORD WATSON.—This appeal raises a question of considerable importance to the law of Scotland. In disposing of it your Lordships have the great advantage of having before you the opinions of all the learned Judges of the Court of Session, which contain a clear statement of every reason that can be urged for or against the judgment appealed from.

The execution and recording of an absolute disposition of heritage, qualified by a personal contract in the form of an unrecorded back-letter, for the purpose of creating a security, has the effect of vesting the full feudal estate in the disponent, and the disponent's interest is thereby reduced to a personal right to have the estate, or the proceeds of its sale, as the case may be, reconveyed or paid to him, on payment or under deduction of the secured debts. As regards third parties who transact with him on the faith of the public records, the powers of the disponent are not affected by the private contract, and he can sell or burden the estate, and can give a valid title to the purchaser or encumbrancer, although the creation of these rights should be in direct violation of the terms of the back-letter. But in a question with the disponent himself, or with persons who through him have acquired an interest in the estate or in the personal contract, the disponent is affected by the back-letter, and is treated as the holder of a mere security. In all such cases the rights of parties must be determined, not according to the form of the disponent's title, but according to the substance of the transaction.

In Robertson v. Duff (2 D. 279) it was held, in the case of a security constituted by a disposition ex facie absolute, that the terms of the arrangement for securing debt, in pursuance of which the conveyance was made, might, as

No. 1.
Dec. 10, 1886.
Union Bank
of Scotland,
Limited, v.
National Bank
of Scotland,
Limited.

between the disponent and disponent, be instructed by the same kind of evidence which would be competent and sufficient to prove a trust in a question with an absolute disponent. Lord Fullerton and the other Judges who took part in the decision spoke of the case as one of trust, but the fact that they so described it does not affect the grounds of their judgment. I agree with the Lord President in thinking that the transaction with which we have to deal in this case is not within the category of proper trusts, but I do not think that it is in substance or in form a pactum de retrovendendo. The conveyance does not bear to be granted in implement of a contract of sale, and it was never contemplated by the parties that the National Bank should stand as purchasers with an obligation to re-sell; what they did contemplate was, that the bank should hold the subjects as a security for debt with power of sale, and under an obligation to reconvey (before sale) on receiving payment of the debt, or to account for the price under deduction of the debt. The effect of the unrecorded back-letter is to make the right of the respondents a mere security as between them on the one hand, and Mrs M'Arthur and all deriving right from her on the other. If the letter had been recorded in the Register of Sasines their right would have become a mere security in a question with the public, who would no longer have been entitled to deal with the respondents on the footing that they were the absolute proprietors of the estate.

In some of the judgments in the Court below there is a great deal of learned discussion as to the nature of the disponent's right under an unrecorded back-letter, but I do not think there is any real difference of opinion upon that point. In form it is a personal right consisting in obligatione, and it has been frequently described with perfect accuracy as a jus actionis. The right of a beneficiary under a proper trust constituted by an ex facie absolute disposition—the disponent acknowledging by a separate writing which does not enter the records the trust-purposes for which he holds—is a right of precisely the same quality. It is not, strictly speaking, a radical right, that being an expression which in the language of the feudal law is used to denote the right of a proprietor who, without divesting himself of his feudal estate, creates an incumbrance upon it, e.g., by means of a trust-conveyance bearing to be granted for payment of debt. But I am of opinion that the relations of the parties to this case do not depend upon feudal principles, and consequently that Lord Rutherford Clark was justified in saying that “the radical right to the subjects which had been conveyed to them (i.e., to the respondents) remained in Mrs M'Arthur.” Apart from considerations of feudal law Mrs M'Arthur had the radical right, in this sense, that according to the reality of the transaction she was the only person who had a proprietary interest in the subjects of the security, and that each successive advance, whilst it enlarged the bank's right of retention, imposed an additional burden upon her proprietary interest.

It appears to me that the key to the difference of opinion in the Court below is to be found in the widely different constructions which were put by the majority and minority of the learned Judges respectively upon Mrs M'Arthur's letter of the 12th February 1879, which contains the terms upon which the respondents agree to hold the disposition in their favour. In the opinion of the majority that letter gives the bank not only power to retain the property till they are relieved of advances made by them whilst Mrs M'Arthur continues to be owner of the reversionary interest, but an absolute right to retain it for advances made to her or her firm after she has, with the full knowledge of the bank, transferred her whole rights as reversioner to an onerous assignee having No. 1.

 no interest in those advances, and being under no obligation to secure them. Dec. 10, 1886.
 At your Lordships' bar counsel for the respondents not only admitted but Union Bank maintained that, as a necessary consequence of that construction, the bank had of Scotland, the right to lend to Mrs M'Arthur on the security of the property, and to the Limited, v.
 full extent of its value, although she had sold the reversion as it stood, and National Bank had expressly undertaken not to borrow, and the sale and the terms of that of Scotland, undertaking had been intimated to the bank before any advance was made. Limited.
 According to the view taken by the minority, the only debts falling within the arrangement embodied in the letter are advances made by the bank upon the credit of Mrs M'Arthur, and affecting her beneficial interest in the estate which was feudally vested in them, and therefore the bank had no right to make advances affecting that beneficial interest after they became aware that she had been divested of her interest by an assignation to the appellants.

I cannot say that I have had any difficulty in preferring the construction of the personal contract between Mrs M'Arthur and the respondents which was adopted by the minority of the Judges, and seeing that I have been influenced by the very same reasons which have already been fully stated by their Lordships I shall not repeat them. It is a necessary consequence of that construction that the preferable claim of the respondents upon the subjects vested in them must, in a question with the appellants, be limited to the debt due to them from Mrs M'Arthur and her firm at the time when the appellants' assignation was intimated, the appellants having priority for advances made after that date. Upon the terms of the back-letter I should have come to the conclusion quite independently of the decision of this House in Hopkinson v. Rolt (9 H. of L. Cases, 514). The principle of that decision, of which I entirely approve, does not rest upon any rule or practice of English conveyancing, but upon principles of natural justice. The circumstances of the two cases are in many respects very analogous, but it is, in my opinion, quite sufficient for the decision of this case that the terms of their personal contract with Mrs M'Arthur precluded the respondents from making advances to her upon the security of property which was known by them to belong, in reality not to her, but to the appellants as her onerous assignees.

Notwithstanding the importance of the present case, I have confined myself to these somewhat desultory observations, because I entirely concur in and can add nothing to the reasoning of the five learned Judges who constituted the minority in the Court below.

I am of opinion that the interlocutor appealed from ought to be reversed, with costs, and that your Lordships ought to answer the second question in the special case in the affirmative.

LORD BLACKBURN.—I have read with attention the different judgments delivered in this case below.

I have also had the advantage of reading in print the opinion of my noble and learned friend Lord Watson.

I do not think any benefit would be gained by my saying more than that I agree with the judgment proposed.

INTERLOCUTOR appealed from reversed, with costs, both on appeal and in Court of Session.

MURRAY, HUTCHINGS, & Co.—J. & F. ANDERSON, W.S.—ANDREW BEVERIDGE—DOVE & LOCKHART, S.S.C.

No. 2.

July 30, 1886.
Tosh v. North
British Building
Society.

HENRY TOSH (Sixth Party), Appellant.—Sol.-Gen. Davey—Farwell.
GEORGE GUTHRIE (Seventh Party), Appellant.—Sol.-Gen. Davey—Farwell.
ROBERT FINLAY (Ninth Party), Appellant.—Sol.-Gen. Davey—Farwell.
NORTH BRITISH BUILDING SOCIETY AND LIQUIDATOR (First Parties), Respondents.—Cookson, Q.C.—MacClymont—C. E. Allan.

Building Society—Rights of borrowing members—Effect of stopping business prior to liquidation—Liability for loss in questions between members.—The rules of a building society, constituted under the Building Societies Act, 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 32, provided that a borrowing member who had given heritable security might have his property redeemed (1) on giving three months' notice before Whitsunday or Martinmas, by renouncing the shares representing the advance, and paying the amount of the advance under deduction of instalments already paid and interest thereon, his connection with the society, so far as these shares are concerned, then ceasing, or (2) by repaying the advance and retaining his shares, or (3) by the amount of his subscriptions with the profits allocated to him amounting to the sum advanced, his connection with the society then ceasing.

The society carried on business for some years prior to 13th May 1882, when it ceased to do so, and issued a circular to members intimating that the society had sustained loss through the depreciation of its securities, and suggesting that all members should give notice of withdrawal from the society, so as to prevent individual members obtaining preferences. On 9th July 1884 the society presented a petition for a winding-up order, which was granted on 19th July.

On 6th December 1882 Tosh, a borrowing member, paid by anticipation the final instalments on his shares, which would have fallen due and matured his shares on 3d June 1883, his subscriptions and profits allocated then amounting to the sum advanced.

On 17th April 1882 Guthrie, and on 16th May 1882 Finlay, both borrowing members, gave notice of withdrawal at Martinmas 1882.

In a special case the First Division held (1) that the society was to be held as having stopped business at 13th May 1882, and that the rights of members fell to be determined as at that date; (2) that there being no stipulation in the rules as to the incidence of loss sustained by the society, the loss fell to be borne by all members entitled by the rules to a share of the profits, and that in proportion to the sums standing at the credit of their shares; and therefore (3) that, at 13th May 1882, the three members above mentioned remained members of the society and were liable for loss sustained by the society in proportion to the sums standing at their credit.

In an appeal held (rev. judgment of the Court of Session) that nothing had occurred prior to the winding-up order of July 1884 to suspend the operation of the rules of the society under which the shares of borrowing members matured, and under which borrowing members were entitled to withdraw.

Held further, that the judgment of the Court below was at variance with the judgment of the House in Brownlie v. Russell, L. R., 8 App. Ca. 235, 10 R. (H. of L.) 19, which decided that in building societies the rights of individual members in questions between them and the society fell to be determined solely by the terms of the contract embodied in the rules, and that, although the contract might give borrowing members a right to have shares of profits allocated to them it did not thereby make them responsible for loss when that was not expressly provided for by the rules.

Ld. Chancellor
(Herschell).
Lord Black-
burn.
Ld. Fitzgerald.

(In the Court of Session, 14th July 1885, 12 R. 1271.)

The North British Building Society was established in Glasgow in 1868, under the provisions of the Act 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 32.

The Society carried on business, and for several years made profits, out of which annually a sum was set aside as a guarantee fund, and the remainder allocated to the shares of members, borrowing and non-borrowing, in proportion to the amounts respectively standing at their credit on their shares.*

* Rule 28 was—"The Society's books shall be balanced by the manager

A great portion of the Society's funds having been advanced to members on postponed securities, the fall in the value of heritable property in 1878 (which was aggravated by the stoppage of the City of Glasgow Bank) and the bankruptcy of several of the Society's borrowing members involved the Society in serious losses. On 11th April 1882 the directors resolved to obtain from Mr Robert Taylor, builder, Glasgow, a valuator of experience, a report upon the securities which they considered doubtful, and on finding their apprehensions regarding the securities confirmed by the report, they caused a circular, dated 13th May 1882, to be issued to the shareholders, borrowing as well as non-borrowing (excepting certain shareholders who were understood to have completed their shares but who had not been paid out), inviting them to give notice of withdrawal from the Society, so as to prevent individual members obtaining preferences. To the borrowing members there was sent along with the circular a special printed slip intimating that it would be understood that withdrawals by borrowing members were not to prejudice their rights under the rules of the Society.

No. 2.

July 30, 1886.
Tooh v. North
British Building
Society.

In compliance with that request all the non-borrowing shareholders, with the exception of five, and seventeen, or about one-half, of the solvent borrowing shareholders, gave notices withdrawing their shares.

The report issued by the directors for the financial year ending 30th November 1882 shewed that there fell to be treated as lost a sum of £16,044. 9s. 11d., which would completely absorb a sum of £5509, 19s. 3d. of profits then allocated in the Society's books, and standing at the credit of the different shareholders, borrowing and non-borrowing, as well as a large amount of the capital of the Society.

The Society was carried on as usual up till 13th May 1882,—new members were admitted, and matured and withdrawing members were paid out without any deduction being made from the sums at their credit,—but thereafter the Society virtually existed only for the purposes of liquidation.

Various questions having arisen as to the rights and liabilities of the different members in the circumstances mentioned above, a special case was presented to the Court by the trustees of the Society, and by eleven different members.

The case was first heard in July 1884, when the Court doubted its competency, but intimated that they would allow it to stand on the roll with a view to the Society's being put into liquidation, when the case as it stood might perhaps be made available for the decision of the questions between the parties.

Accordingly, on 9th July, a petition was presented to the Court under the Companies Acts, 1862-1883, for a liquidation order, which was granted on 19th July, and an official liquidator appointed. The liquidator was conjoined with the trustees of the Society as a first party to the case.

The appellants Henry Tooh, George Guthrie, and Robert Finlay were respectively the sixth, seventh, and ninth parties to the special case.

The principal questions raised in the special case related (1) to the effect to be given to the circular of 13th May 1882 in suspending the operation of the rules as to the maturing of shares and the right of annually, at the end of November, and the profits of the year shall be ascertained, and, after setting aside a sum out of the same as a guarantee fund to meet any losses that may be sustained, divided equitably among the shares, and carried to the credit of each member's account in the Society's books, and also entered at the end of the members' pass-books; but, except to the extent stated in Rule 12, shall not form part of the funds that can be withdrawn from the Society until the shares are fully completed. . . ." This was the only rule which referred to losses.

No. 2.

July 30, 1886.
Tosh v. North
British Building
Society.

borrowing members to withdraw from the Society, and (2) the liability of borrowing members to contribute for losses sustained by the Society.

The sixth party (Tosh) originally held forty shares in the Society. In 1871 he obtained an advance of £1000 from the Society, being the nominal amount of his shares, in security of which he granted a bond and disposition in security. From time to time thirty-two of the shares were completed by the payment of instalments and the addition of profits till the amount at the credit of the shares was equal to £25 per share, and the Society thereupon discharged the bond to the extent of £800, being the nominal amount of the thirty-two shares. At 30th November 1882 there stood at the credit of the remaining eight shares the sum of £191, 19s. 1d., including profits allocated on these shares. Interest was paid on the £200 of the bond remaining undischarged up till Martinmas 1882, and on 6th December 1882 payment was made of £8, 0s. 11d. and thereby, as the sixth party contended, the remaining balance of his bond was paid. Had he continued to pay instalments regularly on the eight shares, in terms of Rule 3, the payments would have continued till June 1883. He maintained the affirmative of the first branch and the negative of the second branch of

Question 5. "Is the sixth party entitled to cease being a member of the Society, and to have his bond and disposition in security discharged in terms of Rule 27,* without any further payment, or is he liable to bear a share of the loss sustained by the Society in proportion to the sum standing at his credit on his shares at 11th April 1882, and, in any event, is he liable for interest on his bond up till June 1883?"

The seventh party (Guthrie) held fifty-six shares, taken out at different times, and had obtained advances of £600 and £400 against forty of these, for which he had granted bonds and dispositions in security in similar terms to those granted by the sixth party. On 27th April 1882 he gave intimation of his intention to withdraw from the Society "as regards the shares not yet fully matured," and of his desire to apply the sums at the credit of all his shares towards his bonds, and to pay up any balance that might thereafter be due by him to the Society. He maintained the affirmative of the first branch and the negative of the second branch of

Question 6. "Is the seventh party entitled to a discharge of his bonds, and to cease to be a member of the Society upon payment of the difference, if any, between the amount of his bonds, with interest thereon down to 27th April 1882, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, the amounts at the credit of (1) his sixteen earlier completed shares, with bank interest thereon, from the date of their completion, and (2) his forty later unmatured shares, with periodical interest on the amount of instalments from time to time paid on said shares at five per cent to 27th April 1882; or does he fall to bear a share of the losses of the Society in proportion

* Rule 27 was—"Any member who has given any property in security to the Society may, on giving three months' notice prior to the term of Martinmas or Whitsunday in any year, redeem the same, by renouncing the shares representing the advance made thereon, and paying the amount of said advance under deduction of the instalments paid in respect of the same, and interest thereon, and his interest in said Society, so far as said shares are concerned, shall cease; or, any member who has given any property in security to the Society may redeem the same, as above, by payment of the whole sum borrowed and other dues thereon, and retain his shares in the same manner as if no advance had been made in respect of said shares; . . . or when the subscriptions, with the share of profits, of any member who has received an advance, are equal to the amount of said advance, then the payments of said member, in respect of said shares on which the advance has been made, shall cease, and his connection with the Society in respect of the same shall terminate. . . ."

to the sum standing at his credit on his shares, or any of them, or in what other way is he to be settled with?" No. 2.

The ninth party (Finlay) was a borrowing member who had, on or about July 30, 1886, 16th May 1882, in compliance with the directors' suggestion contained in Tosh v. North British Building Society. the circular of 13th May 1882, sent notice of withdrawal of his shares, using for that purpose the printed form issued with the circular. But while taking that step for his protection quantum valeat he further intimated to the directors his desire to continue paying up his advance by instalments as formerly, under Rule 3. He maintained (1) that he was entitled to complete his shares by paying up the instalments remaining due, getting credit for all profits which had been allocated upon them, and that upon such completion he was entitled to have his bond discharged and to cease to be a member of the Society without any liability for its losses; (2) that while his instalments remained unpaid, he was not bound to pay the interest on the full amount of his advance, but was entitled to have it rebated to the extent of the reduction effected by the payment of previous instalments and by allotted profits; (3) that he was in no view liable to bear a share of the losses of the Society.

Question 8 accordingly was, "Is the ninth party, upon payment of instalments, amounting in cumulo to the difference between the sum at his credit on his shares, including profits allocated thereon, and the amount of his said advance, entitled to have his bond discharged; and is he liable, so long as any of said instalments remain unpaid, to pay to the Society interest at five per cent on the full amount of said advance, or is he entitled to have the said interest abated to the extent of the reduction effected on the principal sum due by previous instalments and allotted profits? Or does he fall to bear a share of the losses of the Society, in proportion to the sum standing at the credit of his shares at 11th April 1882?"

The Court of Session, on 14th July 1885, pronounced an interlocutor containing, inter alia, the following findings:—"In answer to query 5, find and declare that the sixth party is liable to bear a share of the loss sustained by the Society in proportion to the sum standing at the credit of his shares as at 11th April 1882: In answer to query 6, find and declare that so far as regards the seventh party's sixteen completed shares, he is entitled to be paid the instalments at his credit, with interest, in terms of rule 12th, without deduction, as soon as the funds of the Society permit, and in preference to all members whose shares were completed, or who gave notice of withdrawal subsequent to the date when the shares were completed; but so far as regards the other shares held by him, in respect of which the advances mentioned in article 24 of the case were made, he is liable to bear a share of the losses sustained by the Society in proportion to the sum standing at his credit on these shares as at 11th April 1882: . . . In answer to the 8th query, find and declare that the ninth party is liable to bear a share of the losses sustained by the Society, in proportion to the sum standing to the credit of his shares at 11th April 1882; that the power of withdrawal is limited to shares on which no advance has been made; and that the ninth party has no preference in respect of his intimation of withdrawal, and is liable to pay the balance due on his bond, and interest, at the term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after three months' notice by the liquidator. . . ."

The appellants maintained that the case was ruled by the decision in Brownlie v. Russell, 10 R. (H. of L.) 19, L. R., 8 App. Ca. 235. The Court below were in error in supposing that the advanced members in Brownlie's case did not share in profits.

The respondents admitted this, but contended that the present case was distinguishable from Brownlie's case on other grounds. (1) In

No. 2.

July 30, 1886.
Toah v. North
British Building Society.

Brownlie's case the building society was constituted under the Building Societies Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. c. 42), sec. 14 of which limited the liability of any member "in respect of any share upon which an advance had been made . . . to the amount payable thereon under any mortgage or other security or under the rules of the society." The Act 6 and 7 Will. IV. contained no such clause. (2) In the present case the loan transaction was an independent contract, and the debtor was bound to pay the full sum unless his shares had matured. In Brownlie's case the contracts were not separate; by the rules each instalment operated as a payment to account of the loan, and a back-letter had been granted binding the Society not to enforce payment of the loan so long as the instalments were regularly paid.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—The question in the present case is, whether the appellants, who are borrowing or advanced members of the respondents' Society, are entitled to redeem their securities and have their bonds discharged in terms of the rules of the Society, or are bound to remain members and bear a share of the losses sustained by the Society. The Court of Session held that they were liable to bear a share of the losses of the Society in proportion to the sums standing at their credit on their share.

The Society was established in 1868 under the Building Societies Act (6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 32). It was a building society constituted in the manner and for the purposes contemplated by that Act, and it had, according to its constitution, what are known as advanced and unadvanced members. All advances were to be made on the security of heritable property to the satisfaction of the directors, and to be made to members only. Provision is made by rule 12 for non-borrowing members withdrawing from the Society, and under rule 13 for their receiving payment on the completion of their shares. Provision is also made for borrowing members redeeming their property given in security to the Society under rule 27.

The Society carried on business, and for some years realised profits, which profits were dealt with in the manner provided for by rule 28 of the Society, to which I shall hereafter call attention, a certain portion of the profits, after setting aside a sum as a guarantee fund, being carried to the credit of each member of the Society. The Society after proceeding prosperously for some years sustained considerable losses, which absorbed the guarantee or reserve fund, and left a loss still unprovided for. In the year 1882 or prior to that year, that condition of things having been discovered by the directors, the Society ceased on the 13th of May 1882 to carry on business, and existed only for the purpose of settling the rights of its members. The Society had no liabilities to meet except its liabilities to its own members. But although the Society was found to be in that condition in 1882, and ceased carrying on business on the 13th of May of that year, no petition for winding up the Society was filed until the 9th of July 1884, on which petition a few days later a winding-up order was made.

Under these circumstances a special case was stated for the purpose of determining whether the rights claimed by the advanced or borrowing members were well founded. That special case was stated between the Society and its liquidator of the first part (although I should imagine that the liquidator, who is now among the respondents, was added at a later stage, for the special case was agreed upon before the order for winding up was made), and certain of its members, representing, as it was supposed, different interests and different states of fact, of the other parts. The Court of Session upon that special case pronounced an interlocutor, some parts of which are appealed against; of other parts of the interlocutor no complaint is made, and your Lordships' House have not to deal with them at all. The main complaint is this, that the Court of Session held, as I have stated, that the borrowing or advanced members were not entitled merely to complete the payments necessary for repaying their advances and then to cease to be members of the Society, but that they were bound not only to complete the payments for the purpose of redeeming their properties, but also to remain members for the purpose of bearing a portion of the losses. The ground of this decision of the Court of Session is thus stated in the judgment of Lord Shand,¹—"Under the rules of the present Society the borrowing members (rule 28) are entitled to have a share of the profits divided equitably among their shares—that is, allocated to their shares in the same way as such profits are allocated and credited to the shares of non-borrowing members, and that being so, it clearly follows that the borrowing members must bear their share of the losses. As already noticed, the Society's rules or contract do not contemplate losses. It is a settled rule or principle of law, however, that an agreement to share profits, nothing being said about losses, prima facie means an agreement to share losses, and that in the same ratio or proportion as the parties respectively have fixed with reference to the division of profits, unless there be some stipulation to a contrary effect. We are therefore of opinion that borrowing members, who were still indebted to the Society in any part of their advances on the 13th of May 1882, when the Society stopped, are liable to bear a share of the losses sustained by the Society in proportion to the sums standing at their credit respectively on their shares at the 11th of April 1882."

Now, the view there expressed appears to me to be in direct conflict with the judgment of your Lordships' House in the case of Brownlie v. Russell, March 9, 1883,² which was also the case of a building society very similar to the present. The very same argument was there addressed to your Lordships' House in favour of the advanced members being under an obligation to remain members for the purpose of bearing a portion of the losses, but in delivering his opinion in that case Lord Selborne thus expressed himself,—"This is not a joint stock company, still less is it a common law partnership, but it is a society of a special kind, formed and regulated under particular Acts of Parliament for special purposes. A fallacy which has pervaded much of the argument that has been offered to your Lordships in support of the appeal is, that because the members of this society are associated together for a common purpose, therefore there must in equity and in reason, and by implication from their contract, although not in terms expressed, be a right on the part of some of the members to hold all the others liable in contribution to them for any loss which in the actual state of things they may suffer. It appears to me that such a result cannot be arrived at by presumptions or inferences from the law relating to companies of a different kind, but that we must look at this particular contract." And again, Lord Bramwell in his judgment thus expresses himself,—"It is sought to qualify the rule in this way. 'True, you have paid instalments which would satisfy the claim of the society upon you to the extent of their amount, with interest upon them under that rule, were it not that the society has sustained losses, and the

No. 2.

July 30, 1886.
Tooh v. North
British Building
Society.

¹ 12 R. 1285.

² 8 App. Cas. 235, 10 R. (H. L.) 19.

No. 2.
 July 30, 1886.
*Toah v. North
 British Building Society.*

instalments which you have so paid must be taken to be attributable in part to those losses, and consequently you have not in reality and in substance paid so many instalments as you have nominally.' Now, that I understand to be the contention of the appellants. What is there in the rules to justify it? There is not one word in the rules about losses being borne either by the advanced or unadvanced members, and the only reason that can be given why the advanced members or anybody else should bear the losses is, that they are to have profits if there were any. So they will undoubtedly, but it does not follow from that that they are to bear losses. It might have been a reasonable stipulation to put in if they had thought of it, but either they did not think of it, or if they did think of it they did not consider that it was reasonable to put it in, and we cannot put it in upon some speculation that if they had thought of it they would have put it in."

That appears to me to shew that the ground upon which the Court of Session proceeded cannot be supported, inasmuch as your Lordships' House have decided that such a ground is not well founded. The Court of Session sought to distinguish the case now under consideration from Brownlie's case in this way. They said,—“These cases,” speaking of Brownlie's case and another case—The Scottish Property Investment Company v. Boyd, November 7, 1884, 12 R. 127, —“are to be distinguished from the present in this material respect, that the borrowing members in both cases were simply debtors to the society in the sums borrowed, and had no right and were not entitled to receive any share of the profits—Ibid. p. 1285.” Now, the answer to that suggested distinction is, that it is not well founded in point of fact. There was precisely the same right to share in profits in Brownlie's case as there is in the present case, and it was frankly admitted by the learned counsel who argued this case on behalf of the respondents that they could not support the distinction which the Court of Session had made between Brownlie's case and the case now before your Lordships. But it was open to them no doubt to support the judgment of the Court below if they could upon some other grounds than that upon which the case was rested by the judgment of the learned Judges who decided it. And this they have attempted to do. They have argued, as I understand, that there are three distinctions between the present case and Brownlie's case which are sufficient to differentiate it and to shew that the judgment ought to be different.

First, they say that the building society in Brownlie's case had been registered under the Statute of 1874, and was subject to its provisions, and that Lord Selborne placed reliance in that case upon the provision of section 14 in the Act of 1874, that “the liability of any member of any society under this Act in respect of any share upon which no advance has been made shall be limited to the amount actually paid or in arrear on such share.” No doubt it is true that distinction does exist, but I think that although the fact of that provision existing in the Act of 1874 was alluded to by Lord Selborne, it is impossible to read his judgment without seeing that it would have been precisely the same if the society had been registered only under the statute of William IV.

Next, it is said that in Brownlie's case, at the time when the securities and a bond with a condition for repayment of the advance made to him were given by the member to the society, a back-letter was given by the directors which provided that, notwithstanding that the bond and disposition in security is in the usual terms, “it is nevertheless understood that the same shall not be enforced by the directors and manager of the said society as long as the said James Russell shall continue the regular payment of the instalments, interest, and other sums to become due upon his said shares in terms of the rules of the said society." No. 2.

July 30, 1886.
Tooth v. North
British Building
Society.

It is perfectly true that in the present case there is no such back-letter, but I cannot see that this makes the slightest difference in the position of the parties. It was, I think, substantially admitted by Mr Cookson, in his argument on behalf of the respondents, that although the condition of the bond was in this case absolute, and there was no back-letter, yet it would not have been open to the Society, so long as the member continued to pay in accordance with the rules of the Society, to enforce payment of the bond any more than if there had been such a back-letter. I think that distinction therefore also fails.

But then it is said (and this no doubt is the point with most substance in it) that the matter must be determined after all by the rules of the Society, and that the rules of this Society differ from the rules which were the basis of the decision in Brownlie's case. Now, the rule in Brownlie's case with regard to a member withdrawing was the 12th rule, which provided that "it shall be lawful at all times for a member who has obtained an advance to withdraw from the society upon giving the manager one month's notice in writing, and paying up the whole of his debt, interests, and penalties after deducting the amount of the monthly instalments paid upon his shares, with interest thereon calculated at the rates referred to in rule 9." It is said, first, that in that case the provision was that there was to be deducted the amount of monthly instalments "paid upon his shares," and that this shewed that the payments which were made from time to time by the borrowing member upon his shares were payments made in repayment of the advance made to him, and other expressions in the rules are relied upon for the purpose of establishing that fact. Then, it is said that in the present case the payments made by the member as member in respect of his shares are not to be regarded as repayments of his advance; that the loan was under the rules of this Society to be treated as an entirely independent transaction, at all events down to the moment of the full amount having been paid, and that on the one hand he received the loan and made the payments of interest upon that loan, and on the other hand, he made payments quite independently upon his shares as a member of the Society, and that he was not entitled to claim when the Society was in difficulties and the winding-up came about that the payments which he had made as a member upon his shares were to be treated in any way as payments pro tanto in discharge of the loan.

Now, that renders necessary some examination of the rules of the Society. I am quite unable to concur in the view thus contended for. I think that, as was pointed out by the Solicitor-General, the Building Societies Act itself, without reference even to the rules, indicates the character of these advances and what is the position of an advanced member, and that in truth his position is, that he receives his share in advance, making repayments, whilst a non-advanced member is to receive his share ultimately and in the end. I may refer to the description of advanced and non-advanced members which is given by Lord Watson—and I think quite accurately—in his judgment in Brownlie's case. But when these rules are looked at it appears to me that this is undistinguishable from Brownlie's case. Rule 16 provides that "any member who has been granted an advance may, with the consent of the directors, transfer his or her right and interest therein to any other person along with the shares representing the same." What could shew more clearly than that the connection between

No. 2.

July 30, 1886.
Tosh v. North
British Building
Society.

the shares and the advance, and that the advance was an advance on the shares, and that the shares represented the advance!

In rule 26 the same provision is found,—“Any member who has received an advance may transfer his or her right and interest in the same to any other person, along with the shares representing the same,” and then the purchaser is to “pay on entry a transfer fee of two shillings and sixpence for each share represented by the property so transferred.”

Then when we come to rule 27, which is the most important rule that we have to deal with, we find it there provided that “any member who has given any property in security to the society may on giving three months’ notice prior to the term of Martinmas or Whitsunday in any year, redeem the same by renouncing the shares representing the advance made thereon, and paying the amount of said advance under deduction of the instalments paid in respect of the same.” Now, what are “the instalments paid in respect of the same”? These words mean—and it seems to me can only mean—the payments which have been made from time to time by the member on his shares; they are treated by this rule as instalments paid by the member in respect of his advance.

There appears to me therefore to be no substantial distinction between the rules of this Society and the rules of the society in Brownlie’s case, and I think therefore that the determination in Brownlie’s case determines the present case also. In Brownlie’s case it was held that after a winding-up an advanced member could not take advantage of the rule enabling him to withdraw, because his right to act under that rule ceased by reason of the order for winding-up, but it was held that the winding-up order created a kind of compulsory withdrawal of all the members who were at that time advanced members of the society, and compelled them to repay the amount which was still due upon their advances, but did not substantially alter their position or their rights or render them at all different from what they would have been if they had been withdrawing under the rules.

Now, my Lords, I proceed to the special points which are raised in the case of each of the appellants who have prosecuted this appeal before your Lordships, and I think it will be found when the facts are examined that this case is really a stronger case than the case of Brownlie v. Russell, inasmuch as in the present case it appears to me that the parties had strictly a right to withdraw under the rules of this Society, and had put themselves in a position to withdraw prior to any petition for winding-up being presented to the Court.

The first appellant, Tosh, if he had continued to pay his instalments pursuant to the rules, would in June 1883 have completed his payments, and the subscriptions with the share of the profits would have been equal to the amount of the advance. In such a case the third alternative in rule 27 provides that “when the subscriptions, with the share of profits of any member who has received an advance, are equal to the amount of said advance, then the payments of said member in respect of said shares on which the advance has been made shall cease, and his connection with the Society in respect of the same shall terminate. In the event of any property being redeemed or completed as aforesaid” (it would be a case of completion), “the deed granted in security thereof shall be duly discharged by a receipt.”

Now, upon the 6th of December 1882 Tosh paid to the Society the amount of £8, 0s. 11d., which was accepted by them, and which covered all the payments that fell to be made by him under the rules down to the following June.

If he had paid in the ordinary way by payments spread over the intervals down to the 3d of June 1883, he would have completed his payments in the very terms of the portion of rule 27 which I have just read. What was there to prevent his so completing his payments, and receiving by virtue of rule 27 all that the rule entitled him to receive in that event? There was no petition for winding up the Society at that time. There was nothing that I can see to affect his rights. He had done precisely what the rule provided for, and I cannot in the least see why he was not entitled to the benefit which the rule in that case gave him. It is said that although the subscriptions, with the share of the profits which had been credited to him from time to time, and which stood to his credit, together with this £8, were equal to the amount of the advance, nevertheless, the Society having made losses subsequently, you must deduct or take away profits which had been credited to him—that they were not really profits. I cannot concur in that view at all. They were profits—they are found by the case to have been profits really made, and properly credited to the shareholder year by year, of which, if at the close of any of those years he had chosen to retire, he would have been entitled to take the benefit. Under those circumstances it appears to me that when the payment of £8, Os. 11d. was made, or, at all events in June 1883, the time by which it ought to have been made, Tosh ceased to be liable to make any further payments, because his connection with the Society in respect of his shares had terminated.

No. 2.

July 30, 1886.
Tosh v. North
British Building
Society.

The next case is that of Guthrie. On the 27th of April 1882 Guthrie gave notice of his intention to withdraw from the Society as regards his shares, which were not fully matured—that is to say, the forty in respect of which he had received advances. What was there to prevent his doing so under the first alternative of rule 27? I can see nothing. It is true that a few days before that, the Society had ceased to carry on any fresh business; but it is not suggested that there were any outside creditors of this Society at all; the only question which arises is as to the rights of the members inter se. What was there on the 27th of April 1882 to prevent Guthrie giving his notice and getting his property redeemed in the very terms of rule 27? I can see nothing. Rule 27 provides that a member wishing to withdraw must give "three months' notice prior to the term of Martinmas or Whitsunday in any year." The notice therefore was too late of course for Whitsunday 1882, and I think that the right to redeem only arose at Martinmas 1882, and that the account must be taken upon that basis.

I turn now to the remaining case, the case of Finlay. Finlay gave notice to withdraw on the 16th of May 1882. I can see no distinction between his case and that of Guthrie, and I think that he too was entitled to redeem in terms of the first part of rule 27 at Martinmas 1882.

That disposes of all the questions raised in this case with the exception of a point which was indeed raised by the case but was abandoned by the Solicitor-General in the course of his opening on behalf of the appellants, namely, the question whether Finlay was entitled to continue the payments of his subscriptions under the rules notwithstanding the winding-up, and to have the benefit of a share of the profits, he having ceased to be a member under the latter part of rule 27. That point having been abandoned—and I think wisely abandoned—it is unnecessary to say anything more upon it.

LORD BLACKBURN.—A special case was stated in the Court of Session which

No. 2.

July 30, 1886.
Toah v. North
British Building Society.

expressly states that there were no outside creditors. I only mention that to shew that no question arises here, any more than it did in Brownlie's case, as to what might be the effect with regard to outside creditors, as I may call them, of the concern. That special case, as stated, asked eight or nine questions of the Court of Session, as to three of which the answers in the interlocutor have been appealed from. The appeal is confined to those three queries, and we have to see whether the interlocutor was right as to the answers to them.

Now, the ground upon which Lord Shand, who delivered the opinion of the Court of Session, puts the matter is this, that where according to his reasoning (I am not pretending to quote his words) a party is entitled to get profits, there on the principle "qui sentit commodum, sentire debet et onus," he ought to share the loss, and that that applies in such a case as this. Against that there was the decision in Brownlie's case, which Lord Shand held was not applicable to the present case, because, as he erroneously supposed, in Brownlie's case the decision in this House went upon the ground that Russell had never got any stipulation for profits at all. That was a mistake, and when the case of Brownlie is looked at, it is seen that it was expressly said that the question was not to be decided on the general maxim that he who shares the profit ought to bear a share of the loss, but depended upon what was the effect of the contract contained in all the rules of such a society as this. Now, in Brownlie's case it was held that the contract was such that the party was entitled not to withdraw from being a member, because the winding-up prevented that, but to redeem in the manner which the contract between the parties, evidenced by the rules, shewed.

That being so, the main ground upon which Lord Shand and the Court of Session went is, I think, not tenable. I do not mean to say that if it were res integra there might not be a great deal to be said in support of the opinion which he delivered, but it was distinctly decided by the House of Lords that that principle did not apply to the case of such a society as this, and that being so, we must consider that as decided, and as a fixed matter no longer open to be examined into at all. It was, however, said in the argument that though that was so, yet the actual contract made in this case was not the same as in Brownlie's case, because the rules were not identical. There was also a point made that the Acts were different, but I think that I need not mention that, because it has been quite answered by what has been said by the noble and learned Lord, the Lord Chancellor, in his judgment just delivered. Then there is the fact, no doubt, that the bond which was delivered in Brownlie's case had a back-letter attached to it, but I think that that makes no real difference. The advance which was made, whether under a bond, according to the English form of doing it, without any back-letter, or under a bond with a back-letter, was equally an advance made under the terms of the contract, whatever it was, arising from the rules.

Then it is said that the rules in this particular case are not identical with those in Brownlie's case, and I think that they are not identical, and if any of them did materially differ, it might make a difference in the contract which we are to apply to the particular case. All that your Lordships have now to deal with, and all that I have to deal with, are those three cases which are brought before us. I have not thought it necessary to look at the others, and when we look at those three cases we find that there is really no difference in the effect of the contract which arose from the rules.

Tosh's is the first case. I need not go through it; the Lord Chancellor No. 2. stated the effect of what had been done, and I quite agree that the answer as respects Tosh's case, called the sixth party in the Court below, was a mistaken July 30, 1886.
 answer, and that the interlocutor ought to be varied in the manner proposed Tosh v. North by the Lord Chancellor. Then comes Guthrie's case, who was the seventh British Build-party, as he was called in the special case. There is a part only of the inter- ing Society.
 locutor as regards him which is appealed against, and I agree that that should be altered in the manner which the Lord Chancellor proposes. Then comes the last case, namely, that relating to Findlay, which is the subject of the eighth query. A part of what was there appealed against has been given up. The whole of what was there appealed against has not to be altered, but a part has to be altered, and accordingly I think that the interlocutor ought to be varied in the way proposed.

LORD FITZGERALD.—I concur in the reasoning of the Lord Chancellor and in the amendments of the interlocutor which he proposes. I am the only member of the house now present who took part in the decision of Brownlie's case. That case was not disposed of immediately after the hearing of the argument. There was some novelty in it, and time was taken for consideration, and even more than ordinary care was applied to it. From the beginning of the argument in the present appeal I have thought that it was governed in every part by the decision of your Lordships' House in Brownlie v. Russell.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—The order will be that the costs of both parties be paid by the liquidator out of the Society's estates.

INTERLOCUTOR appealed from varied by omitting the answer to query 5 and substituting therefor the following words:—"In answer to query 5, find and declare that the sixth party is entitled to cease being a member of the Society, and to have his bond and disposition in security discharged in terms of rule 27, without any further payment, and that he is not liable to bear a share of the loss sustained by the Society in proportion to the sum standing at his credit on his shares at 11th April 1882"; by omitting so much of the answer to query 6 as is appealed against, and substituting therefor the following words:—"So far as regards the other shares held by him in respect of which the advances mentioned in art.
 24 of the case were made, he is entitled in terms of art. 27 to a discharge of his bonds, and to cease to be a member of the Society, upon payment of the difference between the amount of his bonds, with interest thereon down to Martinmas 1882, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, the amount of the instalments paid in respect of the shares, with interest on the amount of the instalments from time to time paid at 5 per cent to Martinmas 1882, and that he does not fall to bear a share of the losses of the Society in proportion to the sum standing to his credit on his shares"; and by omitting the answer to the eighth query and substituting the following:—"In answer to the eighth query, find and declare that the ninth party is entitled to have his bond discharged, and to cease to be a member of the Society, in terms of art. 27, upon payment of the difference between the amount of his bond with interest thereon down to Martinmas 1882, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, the amount of the instalments paid in respect of his shares, with interest on the amount of the instalments from time to time paid at 5 per cent to Martinmas 1882, and that he

No. 2.

July 30, 1886.
Tosh v. North
British Building Society.

does not fall to bear a share of the losses of the Society in proportion to the sum standing to his credit on his shares, but that he is not entitled to complete his shares by paying up the instalments which remain due thereon, getting credit for all profits which have been allocated upon his shares, and upon such completion to have his bond discharged and cease to be a member.

"The costs of all parties to this appeal to be paid out of the estate of the respondent Society."

DAVIDSON, BURCH, & Co.—MACKENZIE & BLACK, W.S.—LINDO & Co.—
DAVID TURNBULL, W.S.

No. 3.

Nov. 12, 1886.
Lanarkshire
(Lower Ward)
Road Trustees
v. Kelvinside
Estate Trustees.

THE COUNTY ROAD TRUSTEES OF THE COUNTY OF THE LOWER WARD OF LANARK (Second Parties), Appellants.—Sol.-Gen. Robertson, Q.C.—
Horace Davey, Q.C.

KELVINSIDE ESTATE TRUSTEES (First Parties), Respondents.

Road—Roads and Bridges Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. cap. 51), sec. 119—Maintenance of roads—Lighting.—Held (rev. judgment of Second Division) that sums raised by assessment under the Roads and Bridges Act, 1878, for "maintaining and repairing" roads, cannot be applied to light them.

Road—Transference of statutory obligations—Roads and Bridges Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. c. 51), sec. 32.—Held (in rev. judgment of Second Division) that sec. 32 of the Roads and Bridges Act, 1878, in providing that county road trustees to whom a road is thereby transferred shall be liable in all the debts, liabilities, claims, and demands, in which the trustees of such road "are or were liable under any general or local Act then in force," does not continue and transfer to the county road trustees the statutory powers and duties conferred and imposed by such prior Acts upon the trustees from whom the road is transferred, and that county trustees were not entitled to spend money raised by assessment for the maintenance of a road in lighting the same, although the trustees from whom the road had been transferred were bound to do so under a local Act.

Ld. Chancellor
(Halsbury).
Lord Blackburn.
Lord Watson.

(In the Court of Session, July 16, 1884, 11 R. 1097.)

In a special case presented to the Second Division the questions stated for the opinion of the Court were—"(1) Are the second parties bound to light the said Great Western Road? (2) Have the second parties power to expend funds raised by assessment under the powers of the Roads and Bridges Act, in lighting or contributing to light roads or parts of roads in localities where, from the extent of the traffic or other ordinary causes, such lighting may appear to them a proper precaution, with the view of avoiding the risk of accident, or otherwise desirable in the general interests of the public using the roads?"*

The Court answered both questions in the affirmative.

* Section 14 of the Great Western Road Act enacted,—"That it shall and may be lawful to and for the said trustees, and they are hereby authorised and empowered, to cause the said main line of road from Anniesland to St George's Road to be watched and lighted after sunset and during night, and to pay and defray the costs and charges thereof out of the tolls, rates, and duties, and other monies authorised to be levied and raised under and by virtue of this Act, on or for the said road herein authorised to be made."

Section 23 of the same Act enacted that the trustees under the Act "shall," inter alia, apply "the tolls to be levied as aforesaid towards the making, completing, and keeping in repair, and watching and lighting the said roads and bridges, and putting this Act into execution, and thereafter towards the payment of the interest of the sum or sums subscribed or to be subscribed, borrowed, and advanced under and by virtue of this and the said recited Act."

Section 32 of the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act enacted,—"From and after the commencement of the Act, the whole turnpike roads, statute-labour

The County Road Trustees of the county of the Lower Ward of Lanark, second parties, appealed. No. 3.

The trustees for the Kelvinside Estate, respondents, did not appear in the House of Lords.

Nov. 12, 1886.
Lanarkshire
(Lower Ward)
Road Trustees
v. Kelvinside
Estate Trustees.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—In this case the learned Judges in the Court below attached a significance to the words “maintenance and repair” which it seems impossible to maintain. The words “maintenance and repair” have been in use both in English and Scottish statutes for a very considerable period, and I am not aware that any contention has ever been urged that “maintenance and repair” include the duty of lighting. Lighting and Watching Acts which have been passed from time to time for particular localities are of a totally different character, throwing upon the persons who are immediately concerned in the preservation of the localities where the lighting and watching are to be maintained the obligation of maintaining them. Upon the general question, therefore, I must say, with very great respect for the Court below, I am unable to follow them in their judgment that the maintenance of lights is part of the “maintenance” of the roads. “Maintenance and repair of a road” are words which explain themselves without any difficulty at all. I am totally unable to concur in the view that the “maintenance and repair of the roads” vested in the trustees any power or duty or obligation of maintaining lighting; nor have they authority, indeed, to expend money raised for the purposes of “maintenance and repair” upon purposes entirely alien to that duty, although it may be very convenient and proper and necessary in particular places that the roads under their charge should be lighted.

With respect to the second question, it seems to me that it is equally clear. A road was in existence with particular duties and particular privileges attached to the persons who were the guardians of that road. Then came the general Act which swept the guardianship away, and swept away the power of raising the rates by which the then guardians were empowered to perform those particular duties which were cast upon them, and it threw upon the general law the guardianship of the maintenance and repair of that road. Then came natural and appropriate words to protect such persons as might have entered into rela-roads, highways, and bridges within each county respectively shall form one general trust, with such separate district management as shall be prescribed by the trustees as hereinbefore provided; and all the roads, bridges, lands, buildings, works, rights, interests, monies, property, and effects, rights of action, claims and demands, powers, immunities, and privileges whatever, except as hereinafter provided, vested in or belonging to the trustees of any such turnpike roads, statute-labour roads, highways, and bridges within the county, shall be, by virtue of this Act, transferred to or vested in the county road trustees appointed under this Act, who, subject to the qualifications hereinafter expressed, shall be liable in all the debts, liabilities, claims, and demands in which the trustees of such turnpike roads, statute-labour roads, highways, and bridges, are or were liable under any general or local Act then in force, except in so far as such debts, liabilities, claims, and demands may, under the provisions of this Act, be discharged, reduced, or extinguished.”

Section 119 of the Roads and Bridges Act enacted,—“All monies received by the trustees on account of assessments or penalties, or otherwise, for the application of which no special provision is made in this Act, shall be applied as follows,— . . . (2) In payment of the expense of maintaining and repairing the several highways.”

The second parties also referred to schedule C of the Act.

No. 3. tions with those guardians, giving those persons the same remedies against those whom I have described as the guardians of that road as they would have had but for the passing of that Act which so swept their powers and their duties away. But it seems to me to be a very violent construction of that Act to assume that the road trustees are, with reference to that particular road, to have any different duties or any different obligations from those which are cast upon them, with respect to the general roads of the country.

Nov. 12, 1886.
Lanarkshire
(Lower Ward)
Road Trustees
v. Kelvinside
Estate Trustees.

I am therefore of opinion, and I so move your Lordships, that the judgment of the Court below should be reversed, and judgment for the appellants entered accordingly.

LORD BLACKBURN concurred.

LORD WATSON.—I am bound, with all respect to the learned Judges who constituted the Second Division upon the hearing of this cause, to say that in my opinion the answer to neither of these questions is attended with any difficulty. Both ought, in my opinion, to be answered in the negative. As regards the first of them, it appears to me that the learned Judges have misconstrued the 32d section of the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878. The object and effect of the provisions of that clause are simply this, to save all collateral contracts, engagements, and liabilities which have been properly and lawfully created by virtue of the powers of any Act by the trustees who administered it. The intention of the section was not to keep up the statutory obligations as continuing obligations, or the statutory powers as continuing powers. If I could come to the same conclusion as the learned Judges, which I am altogether unable to do, I should also be compelled to come to the conclusion that the power to exact tolls was likewise kept up and carried forward, because it is only from that source that there is any statutory warrant for defraying the cost of lighting and watching.

As to the second question, I entirely agree with your Lordships that it is impossible to hold that lighting is included in the "maintenance and repair" of a road according to any reasonable construction of those terms. I do not say whether or not they might have been altered and expanded if there had been something in the context of the statute to shew that the Legislature did intend that the trustees should also light the roads. In that case there might have been some ground for coming to the conclusion of the Court below. But there is not the slightest indication that such was the intention of the Legislature. On the contrary, the powers which they have conferred upon, and the duties which they have given to, the new trustees under the Act of 1878, are so minute as to exclude, in my humble opinion, the supposition that the granting of any such power was intended.

THE HOUSE reversed the interlocutor of the Second Division, and found that the questions in the special case, which the Court of Session answered in the affirmative, ought to be answered in the negative.

GRAHAMES, CURREY, & SPENS—MACKENZIE & BLACK, W.S.

No. 4. JOHN WILLIAM BURNS, Pursuer (Appellant).—Sol.-Gen. Robertson, Q.C.—Rigby, Q.C.

Feb. 14, 1887. MRS MARY ANN MARTIN, Defender (Respondent).—Balfour, Q.C.—Rhind.

Burns v.
Martin.

Lease—Lease to two persons and the survivor—Respective heirs bound conjunctly and severally.—In a lease in favour of two persons and the survivor the tenants bound "themselves and their respective heirs, executors, and successors, all conjunctly and severally, renouncing the benefit of discussion, to pay " No. 4.

the rent to the landlord.

Held (in rev. judgment of Second Division) that on the death of one of the tenants his representatives became jointly and severally liable with the survivor for the rent till the termination of the lease. Feb. 14, 1887.
Burns v. Martin.

Police Commissioners of Dundee v. Straton, 11 R. 586, approved.

(In the Court of Session, 17th July 1885, 12 R. 1343.)

The pursuer appealed.

Ld. Herschell.
Lord Watson.

LORD HERSCHELL.—My Lords, during the argument of this case there were present my Lord Blackburn, my noble and learned friend on my left (Lord Watson), and myself. Lord Blackburn is unable to be present and to take part on this occasion, and accordingly an intimation was given to the parties that if they desired it the case might be re-argued, although all those who heard the argument agreed as to the judgment which ought to be delivered. The parties have expressed no such desire, but have prayed for the judgment of your Lordships' House, and under these circumstances there seems to be no difficulty in its being pronounced.

In this case the respondent was sued, as executrix of her deceased husband Hugh Martin, for two half years' fixed rent under a mineral lease granted by the appellant to William Logan and Hugh Martin for thirty-one years from Martinmas 1882.

The sole question, as it appears to me, is, whether upon the true construction of the covenant for payment of rent contained in the lease, the legal representative of a deceased lessee became liable for the rent accruing after his death?

The lease was granted to William Logan and Hugh Martin "and the survivor of them, but expressly excluding assignees and subtenants, whether legal or conventional." The covenant is in these terms,—“The said William Logan and Hugh Martin bind and oblige themselves and their respective heirs, executors, and successors, all conjunctly and severally, renouncing the benefit of discussion, to pay to the said John William Burns, his heirs and successors, and to his or their factor or agent, the sum of £200 sterling yearly for each of the first five years of this lease, and the sum of £250 sterling yearly thereafter during the currency of this lease in name of fixed rent or tack-duty, . . . for the privilege of working and disposing of the fire-clay in manner herein mentioned”; or in the option of the lessor a royalty on the output of the fire-clay instead of the fixed rent.

There can be no doubt, in view of the terms of the grant, that the interest of Hugh Martin under the lease ceased on his death, and that the entire interest then vested in William Logan as the survivor.

It has been contended by the respondents that on the true construction of the covenant all liability on the part of Hugh Martin or his representatives terminated at the date of his death.

The majority of the Judges of the Second Division of the Court of Session were of opinion that this contention was well founded, though they rested their judgment on another ground, to which I shall presently refer.

I confess that I approach the construction of the covenant with every inclination to take the same view. I am fully alive to the force of the argument that it is not to be expected that the representatives of the deceased lessee should be made equally liable with the survivor to the payment of the rent seeing that the entire benefit passes to him.

No. 4.
Feb. 14, 1887.
Burns v.
Martin.

But, after all, the case must be determined by a careful scrutiny of the language used, and by giving to that language its natural grammatical meaning. It is not an impossible or inconceivable bargain that each of the lessees should agree that his estate should remain liable for the rent notwithstanding that the lease enured to the benefit of the survivor. If the covenant had been fairly open to either construction, I should certainly have yielded to the argument of the respondent; but upon the best consideration I can give to the matter I cannot avoid the conclusion that the plain natural meaning of the words of the covenant is that the representatives of Hugh Martin became liable for payment of the rent after his decease. It is unnecessary for me to state in detail the considerations which have led me to this conclusion, as I have had the advantage of perusing the opinion of my noble and learned friend (Lord Watson), and I concur entirely with the reasons he has expressed. I think that, ignorant as we must necessarily be of the surrounding circumstances which might have explained the bargain and shewn that it was reasonable, we should be quite as likely to do injustice as justice if we were to depart from the natural construction of the language employed by the parties, because we thought the result unreasonable and such as was probably not intended. The only safe rule in cases like the present is a strict adherence to the view that the parties intended that which is the natural meaning of the language they have used. As this case involves a question of Scotch conveyancing, it is a great satisfaction to me to find that my noble and learned friend (Lord Watson), who is so well versed in such matters, and also two out of the four learned Judges who have had to consider the case, have arrived at the same conclusion to which I have felt myself compelled.

Placing the construction which I have expressed upon the covenant, the whole case is, in my judgment, disposed of in favour of the appellant.

The Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Young held that the appellant had put himself out of Court by the allegations contained in his third condescendence. That condescendence states that "the estates of William Logan were, on or about the 19th October 1883, sequestrated under the Bankruptcy Statutes, and thereupon the tenants' rights and liabilities in and under the said lease devolved wholly on the said Hugh Martin, who accordingly made payment to the pursuer of the fixed half year's rent due in terms thereof at the term of Martinmas 1883, and worked and manufactured the said fire-clay, and carried on the said business as alone interested therein, and in the subjects let by the said lease."

To this condescendence the answer was as follows:—"Admitted that W. Logan's estate was sequestrated on the 19th October 1883. Admitted that the Martinmas 1883 rent was paid by Mr Martin. Quoad ultra denied. The clause of the lease regarding bankruptcy is in these terms:—"It is hereby specially provided and declared that if the second parties, or either of them, or their foressaids, shall become bankrupt, or if sequestration shall be awarded against them or either of them, . . . this lease shall, in the option of the first party or his foressaids, become ipso facto void and null."

Upon the statement of the pursuer in his third condescendence, that on Logan's bankruptcy and sequestration the tenants' rights and liabilities under the lease devolved wholly on Hugh Martin, Lord Young observes that this necessarily implies that the pursuer as landlord deprived Logan and the trustee in his bankruptcy of all rights, and freed them from all liabilities under the lease, which he was entitled to do by reason of the bankruptcy and sequestration. He then proceeds,—“But if Logan and his trustees were thus deprived of all rights, and freed of all liabilities as from the 19th of October 1883, Logan could not by his survivance become tenant on Martin's death three months after, in January 1884. It follows clearly, and indeed necessarily, that the defender cannot be liable or bound for rents due by Logan since Martin's death." No. 4.

Feb. 14, 1887.
Burns v.
Martin.

I am quite unable to concur in this reasoning. Even if the allegations in the condescendence had been admitted by the defender, I do not think that the conclusion arrived at by Lord Young would have followed. The allegation that on Logan's bankruptcy the tenant's right and liabilities under the lease devolved on Martin, I construe as stating the legal effect of the sequestration, and not as alleging any matter of fact, and when the terms of the lease are looked at, it is clear that the allegation was not well-founded. The only effect of the sequestration was to give an option to the lessor to make the lease void and null. It is clear that he did not avail himself of this option, and it is not alleged that he did. And I cannot see how an erroneous allegation of this description can alter the rights either of Logan or the pursuer. But the defender denied the allegation, and no doubt rightly denied it. Under these circumstances I am, with deference to the learned Judges who have taken a different view, at a loss to understand how the pursuer, if otherwise entitled to recover, could be deprived of that right by reason of an erroneous allegation, denied by the defender, the issue on which would therefore have to be found in favour of the defender, but if so found would establish no bar to the pursuer's claim.

I think that the judgment of the Court below should be reversed, and the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary of the 12th of March 1885 restored, and that the respondent should pay the costs in the Court below, and of this appeal, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

LORD WATSON.—By a lease executed in February 1883 the appellant let the seams of fire-clay in part of his estate of Cumbernauld for thirty-one years from Martinmas 1882 to "William Logan and Hugh Martin, and the survivor of them," assignees and subtenants, whether legal or conventional, and also managers, being expressly excluded, except with the written consent of the lessor. The tenants are empowered to renounce the lease upon giving intimation by registered letter to the lessor six months previous to the term of Martinmas 1887, or previous to any term of Martinmas thereafter at which any subsequent consecutive period of five years shall expire. In the event of the tenants or either of them becoming bankrupt, or of their estates being sequestrated, it is provided that the lease shall, in the option of the lessor, become void and null.

William Logan's estates were sequestrated on the 19th of October 1883, and Hugh Martin died on the 5th of January 1884. The half year's fixed rent of £100 falling due at Martinmas 1883 was paid by Martin. The respondent is the sole accepting trustee and executrix under Hugh Martin's deed of settlement, and the present action was brought against her in that character by the appellant for payment of two half years' rents which became due at the terms of Whitsunday and Martinmas 1884.

It was assumed in the arguments addressed to your Lordships, and it does not appear to me to admit of doubt, that by the conception of the lease Logan and Martin are made joint tenants during their joint lives; that on the predecease of one of them the survivor becomes the sole tenant; and that on the survivor's decease the right of tenancy devolves upon his heir of line. Accordingly William Logan on the death of Martin became, and now is, sole tenant

No. 4.

Feb. 14, 1887.
Burns v.
Martin.

under the lease unless his right has been in some way determined. The appellant's case is, that Martin's heirs and executors, although they have no interests as tenants, remain liable for rent during the currency of the lease; whereas the respondent maintains that by the terms of the lease the liability of the predecessor's representatives is limited to rents which accrued during his lifetime.

The Lord Ordinary (Trayner) gave the appellant decree in terms of the conclusions of his summons, but the Second Division of the Court recalled his interlocutor, ordained the respondent to pay £30, 2s. 8d. sterling, being the proportion of fixed rent for the period between Martinmas 1883 and the date of Hugh Martin's death, and quoad ultra assolizied. Lord Rutherford Clark dissented from the judgment. The Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Young, who constituted the majority of the Court, indicated their opinion that the heirs and executors of Hugh Martin were not liable for rents becoming due after his death, but they rested their decision upon the ground that the appellant had judicially admitted that the lease came to an end by the sequestration of Logan, and consequently that after the death of Martin there was no longer any tenant liable for rent.

The averments which the learned Judges treated as a judicial admission to the foregoing effect are in these terms,—“Thereupon” (i.e., upon the sequestration of William Logan's estates) “the tenants' rights and liabilities devolved wholly on the said Hugh Martin, who accordingly made payment to the pursuer of the fixed half year's rent due in terms thereof at the term of Martinmas 1883, and worked and manufactured the said fire-clay and carried on the said business as alone interested therein, and in the subjects let by said lease.” That is plainly an erroneous statement of the law, because Logan's sequestration could not affect his position as tenant unless the appellant exercised his option of putting an end to the whole lease, which he admittedly never did. Even if the statement were accepted as correct, I do not think it could bear the construction which was put upon it by the majority of the Court. Its import appears to be, that on his sequestration Logan's interest in the lease came to an end, and that the whole rights and liabilities of tenants passed to Martin. If the interest of Logan had been thus extinguished, and the exclusive right to the lease had thereupon vested in Martin, his heir would have become the tenant on his death, and in that event the respondent did not dispute that his estate would have continued liable for the rent. But the respondent meets the statement with an explicit denial, and had it been as favourable to her case as the learned Judges thought it was, I venture to doubt whether the respondent would have been entitled, without an amendment of the record, to found upon a statement which she denies, as a judicial admission in her favour.

The clause of obligation for payment of rent is in these terms,—“The said William Logan and Hugh Martin bind and oblige themselves, and their respective heirs, executors, and successors, all conjunctly and severally, renouncing the benefit of discussion, to pay to the said John William Burns, his heirs and successors, and to his or their factor or agent, in his or their names, the sum of £200 sterling for each of the first five years of this lease, and the sum of £250 sterling thereafter during the currency of this lease, in name of fixed rent or tack-duty,” or in the option of the lessor, a royalty on the output of fire-clay instead of the fixed rent.

I think it was rightly argued for the respondent that according to the law of Scotland it must be presumed that an obligation to pay rent is only meant to attach to those persons who are for the time being in right of the lease as tenants. In Skene v. Greenhill, May 20, 1825, 4 S. 25, a tenant who had expressly bound himself, "his heirs, executors, and successors," for payment of the rent, assigned the lease with the assent of the landlord, and it was held that the cedent and his representatives were under no obligation to pay rents becoming due after the assignee entered into possession. A tenant may, however, engage that he and his representatives shall remain bound along with his successors in the lease, and if he contracts in terms which, according to their just construction, imply that he has undertaken that responsibility to the lessor, the stipulation must receive effect. Had the obligation in Skene v. Greenhill been laid upon the tenant, and his heirs, executors, and successors, "all conjunctly and severally," I think the decision would have been different, because in that connection the words which I have added, "all conjunctly and severally," plainly import that the tenant and his representatives are to remain liable for rent along with persons succeeding to the lease as assignees. In the case of The Police Commissioners of Dundee v. Straton, February 24, 1884, 11 R. 586, an original fœnar bound and obliged "himself, and his heirs, executors, and successors, conjunctly and severally," for the prestations of the feu, and the First Division of the Court decided that, after the feu had been transmitted to a singular successor, the original vassal and his estate continued to be liable to the superior for these prestations. In my opinion the same words which in a feu-right are sufficient to imply that the original vassal and his representatives are to remain liable in perpetuity, notwithstanding their having ceased to possess any interest in the feu, must, when they occur in a lease, be equally effective to bind the original tenant and his representatives for the terms of its endurance although they have ceased to be tenants. It was suggested by the respondent's counsel that The Police Commissioners of Dundee v. Straton was not well decided, and ought to be re-considered; but I am unable to see that the Court could have arrived at any other decision in that case, unless they had refused to attribute their ordinary meaning to the words "conjunctly and severally." The presumption that liability for rent is confined to those having the tenants' interest is, however, so strong that if it be doubtful to what persons "conjunctly and severally" apply, those words must be read as exclusively applicable to the tenant for the time being and his representatives.

The present case seems to me to depend upon the application which ought to be given to the words "all conjunctly and severally, renouncing the benefit of discussion," as these occur in the clause of obligation for rent. Do they unite in one common obligation all the parties enumerated, or must they be read distributively, and as applying separately to the heirs, executors, and successors of Logan, and the heirs, executors, and successors of Martin? In the one view the representatives of Martin are liable for the rent as long as the lease endures, in the other they are not liable for rents becoming due after the death of Hugh Martin, unless the tenant is his heir or assignee.

In my opinion the words "renouncing the benefit of discussion" may be treated as surplusage, because persons who are bound conjunctly and severally cannot plead the beneficium ordinis. It was argued that the words, though in that sense superfluous, are nevertheless officious as indicating that a common obligation was only to attach to such heirs, executors, and successors as were subject inter se to the rule of discussion; and that inasmuch as the rule had no application between the representatives of Logan and the representatives of Martin,

No. 4.

Feb. 14, 1887.

Burns v. Martin.

No. 4.

Feb. 14, 1887.
Burns v.
Martin.

under the lease unless his right has been in some way determined. The appellant's case is, that Martin's heirs and executors, although they have no interests as tenants, remain liable for rent during the currency of the lease; whereas the respondent maintains that by the terms of the lease the liability of the predecessor's representatives is limited to rents which accrued during his lifetime.

The Lord Ordinary (Trayner) gave the appellant decree in terms of the conclusions of his summons, but the Second Division of the Court recalled his interlocutor, ordained the respondent to pay £30, 2s. 8d. sterling, being the proportion of fixed rent for the period between Martinmas 1883 and the date of Hugh Martin's death, and quoad ultra assoilzied. Lord Rutherford Clark dissented from the judgment. The Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Young, who constituted the majority of the Court, indicated their opinion that the heirs and executors of Hugh Martin were not liable for rents becoming due after his death, but they rested their decision upon the ground that the appellant had judicially admitted that the lease came to an end by the sequestration of Logan, and consequently that after the death of Martin there was no longer any tenant liable for rent.

The averments which the learned Judges treated as a judicial admission to the foregoing effect are in these terms,—“Thereupon” (i.e., upon the sequestration of William Logan's estates) “the tenants' rights and liabilities devolved wholly on the said Hugh Martin, who accordingly made payment to the pursuer of the fixed half year's rent due in terms thereof at the term of Martinmas 1883, and worked and manufactured the said fire-clay and carried on the said business as alone interested therein, and in the subjects let by said lease.” That is plainly an erroneous statement of the law, because Logan's sequestration could not affect his position as tenant unless the appellant exercised his option of putting an end to the whole lease, which he admittedly never did. Even if the statement were accepted as correct, I do not think it could bear the construction which was put upon it by the majority of the Court. Its import appears to be, that on his sequestration Logan's interest in the lease came to an end, and that the whole rights and liabilities of tenants passed to Martin. If the interest of Logan had been thus extinguished, and the exclusive right to the lease had thereupon vested in Martin, his heir would have become the tenant on his death, and in that event the respondent did not dispute that his estate would have continued liable for the rent. But the respondent meets the statement with an explicit denial, and had it been as favourable to her case as the learned Judges thought it was, I venture to doubt whether the respondent would have been entitled, without an amendment of the record, to found upon a statement which she denies, as a judicial admission in her favour.

The clause of obligation for payment of rent is in these terms,—“The said William Logan and Hugh Martin bind and oblige themselves, and their respective heirs, executors, and successors, all conjunctly and severally, renouncing the benefit of discussion, to pay to the said John William Burns, his heirs and successors, and to his or their factor or agent, in his or their names, the sum of £200 sterling for each of the first five years of this lease, and the sum of £250 sterling thereafter during the currency of this lease, in name of fixed rent or tack-duty,” or in the option of the lessor, a royalty on the output of fire-clay instead of the fixed rent.

I think it was rightly argued for the respondent that according to the law of Scotland it must be presumed that an obligation to pay rent is only meant to attach to those persons who are for the time being in right of the lease as tenants. In Skene v. Greenhill, May 20, 1825, 4 S. 25, a tenant who had expressly bound himself, "his heirs, executors, and successors," for payment of the rent, assigned the lease with the assent of the landlord, and it was held that the cedent and his representatives were under no obligation to pay rents becoming due after the assignee entered into possession. A tenant may, however, engage that he and his representatives shall remain bound along with his successors in the lease, and if he contracts in terms which, according to their just construction, imply that he has undertaken that responsibility to the lessor, the stipulation must receive effect. Had the obligation in Skene v. Greenhill been laid upon the tenant, and his heirs, executors, and successors, "all conjunctly and severally," I think the decision would have been different, because in that connection the words which I have added, "all conjunctly and severally," plainly import that the tenant and his representatives are to remain liable for rent along with persons succeeding to the lease as assignees. In the case of The Police Commissioners of Dundee v. Straton, February 24, 1884, 11 R. 586, an original feuar bound and obliged "himself, and his heirs, executors, and successors, conjunctly and severally," for the prestations of the feu, and the First Division of the Court decided that, after the feu had been transmitted to a singular successor, the original vassal and his estate continued to be liable to the superior for these prestations. In my opinion the same words which in a feu-right are sufficient to imply that the original vassal and his representatives are to remain liable in perpetuity, notwithstanding their having ceased to possess any interest in the feu, must, when they occur in a lease, be equally effective to bind the original tenant and his representatives for the terms of its endurance although they have ceased to be tenants. It was suggested by the respondent's counsel that The Police Commissioners of Dundee v. Straton was not well decided, and ought to be re-considered; but I am unable to see that the Court could have arrived at any other decision in that case, unless they had refused to attribute their ordinary meaning to the words "conjunctly and severally." The presumption that liability for rent is confined to those having the tenants' interest is, however, so strong that if it be doubtful to what persons "conjunctly and severally" apply, those words must be read as exclusively applicable to the tenant for the time being and his representatives.

The present case seems to me to depend upon the application which ought to be given to the words "all conjunctly and severally, renouncing the benefit of discussion," as these occur in the clause of obligation for rent. Do they unite in one common obligation all the parties enumerated, or must they be read distributively, and as applying separately to the heirs, executors, and successors of Logan, and the heirs, executors, and successors of Martin? In the one view the representatives of Martin are liable for the rent as long as the lease endures, in the other they are not liable for rents becoming due after the death of Hugh Martin, unless the tenant is his heir or assignee.

In my opinion the words "renouncing the benefit of discussion" may be treated as surplusage, because persons who are bound conjunctly and severally cannot plead the beneficium ordinis. It was argued that the words, though in that sense superfluous, are nevertheless officious as indicating that a common obligation was only to attach to such heirs, executors, and successors as were subject inter se to the rule of discussion; and that inasmuch as the rule had no application between the representatives of Logan and the representatives of Martin,

No. 4.

Feb. 14, 1887.

Burns v. Martin.

No. 4.
Feb. 14, 1887.
Burns v.
Martin.

it must have been the intention of the parties to the lease to impose a separate conjunct obligation upon each class. That argument appeared to me to be completely met by the appellant's counsel, who pointed out that the rule as to discussion, if not excluded, obtains not only between heir and executor, but between an actual tenant and those persons who, having no interest as tenants, are bound along with him for rent, all such persons being mere cautioners in any question with the tenant.

I have been unable to resist the conclusion that by the terms of the clause of obligation each and all of the parties therein mentioned are made conjunctly and severally liable for rent, irrespective of their interests, during the subsistence of the lease. I agree with Lord Rutherford Clark and the Lord Ordinary in thinking that the meaning of the clause is really not doubtful, and that there is no such ambiguity in its language as to entitle the respondent to the benefit of the presumption that only William Logan, the tenant, and his representatives are to be responsible for future rents.

The only term in the clause which appears to me to be capable of suggesting a construction favourable to the respondent is the word "respective" upon which much stress was laid in the argument on her behalf. If the expression used had been "their heirs, executors, and successors," it was hardly contended that the respondent could have escaped from liability. But it was argued that the word "respective" is used to mark a separation between the two classes of representatives; and consequently that the clause ought to be read in the same way as if William Logan had bound himself and his heirs, executors, and successors, all conjunctly and severally, and Hugh Martin had in like manner bound himself and his heirs, executors, and successors, all conjunctly and severally. Logan and Martin begin however by binding "themselves" conjunctly and severally, and the word "respective" appears to me to be introduced, not for the purpose of separating the obligees into two classes, but for the purpose of indicating that the obligation common to both classes was imposed by each of them upon his own representatives, which was all that he had power to do. Then the introduction of the word "all" before "conjunctly and severally" makes it clear, in my opinion, that the two original tenants, and their heirs, executors, and successors, were each and every one of them to be equally liable for rent to the lessor so long as the lease endured.

Lord Young in giving judgment expressed an opinion that the appellant's abstaining from the exercise of his right to void the lease, and his retention of an undischarged bankrupt who was not in possession as his tenant would constitute an inequitable and unconscionable device for exacting rent from the respondent, who has no beneficial interest in the lease, and can obtain no consideration for the rent which she pays. None of the other Judges have expressed any opinion upon that point, but I think it right to say that I cannot agree with Lord Young. Martin may have made an improvident contract, but he and his representatives are not the less bound to perform the obligations which he undertook. The respondent, as representing him both in heritage and moveables, is liable for rent till the end of the lease, but it does not necessarily follow that she must continue to pay rent until the term of Martinmas 1913. It appears from the appellant's averments on record that Logan is not possessing as tenant under the lease, and is making no claim for possession. As against Logan the respondent has all the right of a cautioner, and in that position of matters Logan is bound either to relieve the respondent at once of the rents which she may have to pay, or to exercise the power which the contract gives him of renouncing the lease at Martinmas 1887. If Logan when duly required refuses or delays to do one or other of these things, I do not think his wrongful failure to renounce would justify the appellant in exacting rent from the respondent after that term.

No. 4.
Feb. 14, 1887.
Burns v.
Martin.

I therefore concur in the judgment which has been moved by my noble and learned friend.

THE HOUSE reversed the decision of the Second Division, and restored that of the Lord Ordinary, with costs.

GRAHAMER, CURREY, & SPENS—J. & J. ROSS, W.S.—SMITH, FAWDON, & LOW—
R. PASLEY STEVENSON, S.S.C.

JAMES AULD, Pursuer (Appellant).—Rhind—R. Wallace.

THE GLASGOW WORKING-MEN'S PROVIDENT INVESTMENT BUILDING SOCIETY, Defenders (Respondents).—Sir H. Davcy, Q.C.—Haldane.

No. 5.

Feb. 15, 1887.
Auld v. Glas-

Building Society—Unadvanced member—Withdrawal—Power of society to reduce sum at the credit of unadvanced members.—The rules of a building society provided that each member should be furnished with a pass-book in which all payments made by him should be entered; that any unadvanced or investing member might withdraw "the whole or any portion of the sum at his credit," twenty-eight days after having given notice of his intention to do so and after having left his pass-book at the office, such withdrawing member to be paid in rotation according to the priority of his notice; and that a general meeting of the members should be held annually in March or April, at which a report and statement of accounts, with a balance-sheet for the year ending 18th February preceding, should be submitted.

gow Working-
Men's Provident Investment Building
Society.

At the annual general meeting of the society, held on 29th March 1882, the society approved of a report by the directors recommending that in consequence of the depreciation of the heritable property on the security of which the funds of the society were invested, a sum of 7s. 6d. per £1 should be deducted from the accounts of all shareholders and placed to a suspense account.

In a question between the society and an investing member, who, after the meeting, gave notice of withdrawal, held (rev. judgment of Second Division) that the rules of the society constituted a contract between the society and each member which the Society had no power to alter, and that the resolution of the society was in breach of the contract and ultra vires, and that the member who had given notice of withdrawal was entitled to receive payment of the sum standing at his credit at the date of the resolution, without deduction of any sum on account of the society's losses.

(In the Court of Session, 16th July 1885, 12 R. 1320.)

At a meeting of the directors of the Glasgow Working-Men's Provident Investment Building Society (a society incorporated under the Building Societies Act, 1874), held on 1st December 1881, a statement was read shewing that a large proportion of the unadvanced or investing members had applied for payment of the amount at their credit, and (as the minute of the meeting bore) the Society having been reduced in extent to nearly one-half, and it being thought unfair that those shareholders who remained in should bear the whole risk of loss, it was resolved to recommend to the shareholders to set aside a sum to meet any such risk, and thereby retain from shareholders withdrawing a contribution thereto, and with that view it was agreed to have the properties on which the Society had lent money valued by a neutral valuator.

Ld. Chancellor
(Halsbury).
Ld. Bramwell.
Ld. Herschell.
Lord Mac-
naghten.

Mr Binnie, the valuator chosen, reported that the total estimated depreciation in the value of the Society's security subjects was £8487, 10s. From this there was to be deducted £1592, 5s. 3d. at the credit of the reserve fund, and £389, 12s. at the credit of the profit and loss account;

No. 5. the net deficiency being thus £6505, 18s. 9d., to meet which the directors in their report to the Society "for the safety of the shareholders remaining in the Society, and as a prudent step of management," recommended "that a sum of 7s. 6d. per £1 be deducted from all shareholders' accounts (exclusive of sums paid in since 18th February 1881) and placed to a suspense account."

Feb. 15, 1887.
Auld v. Glasgow Working-
Men's Provident Investment Building
Society.

At the annual general meeting of the Society, on 29th March 1882, the Society approved by a majority of the report of the directors.

On 8th May following James Auld, an investing member, intimated his withdrawal from the Society, and twenty-eight days thereafter (in terms of the rules) claimed £97, 2s. 8d., as being the amount standing at his credit as a member of the Society. The Society declined to pay £97, 2s. 8d., but offered £60, 14s. 2d., being £97, 2s. 8d. under deduction of the 7s. 6d. per £1 which the Society had resolved to deduct from the investing shareholders' accounts.

In consequence Auld, in May 1884, brought an action in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire against the Society for payment of £97, 2s. 8d.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia, that the alleged resolution of 29th March 1882 was ultra vires and illegal.

The defenders pleaded ;—(2) The rules of the said Society containing no provision to meet the case of a depreciation of its assets, the resolution to reduce the amounts at the credit of the members by 7s. 6d. per pound was in the circumstances a necessary and proper resolution to be passed, with a view to distributing the loss the Society had sustained equitably amongst the members, in conformity with the general principles of the law of partnership. (3) The said resolution having been duly passed at a properly constituted meeting of the Society, is binding on all the members thereof.

A proof was allowed. The rules of the Society, in so far as founded on, are given below.* The pursuer held ten £10 shares of the Society. His

* Rule 3.—"The liability of any member of the Society in respect of any share upon which no advance has been made is limited to the amount actually paid or in arrear upon such share ; and in respect of any share upon which an advance has been made, shall be limited to the amount payable thereon under any bond or other security granted to the Society, or under these rules."

Rule 8.—"Each member shall be furnished with . . . a pass-book, in which all payments shall be entered and initialed by such person at the head office as may be authorised to receive the money ; and these entries so initialed shall be binding on the Society."

Rule 10.—"Withdrawal of members and payment of interest.—Any member holding a share or shares upon which no advance has been made, may withdraw the whole or any portion of the sum at his credit, twenty-eight days after he shall have given notice of his intention to do so, and left his pass-book at the office. On funds being realised, such members shall be paid in rotation according to the priority of their notices, and interest shall be allowed at the rate of four per cent per annum, or such other rate as may be fixed from time to time by the directors, from the last division of profits up to the date of such notice. On withdrawing in full, the pass-book shall be given up. . . ."

Rule 12.—"Payment of realised shares.—Members shall be entitled to receive payment of their shares when realised, as the funds of the Society permit, in rotation, according to the dates of their application therefor, provided no unpaid advance has been made thereon ; and the Society shall be entitled at any time after the shares have been realised to pay them off."

Rule 15.—"Every member, as the funds or arrangements of the Society permit, shall be entitled to an advance corresponding in amount to the ultimate value of the shares held by him, provided always" adequate security is offered, &c.

Rule 20.—"Members to whom advances have been allocated may continue pass-book shewed £97, 2s. 8d. at his credit on 18th February 1881, and no sum in respect of the 7s. 6d. had been deducted in the pass-book when he left it at the office (in terms of Rule 10) on intimating his withdrawal. At the date of the action it bore that £36, 8s. 6d. had been deducted, leaving £60, 14s. 2d. at the pursuer's credit. The deduction was also made in the Society's ledger. These alterations were made, as explained by Mr Rennie, the secretary of the Society, a few days after the general meeting. The entries in the pass-book consisted of sums in name of the weekly instalments due by the pursuer, and of interest, which last was credited pro tanto as instalments. The balance-sheet of the Society for the year ending 18th February 1882 was not corrected so as to include the suspense account resolved to be created, the total amount paid up on their shares by the investing members appearing under the head of liabilities, without deduction. In the balance-sheet for the following year (ending 18th February 1883) a suspense account of £7817, 1s. 8d. was entered under the head of liabilities, the sums credited to the investing members being correspondingly reduced, while on the side of assets the total advances on heritable securities were stated at their full, and not at their depreciated, amount (as estimated). Some of the evidence was directed to shew the soundness of Mr Binnie's estimate. From a statement appended to the report for 18th February 1883 it appeared that he had overestimated the depreciation by £387. It was admitted that if the pursuer was entitled to payment in full, the Society were in a position to make such payment at the date when the action was raised.

No. 5.

Feb. 15, 1887.
Auld v. Glasgow Working-
Men's Provident Investment Building
Society.

On 19th February 1885 the Sheriff-substitute (Lees) pronounced an interlocutor by which, after findings in fact, he found as matter of law that the resolution of 29th May 1882 was not habile to deprive the pursuer of his rights, as a shareholder of the Society, under the rules then in force, and therefore repelled the defences, and decerned against the defenders for payment to the pursuer of £97, 2s. 8d., with expenses.

On appeal the Second Division pronounced the following interlocutor:— “Find in fact that the defenders, at their annual general meeting held on to hold their shares, or the value thereof may be applied to the account of the advances.”

Rule 21.—“Advances shall be repayable by instalments in such number, not exceeding twenty-one, as may be arranged. . . . Every member to whom an advance has been made omitting to pay his subscription within one month after it falls due shall be charged at the rate of one penny per month for each payment on account of a £10 share,” &c.

Rule 44.—“General Meetings.—A general meeting of the members shall be held annually, in the month of March or April, for ordinary business, and a report and statement of accounts, with a balance-sheet for the year ending 18th February preceding, shall be submitted; such report and balance-sheet having been previously printed, and a copy sent to each member four days at least before the meeting. . . .”

Rule 45 contained certain regulations for the calling of special meetings.

Rule 49.—“Appropriation of surplus.—If, at the annual balances, a surplus profit remains after providing for expenses of management and interest on the accounts of investing members and depositors, such surplus shall be carried to the account of a general reserve or guarantee fund, which fund shall be available for the purpose of the Society at the discretion of the executive committee, and any surplus funds may be invested in accordance with the 25th section of the Building Societies Act, 1874.”*

* There was no other rule regarding profits. It was the practice of the Society to divide profits, if any, at the end of each year among the investing members proportionately to their capital.

No. 5.

Feb. 15, 1887.
Auld v. Glasgow Working-
Men's Provident Investment Building
Society.

29th March 1882, approved of a report by the directors recommending that in consequence of the depreciation of the heritable property on the security of which the funds of the Society were invested, a sum of 7s. 6d. per pound should be deducted from the accounts of all the shareholders and placed to a suspense account, and that the defenders accordingly made a corresponding deduction from the sums standing in the books of the Society at the credit of the shareholders, thereby reducing the sum standing at the credit of the pursuer from £97, 2s. 8d. to £60, 14s. 2d., which sum the defenders are willing to pay: Find in law that the deduction was validly made: Therefore sustain the appeal: Recall the interlocutor of Sheriff-substitute appealed against: dismiss the action," &c.

The pursuer appealed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—In this case I confess I am unable to share the doubts which appear to have existed in the minds of the learned Judges in the Court of Session.

This contract between the parties is a contract to be judged of by the ordinary rules, and the society or association which has made this contract with one of its members is precisely in the same contractual relation with its member as if it was with a stranger. The association itself is what it is. It is not a partnership at common law; it is not a joint stock company. Associations of this character have been under the consideration of your Lordships' House before.¹ The result of those simple propositions is this, that the pursuer here had a right to enforce the contract between himself and the association of which he was a member. If the alteration, against the will of one of the contracting parties, which is insisted on here as within the competency of the other, were valid and effectual, I do not really know why the association should not have made a rule preventing withdrawal altogether because it was inexpedient and contrary to their interests that anybody should withdraw, or a rule that if anybody did withdraw he should forfeit all interest whatsoever. The truth is, that when once it is ascertained that this is a contract which is to be kept between the parties, all the observations of the learned Judges, appropriate and reasonable enough if they were dealing with the relations between two copartners at common law, and that which should regulate the division of profits between them, become absolutely inappropriate and entirely beside the question when the consideration is whether or not a contract which has been made is to be kept.

I observed that Sir Horace Davey felt of course the pressure of the observation, and endeavoured so to construe the contract between the parties as to bring the respondents' contention within the language of the contract itself; and accordingly, instead of reading the rules of this association, which in truth constituted the contract between the parties, in their ordinary and natural sense, he ingeniously suggested that the words "the sums standing to the credit of the withdrawing member" meant not the sums as they actually do stand and as they have been actually ascertained and signed by the proper officer of the Society (which, according to the rules, is to be binding between the Society and its members), but that they meant that sum which, taking the true value of the assets and liabilities of the Society, should be the sum appropriated to the particular member. My Lords, it appears to me not only that that is not the language of the rule, but also that it is not the meaning and intent of the rule. The meaning and intent of the rule seem obvious enough, namely, that when once the sum subscribed by the member has been handed to the Society, with interest upon it according to the arrangements which have also been made, that sum shall be the ascertained sum which shall stand (and which in this case did properly stand) to the credit of the member in the books of the association.

¹ Russell v. Brownlie, March 9, 1883, 8 App. Cas. 235, 10 R. (H. L.) 19; Walton v. Edge, in re Blackburn Building Society, 10 App. Cas. 33; Tosh v. North British Building Society, July 30, 1886, 11 App. Cas. 489, 14 R. (H. L.) 6.

No. 5.

Feb. 15, 1887.
Auld v. Glasgow Working-
Men's Provi-dent Investment Building
Society.

My Lords, I do not think it necessary to proceed to shew that if this alleged construction of the rule and the principle founded upon that construction were applicable it would be possible to turn a realised share, that is to say, a fully paid-up share, into one not fully paid up, by some resolution of the Society. I say that I do not think it necessary to consider that point, because after all it is only a more striking mode of illustrating the proposition that the Society can of its own motion and without the consent of both the contracting parties alter the contract between the parties. The cardinal vice which runs through the reasoning used to support such a proposition is, that it is within the competency of one of the contracting parties to alter the terms of the contract. My Lords, it appears to me that it is utterly unarguable and impossible to insist that any such power exists. A bargain is a bargain and must be kept. And for these reasons I move your Lordships that the interlocutors appealed from be reversed, and that the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute be restored, and that the respondents do pay to the appellant the costs both here and below.

LORD BRAMWELL.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The pursuer has entered into a bargain with others which gives him certain rights, and amongst them, this, that on giving notice he should be repaid whatever stands to his credit as soon as the Society is in funds to do so. That is the bargain he has entered into. A majority of those with whom he has made that bargain have thought fit to say that it shall not be performed, that it shall be set aside, and that in lieu of it another arrangement shall be made, that is to say on account of the probable poverty of the Society each member shall receive something less than two-thirds of what stands to his credit. Now there is nothing in the bargain that authorises them to do that. If there were, it would be a conditional bargain, and the bargain would be complied with, but there is nothing in it which authorises them to do it. There is no necessity which compels them to break their bargain, because if ever the time shall arrive when they have money enough to pay the pursuer his £97 they can do it.

That being the case, I protest I will not discuss whether the proposal is an equitable one or not. It seems to me so utterly wrong, when people have entered into a defined bargain, that it should be set aside upon some more or less fanciful notion of equity or right, that I will not discuss it. I will say, "Hold to your bargain." I suppose the proverb is as true in Scotland as it is in England, and true universally, that a bargain is a bargain, as the Lord Chancellor has said, and should be observed.

I really cannot but express a respectful surprise that the learned Judges of the Court of Session should have held otherwise, and I think it particularly mischievous that any notion of that sort should be countenanced nowadays when there is such a disposition, and such a foolish, stupid, disposition, on the part

No. 5.

Feb. 15, 1887.
Auld v. Glasgow Working-
Men's Provi-
dent Investment Building
Society.

of people to think they can make better arrangements for those who have made their own, and that it is right to set aside a particular and distinct bargain that has been entered into.

LORD HERSCHELL.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I do not for a moment doubt that the resolution came to at a meeting of the members of this Society was arrived at in perfect good faith, and not in the slightest degree under the impression that they were altering the bargain between the parties. I have no doubt they were under the impression that the true constitution of a society of this description was such that the members of the society were so interested in the funds of the society as that a loss of any of the funds of the society properly fell to the lot of all. Notwithstanding that, I think they were entirely under a misapprehension with regard to what was the bargain and what is the nature and constitution of societies of this description. Nine of the shares, amounting in all to £90, had been realised long before this resolution was arrived at, and, as far as appears, many, if not all, of them before the losses occurred which led to the resolution of the Society. From the moment that each share was realised, an absolute right vested in the holder of that realised share to give notice to the Society and, when he had given notice, to be paid at once if there were funds and no other member had given notice, to be paid in rotation if other members had given notice. How anything that subsequently happened deprived him of that right, or turned a realised share into an unrealised share, or justified the Society in refusing to carry out their 12th rule, I am utterly at a loss to see; indeed, Sir Horace Davey admitted that this seemed to have been overlooked by the learned Judges in the Court below, and that he was not able to suggest how he could support the judgment as regards the realised shares, having in view the 12th rule. My Lords, I entertain no greater doubt as regards the other matter, the proportion of the shares unrealised, or if you like the whole £97 under the 10th rule. That gives a member a right in respect of the amount standing at his credit. The whole fallacy of the argument on the part of the respondents appears to me to rest in supposing that the amount standing at his credit does not mean, as it seems to me obviously to mean, the amount standing at his credit by reason of the moneys which he has paid, but that by some strange process of reasoning you are to come to the conclusion that the amount standing at his credit depends on the mode in which the Society has invested the funds out of which he is to be paid the amount standing at his credit. It seems to me that the two matters have nothing whatever to do with one another. The Society may have badly invested their funds, and therefore have a difficulty in obtaining the means of paying the amount standing at any member's credit; but that cannot alter the amount standing at his credit, or justify the Society in saying that what did stand at his credit no longer stands at his credit.

Upon these grounds, my Lords, I entirely concur in the judgment which has been proposed.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I entirely agree in the proposed judgment.

In societies of this sort the rules form the contract between the members and the society, and that contract can only be altered in the mode prescribed by the Act of Parliament. In this case the respondents have attempted to alter the contract in a manner which appears to me not to be justified or authorised by anything in the Act of Parliament. I therefore entirely agree in the motion which has been made. No. 5.

INTERLOCUTORS appealed from reversed: Interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute restored: Respondents to pay to the appellant the costs in the Court below and the costs of the appeal in this House.

ANDREW BEVERIDGE—W. OFFICER, S.S.C.—HARTLEY, ROSS, & ARDALE—CARMENT, WEDDERBURN, & WATSON, W.S.

Feb. 15, 1887.
Auld v. Glasgow Working-Men's Provident Building Society.

COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE, Appellants.—Lord-Adv. Macdonald No. 6.
—Sir R. Webster—Sol.-Gen. Robertson—A. J. Young.

GLASGOW AND SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Respondents.—
Balfour, Q.C.—R. S. Wright.

May 30, 1887.
Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Glasgow and So.-Western Railway Co.

Stamp—Stamp Act, 1870 (33 and 34 Vict. cap. 97, sec. 70)—"Conveyance on sale" proceeding upon verdict of jury under Lands Clauses Act, 1845—Sum in name of compensation for loss of business.—In a compulsory sale under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, a jury awarded the owners of the subjects, who were also the occupants, three specific sums—(1) for the value of land taken, (2) for the value of buildings, machinery, plant, &c., and (3) for compensation for loss of business previously carried on by them on the premises in question. The verdict of the jury was incorporated in the supervening conveyance of the subjects in question. Held (rev. judgment of First Division) that the ad valorem stamp which fell to be affixed to the deed in terms of the Stamp Act, 1870 (33 and 34 Vict. cap. 97), fell to be assessed on the whole sum paid by the railway company, and not merely on the first and second items.

(In the Court of Session, January 22, 1886, 13 R. 480.)

The Commissioners of Inland Revenue appealed.¹

Ld. Chancellor (Halbury).
Lord Watson.
Ld. Fitzgerald.
Lord Macnaghten.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, I cannot say that any doubt has been infused into my mind by the arguments which have been addressed to us by Mr Balfour and Mr Wright. The matter seems to me to be an exceedingly plain one. That which the railway company had, under the powers of the Act, power to do was to take land compulsorily from the owners, and the statute has provided the machinery by which the price at which it is to be taken should be ascertained. The parties may, if they please, agree, but if they do not agree the price is to be ascertained as between them, and two subjects-matter are dealt with by the statute—one the value of the property so taken, and the other, the question of severing the property so taken from the lands held therewith.

The 48th section of the statute is that which in truth we are at present construing, because this is a proceeding under the 48th section, and although the other sections of the statute may be quoted to throw light upon and to interpret the language of that section, that which your Lordships are considering at present is a proceeding under the 48th section. That section expressly provides,— "Where such inquiry shall relate to the value of lands to be purchased, and also to compensation claimed for injury done or to be done to the lands held therewith, the jury shall deliver their verdict," and so on, and the latter part of the section refers to severance. The two things—and the only two things—which are within the ambit and contemplation of the statute are the value of

¹ Appellants' Authorities.—Potter v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 18 Jur. 778, L. R., 10 Ex. 147, 23 L. J. Ex. 345; Pile v. Pile, Ex parte Lambton, 1876, L. R., 3 Ch. D. 36. Respondents' Authority.—Hammersmith Railway Co. v. Brand, L. R., 4 E. & L. 218.

No. 6.

May 20, 1887.
Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Glasgow and So.-
Western Rail-
way Co.

the lands and such damages as may arise to other lands held therewith by reason of the particular land which is taken being taken from them.

Now, my Lords, that seems to me to be at the foundation of the whole argument. That was alone what the jury in this case had power to assess, because it is admitted that no question arises here upon the other part of the section—no question arises here about any damage from severance. It is admitted therefore impliedly that the only thing which the jury had here to assess was the value of the lands. My Lords, of course the word “value” is itself a relative term, and in ascertaining what is the value of the land it is extremely common—indeed it is inevitable—to go into a great number of circumstances by which that which is proper compensation to be paid for the transfer of one man’s property to another is to be ascertained. A whole nomenclature has been invented by gentlemen who devote themselves to the consideration of such questions, and sometimes I cannot help thinking that the language which they have employed, so familiar and common in respect of such subjects, is treated as though it were the language of the Legislature itself. We, however, must be guided by what the language of the Legislature is. Now, the language of the Legislature is this, that what the jury have to ascertain is the value of the land. In treating of that value, the value under the circumstances to the person who is compelled to sell (because the statute compels him to do so) may be naturally and properly and justly taken into account, and when such phrases as “damages for loss of business,” or “compensation for the goodwill” taken from the person, are used in a loose and general sense, they are not inaccurate for the purpose of giving verbal expression to what everybody understands as a matter of business, but in strictness the thing which is to be ascertained is the price to be paid for the land—the land with all the potentialities of it, with all the actual use of it by the person who holds it, is to be considered by those who have to assess the compensation. As Mr Balfour has pointed out, the language used in this narrative may not perhaps be strictly accurate. I am by no means certain that it is, but suppose that it is not—suppose that the jury or the conveyancer who drew this deed has in the narrative introduced a description of the different elements by which the gross sum is to be ascertained, and has inaccurately used phrases not altogether appropriate to the particular transaction which they describe—what does that come to? The thing which the railway company had to pay, and the thing which the owners of the land had to transfer by this compulsory process was, on the one hand, £52,658, 6s. 7d., including this £9499, 8s. 3d., and on the other hand, the lands and premises which were the subject-matter of the transaction. Under those circumstances, my Lords, it seems to me to be beyond all doubt that that which is to be paid as stamp-duty is the ad valorem stamp upon the transaction itself which conveyed from the one to the other that which, by the process of this Act of Parliament, is ascertained to be the value, and that is, under the express language of the 48th section, the value of the land. If it is the value of the land, it cannot be doubted that the ad valorem stamp must be upon that value. It appears to me, therefore, beyond all doubt that the judgment of the Court below ought to be reversed, and that your Lordships ought to affirm the original judgment of the Commissioners, and I so move your Lordships.

LORD WATSON.—My Lords, I am also of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Session in this case cannot be sustained. The learned Judges of the majority appear to me to have fallen into error from assuming that the Lands Clauses Act authorises persons whose property is taken to claim, and compels railway companies to pay something in the nature of personal damage. That view is very distinctly expressed by Lord Mure; but it appears to me to be entirely inconsistent with the provisions of the Act. As I read these provisions the statute authorises in the first place compensation for land, or an interest in land. By "compensation" is meant an equivalent for that which the railway company take and acquire and which the proprietor gives up to them. Then in the second place, these provisions contemplate damages for injury occasioned to lands which are not taken by reason of the execution of the company's works upon the lands taken.

No. 6.

May 20, 1887.
Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Glasgow and So.-
Western Rail-
way Co.

In this case the jury, following the terms of the claim which was lodged by the landowner in answer to the notice to treat given by the railway company, have found the former entitled to £9500 for loss of business. I do not think that claim would be sustainable if the words in which it is described express the legal category to which the claim itself belongs. You cannot discover from the words which are used to describe the sum that it was claimed as compensation for an interest in land; but I entertain no doubt whatever that it was meant to be so, and that it was so treated by the jury. In assessing the value of the property, or in other words, the consideration which the railway company ought to pay for the land or interest in land which they take, it has become the practice of claimants to state the various items into which that price or consideration is capable of being resolved, and ask the jury to consider these separately.

When a proprietor, instead of letting his land to a tenant, occupies it himself for the purposes of trade, that is a special kind of occupancy which must be taken into account in estimating the value of the land; and the claim made here, which was affirmed by the jury to the extent of £9500, was obviously intended to cover the loss which Sommerville & Company sustained by reason of their having to give up the occupancy of the saw-mills which the railway company took for the purposes of their undertaking. Upon that footing it is an item of value which is rightly included in the price. In the view which the majority of the Court below seemed to have taken of it, it was an item which could not be made matter of charge against the railway company. The Lord President points out what is perfectly true, that occupancy may be severed from ownership. The owner may let to a tenant, and in that case the proprietor's claim would cover only the first two items in the finding of the jury. Upon the third item the railway company would in that case have to deal with the tenant and to satisfy his claim for loss of occupancy, which would be greater or less according to the duration of his lease. But then the learned Judge goes on to say this, comparing the case of a proprietor occupying his own premises for the purposes of trade with the case of his letting them to other traders—"Now, does it make any difference that the two characters of proprietor and tenant or occupier are combined in the same person, or does that circumstance of the combination of these two characters affect the nature of the compensation for loss of business which was awarded by the verdict of the jury? I think not." Upon that point I cannot come to the same conclusion as his Lordship. Occupancy is a right incidental to property; it passes with a disposition of property unless it has been severed from it by a lease, in which case the tenant's right becomes a burden upon that of the proprietor. The difference between the two cases—

No. 6.
 May 20, 1887.
 Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Glasgow and So-
 Western Rail-
 way Co.

and to my mind the essential difference—is this, that in the one case the disposition of Sommerville & Company carries the whole right of occupancy from the date of entry specified in the deed; in the other case it would not carry any right of occupancy until the expiry of the tenant's lease, and therefore no such item as this could have been claimed by the owner had the currency of the lease been for a considerable period.

My Lords, it is argued that the sum of £9500 is not consideration for any right taken by the company or conveyed to the company by Sommerville & Company. If I am right in saying that it is a sum paid in respect of the company taking from them and becoming possessed of their exclusive right of occupancy, that is not so. The deed of conveyance in which the consideration is inserted gives the company the right of occupancy. So far as I know it is their only title to it, and if Sommerville & Company refused to give up possession the railway company's remedy would be in founding upon the deed of conveyance as giving them the right of occupancy; they have no other title, so far as I can see. In these circumstances I cannot doubt that they have got in return for that sum the very subject, the very interest in the estate, for which it was intended that compensation should be given.

Upon these grounds I have come to the conclusion that the judgment of the Court below ought to be reversed.

LORD FITZGERALD.—My Lords, for the reasons given by the noble and learned Lord (the Lord Chancellor), and by the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Watson), I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the 22d of January 1886, by which the Court of Exchequer in Scotland determined “that the sum of £9499, 8s. 3d. sterling is not to be reckoned part of the consideration for the sale on which the conveyance mentioned in the case was granted,” should be reversed, and that the determination of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue should be restored.

The conveyance in question is undoubtedly a conveyance on the sale of property whereby property was legally transferred to the railway company. What was the property so transferred? The lands in question,—the conveyance of the lands carrying by its very force the right to the immediate possession, and thus determining the occupation of the vendor. From the conveyance the £9499, 8s. 3d. seems to have been apportioned by the jury as “compensation for loss of business.” But how was that loss occasioned? The answer must necessarily be, by the determination on the conveyance of the vendor's right to the possession and occupation of the lands. The conveyance then appropriately goes on to say, “said three sums amounting in all to the sum of £52,658, 6s. 7d.” That sum—no matter how you may subdivide it, no matter how you deal with it—is the price to be paid by the railway company in one shape or other for the right to the lands and the immediate occupation, and in my judgment forms the consideration for the sale.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords, I entirely agree. The Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company required to purchase and take for the purpose of their undertaking certain lands belonging to Messrs Sommerville & Company, who were saw-millers and timber-merchants. They were in occupation of those lands for the purposes of their trade. The railway company gave a notice to treat under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act in the usual form. In answer to that notice Messrs Sommerville & Company sent in their claim; it was a claim in respect of those lands. That was the only claim they could make in answer to the notice to treat. They divided their claim into three heads. That, my Lords, was a convenient mode for enabling the jury to ascertain what was the sum proper to be paid under the circumstances, but still the sum, however arrived at, was purchase money or compensation for the lands, and it was awarded as such—in fact, the jury had no power to award Messrs Sommerville a single farthing except as compensation in respect of the lands.

No. 6.
May 20, 1887.
Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Glasgow and So. Western Railway Co.

Now, the Lands Clauses Act prohibits a railway company from entering upon any lands except by consent, until payment or deposit of the purchase money or compensation agreed or awarded to be paid. It seems to me impossible to contend that the consideration for the sale of the lands was anything less than the full amount of purchase money or compensation ascertained in accordance with the Act and required by the Act to be paid or deposited before entry.

JUDGMENT appealed from reversed: Determination of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue affirmed: Respondents to pay to appellants the costs of the appeal to this House and the costs below.

W. H. MELVILL and D. CROLE, Solicitors of Inland Revenue—
W. A. LOCH—JOHN CLERK BRODIE & SONS, W.S.

EDWARD CAIRD (Pursuer) Appellant.—Sol.-Gen. Robertson, Q.C.— Sir H. Davey, Q.C.—F. W. Clark.

No. 7.

WILLIAM S. SIME (Defender), Respondent.—Lorimer—MacClymont.

June 18, 1887.
CaIRD v. SIME.

Literary property—Lectures in University—Publication.—Held (dis. Lord Fitzgerald) that a professor in a university is entitled to prevent by interdict the publication of lectures delivered by him in his ordinary university course, such delivery not being equivalent to publication of the lectures.

Process—Appeal from Sheriff Court.—Interlocutor—Judicature Act, 1825 (6 Geo. IV. c. 120), sec. 40—Findings in fact—Appeal to House of Lords.—In a petition in a Sheriff Court by a professor for interdict to prevent the defender publishing a book alleged to be in substance a reproduction of the pursuer's lectures, the case, on appeal to the Second Division, was referred to the whole Court, with the result that nine Judges were of the opinion that the book was in substance a reproduction of the lectures, three were of opinion that it was not, while the remaining Judge reserved his opinion on this point. On the question as to whether the pursuer, being a university professor, was entitled to the protection of an interdict, six Judges were of the opinion that he was, five that he was not, while the two remaining Judges gave no judgment on the question, holding that the book was not a reproduction of the lectures. The Second Division of the Court, before whom the appeal depended, thereupon pronounced judgment, finding that the lectures referred to on record were delivered by the pursuer as part of his course, and that the book complained of was published by the defender, having been compiled by a student who had attended the lectures and had taken notes in shorthand; they then found, "in conformity with the opinions of the majority of the whole Court, that such publication did not constitute an infringement of any legal right of property belonging to or otherwise vested in the pursuer," and refused the interdict. In an appeal, held that, in compliance with the 40th section of the Judicature Act, 1850, the Court ought to have inserted in the interlocutor a finding in fact, in conformity with the opinions of the majority of the Judges, that the book in question was a reproduction of the lectures, and that the case fell to be dealt with as if such finding had been inserted.

No. 7. (In the Court of Session, 23d October 1885, 13 R., p. 23.)

The pursuer appealed.

June 18, 1887.

Caird v. Sime.

Ld. Chancellor
(Halsbury).

Lord Watson.

Ld. Fitzgerald.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—In this case I have had much greater difficulty in dealing with the question of form than with the substantial question between the parties which it was intended to raise by this appeal. It is, I think, manifest that the interlocutor does not comply with the provisions of the Judicature Act of 1825, and I cannot but regret that the suggestion of Lord Rutherford Clark was not adopted, by which that which was fact would have been found as fact, and the question of law, which alone under that statute is open to your Lordships to review, would have been left to be determined. Nevertheless, although with some doubt, I have come to the conclusion that your Lordships may treat the questions of fact as having been determined, and the questions of law as sufficiently severed from those questions of fact to enable your Lordships to pronounce a final judgment between the parties.

The question which it was intended to raise was the legal right of the respondent to publish in the form of a pamphlet certain literary compositions of the appellant which were orally delivered to the students of the University of Glasgow attending his class. A majority of the Court has determined that the pamphlet in question is a reproduction of the appellant's literary composition, and I do not stop to discuss what some of their Lordships appear to have considered important, that in respect of certain particulars it was a blundering and unsuccessful reproduction of the appellant's work. I confess I am unable to understand what place such topics find in the argument. Assume an unlawful reproduction of an author's literary work; it does not become less an injury to the legal right because the reproducer has disfigured his reproduction with ignorant or foolish additions of his own. It is not denied, and it cannot in the present state of the law be denied, that an author has a proprietary right in his unpublished literary productions. It is further incapable of denial that that proprietary right may still continue notwithstanding some kind of communication to others. The case of private letters, which though conveniently described by the word "private" involve publication of a certain kind to others than the author of them, is an illustration of a communication which does not permit the infringement of the proprietary right which would be involved in their unauthorised general publication. The doubt which I have entertained in the course of the argument has been whether the extent and degree of publication in the case now under debate was not a question of fact which should have been determined on the evidence before the Court, and which if it had been determined it would not have been open to your Lordships to review. But as I have said, I have come to the conclusion that in the form in which it has arisen it may be treated as a question of law, that is to say, whether in the agreed state of facts such a publication as is proved here must as a matter of law deprive the author of the literary composition in question of his proprietary right, and whether the fact that he is a Professor of Moral Philosophy teaching in his classroom by the literary composition which is now the subject of debate makes his delivery of that literary composition necessarily public to the whole world, so as to entitle anyone who heard it to republish it without the permission of its author.

Now, I have designedly used the phrase "literary composition" to avoid the ambiguity of the word "lecture," because I think the word "lecture" involves an assumption which may give rise to error. If by it is signified a lecture delivered on behalf of the University, and, so to speak, as the lecture of the University itself—as the authorised exposition of the University teaching—I can well understand that by the nature of the thing, from the circumstances of its delivery and the object with which it was delivered, it would be impossible to say that the lecture was intended by those in whose behalf the Professor was lecturing, or by himself, to limit the right of communication to others. Whether that limitation of the right arises from implied contract or from the existing relation between the hearers and the author, it is intelligible that where a person speaks a speech to which all the world is invited either expressly or impliedly to listen, or preaches a sermon in a church the doors of which are thrown open to all mankind, the mode and manner of publication negative as it appears to me any limitation. But without using any phrase which by force of its ordinary meaning implies either a kind of publication or involves a limitation of the right of publication, what are the facts here as found by a majority of the Court? A teacher is in his class-room with his students. For the purpose of teaching them he was a composition of his own, in this case called “the Law of Moral Philosophy.” Suppose it had been exercises in grammar, arithmetic, or foreign language. The object and purpose is to teach the students, to enable them to become proficient in the various subjects of which the teacher is the professor. The student is entitled to avail himself of the teaching. The object is to make him a good grammarian, a good arithmetician, or a proficient in the particular language that is taught. But could it be contended that by reason of such communication to such students, each of them was entitled to publish the professor’s exercises, dialogues, dictionary, or the like? My Lords, it seems to me that it might be, and indeed there is some suggestion here that it is, contrary both to the spirit and meaning of what is called a lecture that students should be supplied with some mode of answering questions on the subject of their lectures without that process of mental digestion which is intended to form the substance of the teaching. Illustrations might be infinitely multiplied in which the whole purpose of a professor’s teaching might be rendered nugatory by the unauthorised production of his modes of teaching.

The ground on which I have been able to come to the conclusion that the particular form of literary composition, and the degree of communication which is established to a limited class, may be treated as a question of law is, that it appears to have been decided that notwithstanding the professor’s desire to prevent such reproduction, and contrary to his intention, the delivery of his lecture or of his composition to a limited class of students operates, as matter of law, to make his composition public and to prevent his enforcing any proprietary right.

I am not aware of any university regulation or any bargains with its professors which either expressly or impliedly enforces on the professors the making public of their literary compositions, of whatever class these compositions may be, and whether educational and intended for the use of their students or intended for mere general diffusion. I am disposed to think, although it does not become necessary to discuss it in the present case, that if a professor had entered into a specific bargain to make public the lectures which he was delivering to his students, but contrary to that bargain had enforced on his students the condition of secrecy, though the university which employed him on that express bargain might be at liberty to seek their remedy against him for a breach of his under-

No. 7. taking, it would not necessarily make public that which the lecturer himself had neither expressly nor impliedly communicated for general reproduction.

June 13, 1887.
Caird v. Sims.

My Lords, I doubt whether any of the cases which have been brought to your Lordships' attention do more than establish the two propositions which, as I have said, cannot now be in debate. The application of the principles laid down in these cases is what gives rise to the matter now in discussion. I do not think it very important to consider what was the ultimate result of Mr Abernethy's appeal to Lord Eldon, because the ground of Lord Eldon's decision as originally given seems not to have been affected if an arrangement between the parties, as seems probable, put an end to the litigation.

With respect to the Act 5 and 6 Will. IV. cap. 65, I am not prepared to say that I can obtain any light from its provisions. I had at one time an impression that there was something in the nature of a declaration by the Legislature that lectures delivered in a university or a public school or any public foundation were to be assumed to be so published as for the future to become public property, and if that were assumed to be the construction of the statute a serious question would arise as to what were lectures within the meaning of that statute. But I am now satisfied that the language of the statute has been adopted by the Legislature for the purpose of not interfering in any way with the law existing on the subject; possibly it may be that the difficulty of defining what should be a lecture may have occurred to the author of the statute, or the impolicy of affecting to lay down a rule, when many circumstances of convenience as to modes of instruction and so forth might be appropriately left to the university authorities, may have produced the legislation which in fact exists. At all events I can derive no assistance from a statute which professes to leave the law as it is without professing to give any hint of what it assumes the law to be.

I am therefore of opinion that the appellant ought to succeed, and I concur in the suggested form of judgment which has been prepared by my noble and learned friend Lord Watson, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

LORD WATSON.—This appeal is taken in two conjoined processes instituted in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire by the appellant, who is Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Glasgow, for the purpose of having the respondent, a bookseller in that city, interdicted from publishing or advertising for sale certain books or pamphlets entitled "Aids to the Study of Moral Philosophy," on the ground that these works are mere reproductions of the lectures delivered by the appellant to the students who attend his class in the University. In defence the respondent pleads, in the first place, that the publications sought to be interdicted are not substantially the same with the appellant's lectures, but represent the views of the person who compiled them, and are the result of his independent study and research, and in the second place, that the delivery of the appellant's lectures in the class-room of the University is equivalent to publication, and that he has consequently lost his right to prevent their publication in a printed form. These defences raise two issues, the first being a question of fact, which if the actions had originated in the Court of Session would have been appropriately tried before a jury, the second being a question of law.

Proof was led by both parties, and, thereafter, on 15th February 1884, the Sheriff-substitute granted perpetual interdict as craved, and ordained the respondent to deliver up to the appellant all copies of the publications complained of remaining in his hands or within his control. The learned Sheriff-substitute by his interlocutor, of that date, found that "the said books or pamphlets are wholly or in substance reproductions, more or less correct, of the lectures in use to be delivered by the pursuer to his class of Moral Philosophy in the University of Glasgow," and he further found that "the said lectures are the property of the pursuer, and that the defender has not shewn that the pursuer has in any way lost his right of property therein, or that he has acquired from the pursuer, or in any other lawful way, a right to publish or reproduce said lectures." No. 7.

June 13, 1887.
Caird v. Sims.

The respondent appealed to the Second Division, who ordered the cause with minutes of debate to be laid before the whole Judges of the Court for their opinion. The result was that of the thirteen consulted Judges a majority of nine were of opinion that the respondent's publications are substantially a reproduction of the appellant's lectures. Six Judges (Lords Shand, Rutherford Clark, Adam, Fraser, Kinnear, and Trayner) held that the appellant has a right of property in his delivered lectures, whilst five Judges (the Lord President, the Lord Justice-Clerk, and Lords Mure, Lee, and M'Laren) came to the opposite conclusion. Lord Young, although he did express some views unfavourable to the appellant, distinctly intimated that he did not think it necessary to decide, and did not decide, the question, being of opinion that the appellant's right, assuming it to exist, must be limited to a right to protection "against any publication which may be reasonably held to anticipate or otherwise substantially or prejudicially interfere with a subsequent publication by himself," and that the publications complained of are not of that character. Lord Craighill expressed no opinion whatever upon the matter of right, holding that the view taken by the minority (of which his Lordship was one) upon the question of fact was a sufficient ground of judgment.

The case was advised on the 23d October 1885, when the Second Division pronounced the interlocutor which is now brought under review. It contains the following findings:—"Find that the pursuer is Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Glasgow, and that the lectures referred to in the record were delivered by him to his students as part of his ordinary course: Find that the defender, who is a bookseller in Glasgow, published the work now complained of: Find that this work was compiled by a student who had attended the classes taught by the pursuer, and who had taken notes in shorthand of the pursuer's lectures." These are in all respects proper findings, although they set forth facts which were not seriously disputed. The important part of the interlocutor follows:—"Find, in conformity with the opinions of the majority of the whole Court, that such publication did not constitute an infringement of any legal right of property or otherwise belonging to or vested in the pursuer; therefore sustain the appeal," &c.

The last finding of the interlocutor does not comply with the requirements of 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, s. 40, and is beset with ambiguity. It suggests either that a majority of the Court held that there was no infringement, or that a majority were of opinion that there was no right capable of being infringed; but, in point of fact, there was not a majority in favour of either of these propositions. Lord Rutherford Clark protested against the terms of the interlocutor as not being in accordance with the provisions of the Judicature Act of 1825; but he was overruled by the other Judges of the Division, whose reasons for the course they followed I am at a loss to understand. Apparently they meant to find that, on some ground or other, a majority of the whole Judges were of opinion that interdict should not be granted, such majority being obtained by combining two

No. 7. minorities. It may be doubtful whether Lord Craighill's opinion upon the question of fact should have been taken into account in deciding the case, seeing June 13, 1887. Caird v. Sims. that it had been negatived by a large majority; but, in the present state of the case, it is unnecessary for your Lordships to consider that matter. Whether judgment was given for or against the appellant, it was the statutory duty of the Court to insert a finding of fact in their interlocutor, expressing the opinion of the majority of the consulted Judges upon the question of infringement, for the guidance of this House. Your Lordships are, by the terms of the statute, precluded from reviewing the interlocutor of the 23d of October 1885, except in so far as it "depends on or is affected by matter of law," and the only question which can be competently raised and decided in this appeal is that which relates to the existence of the appellant's alleged right of property in his lectures. It would have been idle to entertain that question if the Court below had come to the conclusion that, assuming such a right to exist, the respondent's publications did not constitute an invasion of it. Fortunately, in the present case, the conclusion of the majority of the whole Court upon the question of fact is beyond dispute; and the ministerial duty of the Second Division to give effect to that conclusion by a finding in their judgment is equally plain. In these circumstances, your Lordships did not think it expedient or necessary to subject the parties to the delay and expense which would have been occasioned by remitting the cause, in order to have the interlocutor put into proper shape, and permitted them to be heard, on the merits of the appeal, as if the interlocutor had contained an express finding to the effect that the publications complained of are in substance a reproduction of the appellant's lectures.

The author of a lecture on moral philosophy, or of any other original composition, retains a right of property in his work which entitles him to prevent its publication by others until it has, with his consent, been communicated to the public. Since the case of Jefferys v. Boosey,¹ was decided by this House in the year 1854, it must be taken as settled law that, upon such communication being made to the public, whether orally or by the circulation of written or printed copies of the work, the author's right of property ceases to exist. Copyright, which is the exclusive privilege of multiplying copies after publication, is the creature of statute, and with that right we have nothing to do in the present case. The only question which we have to decide is, whether the oral delivery of the appellant's lectures to the students attending his class is, in law, equivalent to communication to the public.

The author's right of property in his unpublished work being undoubted, it has also been settled that he may communicate it to others under such limitations as will not interfere with the continuance of the right. "He has," as was said by Lord Brougham in Jefferys v. Boosey,² "the undisputed right to his manuscript; he may withhold or he may communicate it, and communicating it he may limit the number of persons to whom it is imparted, and impose such restrictions as he pleases upon their use of it. The fulfilment of the annexed conditions he may proceed to enforce, and for their breach he may claim compensation." He cannot print and sell without publishing his work, but he may legitimately impose restrictions which will prevent its publication, whether the communication be made by giving copies for private perusal or by recitation before a select audience. In the latter case the retention of the author's right depends upon its being either matter of contract or an implied condition, that the audience are admitted for the purpose of receiving instruction or amusement, and not in order that they may take a full note of what they hear, and publish it for their own profit, and for the information of the public at large. Upon that principle it was decided in Macklin v. Richardson,¹ that the fact of a play having been acted for several years in a public theatre with permission of the author did not imply an abandonment of his right, and that he was therefore entitled to restrain its publication from notes taken by a shorthand writer who had paid for admission to the theatre. On the other hand I do not doubt that a lecturer who addresses himself to the public generally without distinction of persons or selection or restriction of his hearers has, as the Lord President observes in this case, “abandoned his ideas and words to the use of the public at large, or in other words has himself published them.”

¹ 4 H. L. C. 815.

² 4 H. L. C. at p. 962.

No. 7.

June 13, 1887.
Caird v. Sims.

The main argument addressed to your Lordships for the respondent was to the effect that a professorship in a Scotch university being munus publicum, and the occupant of the office being under an obligation to receive into his class all comers having the requisite qualification, his lectures are really addressed to the public, and at all events that there is no room for inferring that the students are taught under an implied condition that they shall not print and publish his lectures either for their own profit or otherwise. I do not think it can be disputed that, as stated by Lord Shand, this is the first occasion in the history of the Scottish universities on which any such right as that now claimed has been asserted. If the claim be well founded there can be no copyright in a lecture which has been once delivered in the class-room. Yet it is the fact that professors and their representatives have been in frequent use to publish lectures which had been annually delivered for years before such publication, and have enjoyed, without objection or challenge, the privilege of copyright. That has been notably the case with our great academical teachers of moral and mental philosophy, from Dr Thomas Reid, who was appointed to the chair now held by the appellant in 1763, to the late Sir William Hamilton. I concede that, although such may have been the prevalent understanding in Scotland as to the professor's right, this is not a case in which it can be said that communis error facit jus; but I agree with Lord Shand's observation that, in these circumstances, effect ought not to be given to the respondent's argument unless he can make it clear “in principle or authority that the law gives him the right he claims.”

In the Court below there was a good deal of discussion as to the practical result of deciding this case one way or another. I am afraid that I do not estimate so highly as some of the learned Judges the advantage of having the professor's lectures printed and subjected to the criticism of public opinion. The capable critics are a small and by no means unanimous section of the community; and I doubt whether the governing body of the University or the professor would derive any assistance from their strictures; whilst experience has shewn that the public who are interested in it are not ignorant of the character of University teaching. An original thinker and able teacher very soon attracts a large class and vice versa. I certainly do not appreciate the advantage to the public of furnishing (which is the professed object of the respondent) the appellant's students with a “crib”—an aid to knowledge forbidden in well regulated educational institutions, which, as the Lord Chancellor has already

¹ Amb. 694.

No. 7. pointed out, supersedes the necessity of intellectual effort and neutralises the benefit of the professor's tuition. There appeared to me to be some force in the suggestion of the appellant's counsel, that if it be now held for the first time that delivery of his lectures is publication, the professor may in future (contrary to his present practice) hesitate to communicate his best and most original thoughts to his class, before they have been matured and given to the world by himself. But I do not think these considerations, however important they may be in themselves, are decisive of the present question.

June 18, 1887.
Caird v. Sims.

As to the position of students attending the appellant's class, it is sufficient to say here that they must be members by matriculation of the University, and they must also be enrolled as members of his class for the session, upon payment of the prescribed fee. A member of the public, as such, has no right to be present at his lectures; and the public has no right to interfere with or control his teaching. By sec. 5 of the Universities (Scotland) Act of 1858, the duty of superintending and regulating the teaching and discipline of the University is committed to the Senatus Academicus (which is a body consisting of the principal and whole professors of the University) subject to the control and review of the University Court.

The leading, if not the only case having a close analogy to the present is Abernethy v. Hutchinson,¹ decided by the Lord Chancellor (Lord Eldon) in the year 1825. It is true that in that case there were features which do not occur here. It appeared upon the affidavits made by Mr Abernethy in support of his application for an injunction against the publication of his lectures at St Bartholomew's Hospital, that it was no part of his duty as one of the surgeons of the hospital to deliver these lectures, which were not in any way open or accessible to the public, and were not attended by any person save by his permission. At the first hearing Lord Eldon entertained some doubt whether there could be satisfactory evidence of the substantial identity of the publication sought to be restrained with the plaintiff's lectures, seeing that these had not been written out at full length, but were delivered orally from notes, and his Lordship also desiderated evidence of the way in which the defendants obtained possession of the matter which they had printed. The motion for an injunction was accordingly delayed, the learned Judge observing,—“In the meantime Mr Abernethy may, if he thinks proper, produce his MSS., and on the other hand, the defendants will judge for themselves whether they will or not—and I do not require it of them, because I have no right—inform me of the way in which they became possessed of the means of publishing this work.” Upon the first of these points his Lordship was satisfied by the production of the notes from which the lectures had been delivered, with an explanatory affidavit. The defendants did not respond to the invitation addressed to them, and his Lordship, in the absence of direct evidence, came to the conclusion that they must have obtained the lectures from some person who had attended them, or in some other way in which the Court could not approve. Accordingly a perpetual injunction was granted, on the ground that all persons who attended these lectures were under an implied contract not to publish what they heard, although they might take it down for their own instruction and use.

I may here observe that, in the course of the argument for the respondent, Mr MacClymont brought under your Lordships' notice the fact that the record in *Abernethy v. Hutchinson*¹ shews that the injunction was dissolved by the Lord Chancellor within a few months after its issue, upon a motion by the defendants, and without hearing parties. We were told that no trace had been found of the affidavit on which the motion was made, so that the recall of the injunction may have been the result of an arrangement between the parties, and at all events it cannot detract from the weight of Lord Eldon's deliberate judgment causa cognita.

¹ 3 L. J. (Ch.) 209; 1 Hall and Twells, 28.

No. 7.

June 18, 1887.
Caird v. Sims.

In my opinion the reasoning upon which Lord Eldon's judgment is based applies strictly to the case of a professor in a Scotch university. The principle which pervades the whole of that reasoning is, that where the persons present at a lecture are not the general public, but a limited class of the public, selected and admitted for the sole and special purpose of receiving individual instruction, they may make any use they can of the lecture, to the extent of taking it down in shorthand for their own information and improvement, but cannot publish it. If that be the real character of the relation between the lecturer and those whom he addresses, it is immaterial whether they are selected by himself or by others, so long as it is matter of express stipulation, or of reasonable implication, that the duty which he undertakes is limited to giving personal instruction to the individuals composing his audience. Some of the learned Judges in the Court below seem to have been of opinion that the present case cannot be brought within the principle of *Abernethy v. Hutchinson*¹ because there is nothing in the nature of a contract between the professor and his students, and therefore there can be no implied contract that they shall not publish. That may be so; but what Lord Eldon held was, that the restriction of the hearers' right to use the lectures arose from the relation established by contract between them and Mr Abernethy. In that case, the restriction necessarily became an implied term of the contract; but the condition itself is the legal consequence of the relation in which the parties stand to each other, and must receive effect, whenever a similar relation exists, whether it be established by contract or in any other way.

I do not think that students of moral philosophy in the University of Glasgow, or in any other Scotch university, either are, or can with propriety be said to represent the general public; of course they are, each and all of them, members of the public; but they do not attend the professor's lectures in that capacity. They must be members of the University, and they must further comply with its regulations and make payment to the professor of the usual fee, in return for which they receive from him a ticket or certificate of their enrolment as students for the session; and, without observing these preliminaries, they would have no right to enter his class-room during the lecture hour. The relation of the professor to his students is simply that of teacher and pupil; his duty is, not to address the public at large, but to instruct his students; and their right is to profit by his instruction, but not to report or publish his lectures. It appears to me that the learned Judges whose opinions are adverse to the appellant have attributed undue weight to the circumstance that the appellant's office is munus publicum. That it is so is an undoubted fact; but, according to my apprehension, the question which your Lordships have to decide depends, not upon that fact, but upon the duty which the appellant's office requires him to fulfil. The nature of the duty incumbent upon a professor in an English

¹ 3 L. J. (Ch.) O. S. 209; 1 Hall and Twells, 28.

No. 7. University is thus described by Lord Eldon, in Abernethy v. Hutchinson:¹

June 18, 1887.
Caird v. Sime.

"Now if a professor be appointed, he is appointed for the purpose of giving information to all his students who attend him, and it is his duty to do that; but I have never yet heard that anybody could publish his lectures." So far as I know, there is no difference whatever between the position of a Scotch and that of an English University professor, so far as regards their relations to the students whom they teach; and no point of difference has been suggested, either in the Court below or by the respondent's counsel. The fact of his being a public official lays the appellant under an obligation to the State as well as to those who pay for their instruction, to teach efficiently, and to the best of his abilities; it does not affect the nature of his obligation, and cannot alter the relation between him and his students.

That Lord Eldon held the lectures of a university professor to be within the rule laid down and given effect to by him in *Abernethy v. Hutchinson*¹ is beyond question, because he expressly refers to the case of such a professor as an illustration of the legal principles upon which he gave judgment for Mr Abernethy. None of the learned Judges who are of opinion that the doctrine of *Abernethy v. Hutchinson*¹ is inapplicable to this case advert to that part of his Lordship's judgment, with the single exception of Lord M'Laren, who states, in my opinion correctly, that Lord Eldon "very distinctly and emphatically identifies the case of Mr Abernethy with that of the lectures of Blackstone, originally delivered by that great lawyer in the University of Oxford, in which he held the appointment of Vinerian Professor of Law." Lord M'Laren suggests, however, that there are no means of knowing whether the attention of the Lord Chancellor "had been drawn to the distinction which might be taken between public and private lectures, a distinction on which the main argument of the defender is founded." I cannot, for many reasons, concur in Lord M'Laren's suggestion. Lord Eldon, in the passage referred to, was distinguishing between lectures public in this sense, that they are communicated urbi et orbi by the mere act of delivery, and lectures which are private, inasmuch as the author does not by their delivery communicate his ideas and language to the public at large, or part with his common law right of property. It was not the habit of Lord Eldon to overlook such obvious differences as did exist between the position of Mr Abernethy and that of Sir William Blackstone; it is manifest that his Lordship was clearly of opinion that these differences could not disturb the application of the same principles of law to both cases alike. In that opinion I entirely concur.

The observations of Lord Eldon assume that Sir William Blackstone would not have had copyright in the text of his Commentaries if the lectures delivered by him as Vinerian Professor were held to have been thereby published. The accuracy of that assumption is controverted by my noble and learned friend Lord Fitzgerald. Never having seen the lectures, I can only say for myself that in the preface to the first edition of the Commentaries, published in 1765, the learned author states that "the following sheets contain the substance of a course of lectures on the laws of England which were read by the author in the University of Oxford." Lord Eldon heard and took notes of the lectures, and was no doubt familiar with the Commentaries; and he was therefore in a position to judge (which I am not), and was perfectly capable of judging whether the two works were substantially the same. If they were, the statute of Anne could give the author no copyright in the original text, although he might acquire the copyright of new matter added to subsequent editions of the Commentaries.

¹ 3 L. J. (Ch.) O. S. 209; 1 Hall and Twells, 28.

No. 7.

June 13, 1887.
Caïrd v. Sims.

In regard to the Act 5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 65, I adopt the opinion of the great majority of the learned Judges, which is in accordance with the view taken by Mr Justice Kay in the recent case of Nicols v. Pitman.¹ The effect of the statute is to secure their right of property to authors of lectures, and to persons to whom the right has been sold or conveyed, notwithstanding delivery, upon their compliance with certain preliminaries; and their right is protected from invasion by forfeitures and penalties. Its provisions are not confined to cases in which the right would have been protected at common law, but extend to many cases in which, according to that law, delivery would have been equivalent to publication. But, by sec. 5, lectures delivered in a university, or a public school, or in any public foundation, are excepted from the operation of the Act, and it is declared "that the law relating thereto shall remain the same as if this Act had not been passed." I cannot gather from the terms of that exception and declaration any indication of an intention on the part of the legislature to express their understanding of the existing law with respect to lectures in these institutions. There may be lectures delivered within the walls of such institutions which do by their delivery become public property, just as there may be others which do not. Whether they belong to one or other of these classes is a question which must be decided irrespective of the provisions of the statute.

I am accordingly of opinion that the appellant is entitled to have the judgment of the Second Division, in so far as adverse to him, reversed, and to have the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute restored. (His Lordship then read the form of order, as given below.)

LORD FITZGERALD.—My Lords, the question we have to determine on this appeal seems to me to be one of pure law. I agree with my noble and learned friend (Lord Watson) that we must read the interlocutor of the Second Division as if it contained an express finding that the publications complained of are in substance a reproduction of the appellant's lectures.

It was not contested that by the common law of Scotland, as well as by the common law of England, every author has a right of property in his compositions so long as they remain "unpublished," and that a private lecturer may lawfully impose an express condition on persons allowed to hear his lecture, that they shall not publish what they hear, and that such a condition may also be lawfully implied from the circumstances. In such cases the common law protects the author's right of property and forbids infringement. On the other hand, a private lecturer may deliver his lecture under such circumstances as indicate his intention to give his words to the public at large. In the latter case, the lecturer has technically published his lecture, and has abandoned the protection which the common law would otherwise afford. We have now, however, to deal with a case very different from that of any private lecturer.

The facts, as to which there is no dispute, are that the pursuer fills the chair of Moral Philosophy in the University of Glasgow. It is not necessary to investigate the history of that university, as its status is now in substance similar to that of the other universities of Scotland. They are all ancient public endowed corporations established by public authority for the special purpose of

¹ 26 Ch. D. 374.

No. 7. public instruction in theology, law, medicine, and all the arts. In that instruction the public at large has a deep and direct interest. For an outline of the University, and the office of its professors, and their functions and duties, I refer to the eloquent judgment of the Lord President. In point of modern regulation and government they all come under the provisions of the imperial statute 21 and 22 Vict. c. 83, which is a statute "for the advancement of religion and learning, and to make provision for the better government and discipline of the universities of Scotland." The University of Glasgow has under that Act a chancellor; a Senatus Academicus "to superintend and regulate, inter alia, the teaching and discipline of the university"; a university Court to control the decisions of the Senatus Academicus, and to enforce due attention on the part of the professors to regulations as to the mode of teaching and other duties imposed on them, and to fix and regulate the fees from time to time in the several classes; it has also a university council, and in order to produce uniformity in the several universities the statute constitutes a general body of commissioners with legislative powers, for a limited period, to make statutes and ordinances, such as in their opinion would be conducive to the well-being of the universities, the advancement of learning, the course of study, and the manner of examination, &c. The statute also gives to those commissioners an important power, namely to recommend grants of public money for certain purposes, and amongst others, "for increasing the salaries presently attached to existing professorships."

June 18, 1887.
Caird v. Sims.

The pursuer was a professor in the University of Glasgow, nominated to his chair by the Court of the University, remunerated partly by salary paid out of the University revenues, or out of moneys voted by Parliament, and partly by class fees which, however, equally formed part of the University revenue, though allocated for the time being to him. His obligation and his duty were to teach the nation through its youth, according to the regulations laid down by the governing body of the University. It does not appear what those regulations were, nor is it alleged that there were any restrictions or conditions imposed on the students of the class, or other auditors, by that governing body, as to the use to be made of the professor's lectures when delivered. I assume too, as the contrary does not appear, that the pursuer was left free to teach by lectures if he thought fit. He did teach by the instrumentality of reading lectures. The broad question for our consideration is whether that reading of his lectures to those assembled in the lecture-room is a publication to the nation.

After much anxious consideration, I have come to the conclusion that the delivery of the lectures was a publication to the public at large, and that being such, the pursuer has abandoned to the public the exclusive rights which he otherwise had, and the protection which the common law would otherwise have afforded him. I have struggled against this conclusion, as I am conscious how superior my noble and learned friends are to me in knowledge and judgment, but I have been unable to agree with them, and am compelled, on the other hand, to accept the broad and vigorous reasoning of the Lord President and Lords Young and M'Laren.

It was urged in your Lordships' House in argument, that a decision in favour of the respondent would operate unjustly on the professor as depriving him of emoluments which he might otherwise derive from the publication and sale of his lectures, by himself or his representatives, for all time; but this seems an exaggerated, and, to some extent, an imaginary apprehension. There is no power, save that of the University, to interfere with the professor in publishing his lectures for sale, and the public would probably prefer the publication issued with the stamp of his authority, and containing his emendations and additions. This is, however, a consideration which we cannot enter upon. Again, it was urged that the professorial practice of repeating the same lecture session after session, in like manner as a minister repeats his sermon, would be interfered with. If this was so, it would seem to be a desirable result.

No. 7.

June 13, 1887.
Caird v. Sims.

The Sheriff in his note to the interlocutor of the 23d of November 1883, says, inter alia, on this point,—“The professor's thoughts as expressed that year must be the same as those to be similarly expressed the next year.” This would seem to assimilate the professor's duty to the cuckoo cry of repetition. I rather think that this eminent professor would repudiate such a suggestion, and tell us that the lecturer should remember that,—“Beneath this starry arch naught resteth or is still,”—and that his duty is to watch over and criticise new modes of thought, new works, the march of intellect, and those discoveries which,—“Make old knowledge pale before the new.” Even in pure mathematics there may be alterations and additions, and ethical science is not free from the inexorable law of mutability.

Lord Young in the reasons for his judgment says:—“Now, I have to observe that neither the common law of property nor the statute law of copyright applies to teaching in a public university. It is obviously expedient in the public interest that such teaching should be public, and open to public comment and criticism. This accordingly, I apprehend, is the reason why lectures in public universities are excepted from the provisions of the Act of 1835.” My Lords, I concur with the learned Lord (Lord Young) in opinion that it is essential to the public safety that university teaching should be exposed to comment, to searching criticism, and to the full blaze of public opinion. How can this be attained if the contention of the pursuer is well founded? If the lecturer can prevent all other publication of his lectures than that which takes place in his classroom, the nation may be left in Cimmerian darkness as to the teachings of its youth in its great universities. Unless there be full and complete publicity, criticism would be impracticable, and a mere empty sound.

Lord Young, in the passage just quoted, touches on another subject, namely, the Act of 1835, to which, perhaps, sufficient attention has not been given.

The bill which became the Act of 1835 (5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 65) was introduced into this House about ten years after Lord Eldon had given his decision on the injunction motion in Abernethy v. Hutchinson,¹ and it is not improbable that the difficulties supposed to exist in consequence of Lord Eldon's reasons led to the bill. It is a bill entitled “For preventing the publication of lectures without consent.” The preamble is obviously taken from the Copyright Act, 8 Anne, c. 19, and the 1st section is large enough to apply to and embrace all lectures wheresoever delivered; sec. 2 prohibits under certain penalties the publication of any lecture in any newspaper without the license of the author; and sec. 3 provides that no person allowed for fee or reward or otherwise to be present at a lecture delivered in any place shall be deemed to have leave to print or copy or publish such lecture. The bill as introduced in this House, seems to have passed without debate, but in the Commons it met with considerable opposition on the broad ground that if it was intended to shield public lectures from public

¹ 3 L. J. (Ch.) 209; 1 Hall and Twells, 28.

No. 7. inspection it ought not to receive the sanction of Parliament. In the course of the discussion, attention was specially directed to Abernethy v. Hutchinson,¹ June 13, 1837. which was probably misunderstood. It ended in a compromise, by which words were added at the end of clause 5, providing that the Act should not extend "to any lecture delivered in any university or public school or college, or on any public foundation, or by any individual in virtue of, or according to any gift, endowment, or foundation, and that the law relating thereto shall remain the same as if this Act had not been passed."

In Millar v. Taylor,² it is reported that "Mr Murphy, counsel for the defendant, strongly contended from the amendments made in the Commons on the Statute of 8 Anne, and from the change of title, that Parliament intended to take away or to declare that there was no property at the common law," but to this Willes, J., answered, that "the sense and meaning of an Act must be collected from what it says when passed into law, and not from the history of the changes it underwent in the House where it took its rise. The history is not known to the other House or to the Sovereign." The rule so aptly expressed has always been enforced in this House. But, strangely enough, Willes, J., does, shortly afterwards in the same judgment, seem to offend against his own rule. He uses language which I quote as not inapplicable to the statute before us. His language is this :—"The preamble is infinitely stronger in the original bill as it was brought into the House and referred to the committee. But to go into the history of the changes the bill underwent in the House of Commons, it certainly went to the committee as a bill to secure the undoubted property of copies for ever. It is plain that objections arose in the committee to the generality of the proposition, which ended in securing the property of copies for a term without prejudice to either side of the question upon the general proposition as to the right."

Now, looking at the 5 and 6 Will. 4, we may at least say that objection was taken in the Commons to the generality of the proposed measure, and the proviso was there added at the end of the 5th clause. The statute seems at once in its first clause to recognise the property of the lecturer in his lecture, and to confer on him the sole right and liberty of printing and publishing such lecture, even though he may have delivered the same under such a state of circumstances as would have otherwise amounted to an abandonment of his words and thoughts to the public. "Leave of the author," and "consent of the author" would probably be interpreted as meaning express leave or consent, such as would confer a title on the licensee, and sec. 4 seems to support that view. There is difficulty of construction in every part of this short statute, but especially in sec. 5. I am unable to read the concluding proviso of sec. 5 save as indicating a statutable declaration that lectures delivered in a university, which is necessarily a public institution, become thereby public property for the purposes of publication and public criticism. As to the concluding sentence, "that the law relating thereto shall remain the same as if this Act had not passed," the words seem to me to have no real force. The reservation is of such common law right, if any, as existed before the Act. The Statute does not interfere with or abridge any common law right, but leaves it as it was. In my judgment the only common law right the university lecturer has is a right of property in his lecture when composed, and before its public delivery in the university. There seems to have been no decision whatever on the subject of lectures delivered in a public university prior to the passing of that Act. I am unable to accept *Abernethy v. Hutchinson*¹ as final or satisfactory on the propositions, if any, which it is supposed to decide. It arose on motion only, supported by the affidavit of the plaintiff; there never was a plenary hearing of the cause. Lord Eldon treats as a pure question of law, which he would not decide, "property in sentiments or language not deposited on paper." He then goes into implied contract, or breach of trust, which is wholly inapplicable to the case before us, and it is observable that his strictures are principally, if not wholly, directed against printing for profit. He adopts, in substance, the proposition of Aston, J., in Miller v. Taylor,² that "he has no right to publish for profit the identical work." On the first hearing of the motion, Lord Eldon refused the injunction, but gave leave to renew it "on the ground of breach of contract or breach of trust."

¹ 1825, 3 L. J. (Ch.) 209 ; 1 Hall and Twells, 28.

² 1769, 4 Burr. 2332.

No. 7.

June 13, 1887.
Caird v. Sims.

The bill having been amended, and the amendment having been supported by affidavit, the motion was renewed on the ground of "contract" only; and Lord Eldon's decision of the motion is expressed in these words:—"He was clearly of opinion that whatever else might be done with it, the lecture could not be published for profit." That is the whole decision of Lord Eldon. Lord Eldon makes a passing observation (which has been alluded to already by my noble and learned friend, Lord Watson), which requires attention. He says:—"Nor can I conceive on what ground Sir William Blackstone had the copyright in his lectures for twenty years, if there had been such a right as that. We used to take notes at his lectures; at Sir Robert Chambers' lectures also the students used to take notes; but it was never understood that those lectures could be published."

These observations of Lord Eldon are rather of a negative character, and are somewhat loose, but are undoubtedly valuable as shewing that Lord Eldon had in his mind the case of the university professor. But what do they amount to? I am at this moment unaware whether Sir William Blackstone's lectures were ever published as lectures, or that anyone asserted a right to do so, or was prevented from doing so. When Lord Eldon speaks of Blackstone's copyright for twenty years he is obviously referring, not to his lectures as such, but to Blackstone's Commentaries. The Commentaries, which were founded on the lectures, revised, corrected, and enlarged, with notes, were first published in 1765. Nine editions were published in the lifetime of Sir William Blackstone, all revised and added to by the learned author. He prepared also a tenth edition, which was not published until after his death in 1780. He had an undoubted copyright in "The Commentaries" under the Statute of Anne.

Finding a statement in the debate in the House of Commons on the bill of 1835, that the Abernethy suit had been abandoned, your Lordships made some inquiry, with the result that the injunction had been dissolved, but under what circumstances we have been unable to ascertain. I cannot think that *Abernethy v. Hutchinson*¹ is entitled to the great weight that has been attributed to it, and it seems to me to state no principle which ought to guide us in the present case. The public lecturer at a university has no authority of his own to impose

¹ 1825, 3 L. J. (Ch.) 209; 1 Hall and Twells, 28.

² 1769, 4 Burr. 2332.

No. 7. conditions on his pupils or those entitled to attend his lectures ; nor can it be truly said that he could create a trust in his own favour. It is not necessary to consider what the university might do in the exercise of its plenary powers, "for the advancement of religion and learning, and improving and regulating the course of study therein."

June 13, 1887.
Caird v. Sime.

My Lords, in the legal view which I have adopted it is not necessary for me to consider the weighty authorities to which we have been referred ; some of them rather obscured by the extreme length of the judicial reasons. My opinion is that a public lecture delivered publicly at a university by one of its professors in the performance of the public duty he has undertaken becomes by the act of delivery published to the nation, and may be likened to a gift from the university or the professor to the nation.

In the course which the case is now about to take my opinion becomes worthless. I am bound to assume that I am wrong in point of law. Your Lordships' judgment settles the law finally, and in yielding a willing obedience I have, at least, the palliation for mistake in law that I have erred in company with the Lord President, the Lord Justice-Clerk, and four other able and eminent Scotch Judges.

I have only to add that on looking at the debate in the House of Commons¹ I find it stated there by a person who had, or at least ought to have had, the most full and accurate knowledge on the subject, namely, the late Mr Wakley, who was member for Finsbury, and was one of the editors of the Lancet, against which paper the Abernethy case had been instituted, that the suit had been abandoned by the professor in consequence of its having been found that he held the position of a public professor.

INTERLOCUTOR of the Second Division of the Court of Session appealed from, dated the 23d of October 1885, reversed, with the exception of the first three findings of fact, and in respect of these findings, and also in respect that it was admitted by the parties at the bar, and that the cause was heard upon the footing that, according to the opinions of the majority of the consulted Judges, the works complained of are in substance a reproduction of the appellant's lectures, It is declared that the delivery of the said lectures by the appellant to his students, as part of his ordinary course, was not equivalent to publication thereof, and that the appellant is entitled notwithstanding such delivery to restrain all other persons from publishing the said lectures without his consent, and subject to this declaration, that the cause be remitted to the Second Division of the Court of Session with directions to affirm the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute dated the 15th of February 1884, and to find the appellant entitled to the expenses of process incurred by him in the Court of Session : And it is further ordered that the respondent do pay to the appellant his costs of the appeal to this House.

W. A. LOCH—W. & J. BURNES, W.S.—PEACE & Co.—JOHN LATTI, S.S.C.

¹ Hansard, vol. xxx. 3d series, 953.

LORD ADVOCATE (Defender), Appellant.—Lord-Adv. Macdonald—Sol.-Gen. Robertson.

No. 8.

NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY COMPANY (Defenders), Appellants.—
Balfour, Q.C.—Asher, Q.C.

Aug. 1, 1887.
Young v.
North British
Railway Co.

ROBERT WILLIAM YOUNG (Pursuer), Respondent.—*Davey, Q.C.—
C. J. Guthrie.*

Property—Foreshore—Possession—Prescription.—A proprietor, with titles dating from 1804, flowing from a subject-superior, which described his property as “bounded on the south by the sea,” brought a declarator of property in the seashore ex adverso of his lands against the Crown. As he could not recover his immediate superior’s titles, he founded on his own possession on his own titles. He proved that one of his predecessors under the subject-superior had built a retaining wall whereby a considerable portion of the foreshore was reclaimed, that he and they had for more than the prescriptive period been in use to cart drift sea-ware (no ware grew on the shore) in large quantities from the shore for manure, that they had occasionally taken stones or gravel from the shore for various purposes, and that they had built and used a private bathing-house on the shore. The Crown in defence proved that a large quantity of stones had been taken (by fishermen in their boats) from that part of the coast to build a public breakwater, but it was not shewn that any considerable quantity had been taken from the part of the foreshore claimed by the pursuer, or that he or his authors knew what was being done. The Crown further proved that members of the public had taken sea-ware from the foreshore claimed by the pursuer, in creels or in barrows (but they never did so in carts, having only a right of access by foot to that part of the shore); and that they had also taken whelks, mussels, and other shellfish, and shot gulls on the foreshore.

Held (aff. judgment of Second Division) that the pursuer had established a case of prescriptive possession, and was entitled to decree of declarator accordingly.

(In the Court of Session 8th December 1885, 13 R. 314.)

The Lord Advocate and the North British Railway Company appealed.

Ld. Chancellor
(Halsbury).
Lord Watson.
Ld. Fitzgerald.
Lord Mac-
naghten.

LORD WATSON.—My Lords, the respondent and his predecessors in title have been infeft since 1809 in the lands of Colinswell, lying on the north shore of the Firth of Forth, under a charter from a subject-superior, dated 5th and 7th November 1804, in which, as well as in their successive infeftments, the subjects are described as a park or enclosure consisting of 22 acres and 3 roods Scots measure, with the pertinents, bounded on the south by “the sea.” The measurement applies exclusively to the park or enclosure; the boundary includes not only the park or enclosure but “the pertinents,” an expression which may aptly include the solum of the shore between high and low water-marks. I can therefore see no reason to doubt that the learned Judges of the Second Division, in holding that his title gives or purports to give to the respondent a right per expressum to the foreshore ex adverso of his land, followed the settled rule of the law of Scotland, which was thus expressed by Lord Glenlee in Campbell v. Brown, Nov. 18, 1813, F.C.—“When a landholder is bounded by the sea it is true he has a bounding charter. But it is a boundary moveable and fluctuating sua natura, and when the sea recedes he must be entitled still to preserve it as his boundary. The shore is indeed still publici juris, but when the sea goes back the shore advances, and the proprietor is entitled to follow the water to the point to which it may naturally retire or be artificially embanked.”

In any question with the superior who granted the charter of 1804 and his

No. 8.

Aug. 1, 1887.
Young v.
North British
Railway Co.

successors the respondent and his predecessors have all along had a preferable right to the foreshore, but the charter cannot avail him in a question with the Crown unless he can shew that his superior had a right to the foreshore derived from the Crown. No evidence has been produced of the superior's title, and the charter of 1804 must consequently be taken to have proceeded a non habente potestatem. But notwithstanding the defect of the superior's title the Act 1617, cap. 12, gives the respondent a valid right against the Crown if he can prove that he and his predecessors have, by virtue of their infeftments, had continuous possession of the foreshore without lawful interruption for the period of forty years, which have been reduced to twenty years by section 34 of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. c. 94).

The only substantial question raised by this appeal is whether the respondent has proved in point of fact that the foreshore in question has been possessed by the proprietors of Colinswell for the prescriptive period by virtue of their heritable infeftments. Counsel for the appellants did not dispute that the respondent's title affords a good basis of prescription; but they maintained that although his title is capable of being explained by possession so as to include the right of foreshore it does not expressly give him that right. The only material distinction in a question like the present between an express title from a subject-superior and a title not express but susceptible of explanation appears to me to consist in this, that there are certain acts of possession in relation to the foreshore which might in the latter case be attributed to a mere servitude (and would therefore be consistent with the property remaining in the Crown), but which must in the case of an express title be ascribed prima facie to a right of property in the subject.

It is, in my opinion, practically impossible to lay down any precise rule in regard to the character and amount of possession necessary in order to give a riparian proprietor a prescriptive right to foreshore. Each case must depend upon its own circumstances. The beneficial enjoyment of which the foreshore admits, consistently with the rights of navigation and of the general public, is an exceedingly variable quantity. I think it may be safely affirmed that in cases where the seashore admits of an appreciable and reasonable amount of beneficial possession consistently with these rights the riparian proprietor must be held to have had possession within the meaning of the Act 1617, c. 12, if he has had all the beneficial uses of the foreshore which would naturally have been enjoyed by the direct grantee of the Crown. In estimating the character and extent of his possession it must always be kept in view that possession of the foreshore in its natural state can never be, in the strict sense of term, exclusive. The proprietor cannot exclude the public from it at any time, and it is practically impossible to prevent occasional encroachments on his right, because the cost of preventive measures would be altogether disproportionate to the value of the subject.

Upon the question of fact raised by the evidence in this case I have come to the same conclusion with the Second Division of the Court, and the reasons by which I have been influenced are very clearly stated in the judgment of Lord Young. I think the appropriation of part of the seashore since 1827, and the exclusive exercise of the right of taking drift sea-ware by the respondent and his predecessors, constitute such possession as might have been expected if they had been the grantees of the Crown, and are therefore, taken per se, sufficient to fortify the respondent's title against the claim now made by the Crown.

No. 8.

Aug. 1, 1887.
 Young v.
 North British
 Railway Co.

It was strongly urged by counsel for the appellants that the taking of drift sea-ware is not in itself a sufficiently definite act of possession, and that at all events it ought to be referred to a right of servitude, and not to a right of property in the riparian proprietor. I do not doubt that the right of taking such ware may, as they contended, be the subject of a proper servitude, a circumstance which is conclusive of its being incidental to and part of the property of the foreshore. Why the right ought to be ascribed to servitude, when exercised by a proprietor in virtue of a public easement which professedly gives him the property of the foreshore, I confess that I have been unable to understand. With regard to the relative importance of taking loose ware and the cutting of growing tangle as acts evidencing proprietary right, I can only say that, in my opinion, it depends not so much upon attachment or non-attachment to the foreshore as upon the beneficial character of the right. I should certainly consider the exclusive taking of a valuable annual supply of loose ware to be at least as emphatic an assertion of his right of property by one having an express title to the foreshore as his taking from it a yearly crop of growing tangle of less value. In the present case it is proved that the drift ware taken by the proprietors of Colinswell and their tenants in their right is of considerable annual value, especially when the extent of the property is taken into account. The only difficulty which I have felt in considering this case has been in regard to what is sometimes referred to as contraria possessio, but is better described as concurrent possession by members of the public who have no grant or licence from the Crown. I attach not the slightest weight to the fact that some old women carried off sea-ware in creels for the purpose of manuring their gardens, which were not upon the lands of Colinswell. The removal of clay and stones from the foreshore, which is proved to have taken place at three several periods, is a very different matter. These were in no proper sense the acts of the Crown, but acts of that description, although done without title, tend to derogate from the possession of the riparian proprietor, and if carried far enough will deprive his possession of that exclusive character which is necessary in order to establish a prescriptive right. After careful consideration of the evidence bearing upon these acts, I am satisfied that they were neither of such extent nor of such duration in point of time as to affect the quality of the possession had by the respondent and his predecessors. It seems to be proved that these encroachments by the public (for in my view they were acts of encroachment) were not known to the proprietors of Colinswell, but I do not think the respondent would have benefited by their ignorance if the acts had been more marked in character or longer continued.

I am accordingly of opinion that in these appeals the judgment of the Court below ought to be affirmed with costs, and I move accordingly.

LORD FITZGERALD.—My Lords, we are bound to determine this appeal by the light of Scotch law deduced from Scotch judicial decisions to which we have been referred, and now so well settled as not to be questioned. There seems to have been no difference of opinion between the Lord Ordinary and the Judges of the Second Division that if the feu-charter of 1804 had been a royal gift expressed in the same terms it would, as interpreted by Scotch law, have been sufficient to pass to William Young of Burntisland the exclusive rights which the pursuer now claims.

The grant of 1804 is not a crown grant, nor was it made by one who was

No. 8,
 Aug. 1, 1887.
 Young v.
 North British
 Railway Co.

shown to have derived from the Crown, but on the interpretation of its terms, and especially in the use of the expression "pertinents" (which is of very potent and comprehensive meaning, and sufficient by Scotch law to pass every subject in connection with the land which usually goes to the vassal as accessory to the subject expressly granted), it would, as between the parties to that instrument, have passed to the grantee the seashore ex adverso the land actually granted. The grant not being from the Crown, or from one being a grantee of the Crown, though possibly from the evidence it would be practicable to infer a grant from the Crown, it seems admitted on all sides that the onus is cast upon the pursuer to shew that he has had for twenty years at least continuously and as of right that quiet and peaceable possession without lawful interruption which under the Act of 1617 now protects him from being disquieted by the Crown or any other pretending right.

By possession is meant possession of that character of which the thing is capable. The difference between the Lord Ordinary and the Second Division was one of fact, and I have—but not without some difficulty—adopted the view of the facts and the inferences to be deduced from them propounded by my noble and learned friend.

If the appeal had related to similar rights either in England or in Ireland I would have hesitated much before reaching a conclusion favourable to the pursuer.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading the opinion of my noble and learned friend opposite (Lord Watson), and I entirely agree with it.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, I also have had the advantage of reading the judgment of my noble and learned friend (Lord Watson), and I entirely concur in the judgment which he has delivered, and the grounds upon which he has founded it.

INTERLOCUTOR appealed from affirmed, and appeals dismissed, with costs.

WALTER MURTON—DONALD BEITH, W.S.—W. A. LOCH—MILLAR, ROBSON, & INNES, S.S.C.
 —GRAHAMES, CURREY, & SPENS—COWAN & DALMAHOY, W.S.

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE COURT OF JUSTICIARY,

1886-87.

HER MAJESTY'S ADVOCATE.—Lord-Adv. Macdonald—M'Kechnie, A.-D. No. 1.
ALEXANDER M'LEAN AND OTHERS.—Rhind—Orr—A. S. D. Thomson.

Oct. 18, 1886.
Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
M'Lean.

Mobbing and Rioting—Deforcement—Relevancy—Service of note of suspension and interdict.—An indictment charging the panels with mobbing and rioting and deforcement, in setting forth the modus which was applicable to both of the crimes charged, stated that the messenger-at-arms alleged to have been deforced had been instructed to serve a copy of a note of suspension and interdict and relative interlocutor upon a large number of persons, against whom the prayer of the note was directed, and that the interlocutor was in these terms, "To see and answer within fourteen days : Reserving as to interdict in the meantime"—(with no order for intimation or service). The indictment further bore that the messenger having for the purpose of serving a copy of the note on each of the persons concerned proceeded to the farm of A and there having served copies on certain persons, and having thereafter proceeded towards B for the purpose of serving the remaining copies, a mob at or near A assembled for the purpose of preventing him from fulfilling his duty of serving these copies, and by threats and acts of violence deforced the officer. The panels were charged with forming part of the mob. Objections to the relevancy of the indictment—on the grounds (1) that the duty in which the messenger was said to be engaged when deforced was the service of a copy of the note of suspension and interdict and not of the note itself ; (2) that the interlocutor founded on was not a legal warrant, as it contained no express order for intimation ; and (3) that the deforcement was alleged to have taken place not when the officer was actually engaged in serving, but after he had served his writs at A and before he reached B, where the remainder were to be served—repelled.

ALEXANDER M'LEAN, Colin Henderson, Hector M'Donald, John Sinclair, George William Campbell, John M'Fadyen, Gilbert M'Donald, and Donald M'Kinnon, inhabitants of the island of Tiree, were charged with mobbing and rioting, and also with deforcing an officer of the law in the execution of his duty. The indictment set forth that the Duke of Argyll, proprietor of the island, having presented a note of suspension and interdict praying the Court to interdict the persons named in the schedule annexed to the indictment from committing various acts of trespass and intrusion on the lands and houses of the farm of Greenhill or Grianal, "upon which note of suspension and interdict the Honourable Lord Trayner (Ordinary), officiating on the Bills in the Court of Session, pronounced, on or about the 17th day of July 1886, an interlocutor in the following or similar terms, videlicet :—'Edinburgh, 17th July 1886.—To

HIGH COURT.
Lord Mure.
Justiciary
Clerk.

No. 1.

Oct. 18, 1886.
Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
M'Lean.

see and answer within fourteen days: Reserving as to interdict in the meantime.—JOHN TRAYNER'; and George Nicolson, messenger-at-arms, now or lately residing in or near Haddington Place, Edinburgh, having been instructed by or on behalf of the said Duke of Argyll to serve a copy of the said note of suspension and interdict and relative interlocutor upon the persons whose names, designations, and places of abode are respectively set forth in the said schedule as aforesaid, or some of them, and the said George Nicolson, in pursuance of the said instructions, and in execution of his duty as a messenger-at-arms, and having in his possession a copy of the said note of suspension and interdict and of the said interlocutor, which copy interlocutor was duly certified as a true and correct copy in common form by the Clerk to the Bills in the Court of Session, and which certified copy interlocutor was his warrant in the premises, and the said George Nicolson having, for the purpose of serving upon each of the said persons last above referred to, a copy of the said note of suspension and interdict and relative interlocutor, on or about the 21st day of July 1886, proceeded along with an assistant, and accompanied by an escort of police, to the farm of Balephuill, in the said island of Tiree, parish of Tiree and county aforesaid, and having there served copies of the said writ or writs upon the following persons, whose names, designations, and places of abode are respectively set forth in the said schedule as aforesaid, videlicet:—John Kennedy, Alexander M'Kinnon, Alexander M'Lean, Neil Sinclair, and Malcolm Brown, and thereafter having proceeded towards the farm of Barrapoll, in the said island of Tiree and county aforesaid, along with the said assistant, and accompanied by the said escort of police, for the purpose of serving the remaining copies of the said writ or writs, or some of them, a mob or great number of riotous and evil-disposed persons did, time last above libelled, at or near the farm of Balephuill aforesaid, and at a part thereof, which is sixty yards or some other short distance from the dwelling-house then and now or lately occupied by John M'Lean, a crofter, then and now or lately residing there, all in the said parish of Tiree, and county aforesaid, wickedly and feloniously, assemble in a riotous and tumultuous manner, and in breach of the public peace, and to the alarm of the lieges, for the unlawful purpose of intimidating and obstructing the said George Nicolson, by threats, force, and violence, and preventing or endeavouring to prevent him from fulfilling his duty of serving the copies of the said writ or writs upon the persons whose names are mentioned as aforesaid in the said schedule, other than those persons last above named, or for some other unlawful purpose to the prosecutor unknown, and the said mob or great number of riotous and evil-disposed persons, acting in concert and together for the unlawful purpose aforesaid, did then and there conduct themselves in a violent, riotous, and tumultuous manner, in breach and to the disturbance of the public peace and to the terror and alarm of the lieges, and did in a masterful manner surround, and did use violent and threatening language towards, the said George Nicolson, and did use violent and threatening language towards Charles M'Fadyen, labourer, and Malcolm M'Phee, labourer, both now or lately residing at Scarinish, in the said island of Tiree and county aforesaid, who were then and there present, each in charge of a horse and gig, one of which was hired by the said George Nicolson to aid him in the discharge of his duty aforesaid, and the other by Colin MacKay, now or lately chief constable of the county of Argyll, and now or lately residing in or near Lochgilphead, in the said county, to aid him in escorting the said George Nicolson in the discharge of his duty aforesaid, and did surround the said horses and gigs, and threaten to break the said gigs into pieces and throw them over a cliff.

and did violently seize and take possession of the said horses, and turn them and the said gigs round, and did, in a violent, peremptory, and masterful manner, order the said Charles M'Fadyen and the said Malcolm M'Phee to take their instant departure with the said horses and gigs, and did shout and brandish sticks or other weapons, and did thereby so alarm the said Charles M'Fadyen and the said Malcolm M'Phee that they drove off rapidly and left the said George Nicolson, and the said mob or great number of riotous and evil-disposed persons did behave otherwise in a turbulent and violent manner, and all this, or part thereof, the said mob or great number of riotous and evil-disposed persons did for the purpose of overawing, intimidating, and obstructing the said George Nicolson in the performance of his duty aforesaid, and preventing or endeavouring to prevent him from fulfilling the same, or for some other purpose to the prosecutor unknown, well knowing, or having reason to know, that the said George Nicolson was an officer of the law then acting in the execution of his duty as such, and the said George Nicolson was by the threats and violence of the said mob, or great number of riotous and evil-disposed persons, obstructed and prevented from executing his duty aforesaid, and was deforced, and you, the said Alexander M'Lean, Colin Henderson, Hector M'Donald, John Sinclair, George William Campbell, John M'Fadyen, Gilbert M'Donald, and Donald M'Kinnon did, all and each or one or more of you, form part of the said mob, or great number of riotous and evil-disposed persons, and were actively engaged with, and did aid and abet, the said mob, or great number of riotous and evil-disposed persons in the commission of the foresaid unlawful acts, and the said George Nicolson was thus deforced by you the said Alexander M'Lean, Colin Henderson, Hector M'Donald, John Sinclair, George William Campbell, John M'Fadyen, Gilbert M'Donald, and Donald M'Kinnon, or one or more of you acting in concert as aforesaid."

The panels objected to the relevancy of the indictment on the following grounds ;—(1) The duty of the messenger-at-arms, as set forth in the indictment, was to serve a copy of the note of suspension and interdict. Serving a copy of the note was an act having no legal significance, and was not a duty which only an officer of the law could discharge. The duty alleged ought to have been the service of the note itself. Deforcement could only take place when the officer is executing his duty. (2) The interlocutor of Lord Trayner contained no warrant for intimation or service, which is usual and indispensable, and there could be no deforcement without it. (3) No deforcement could have taken place at the locus libelled, for it appeared from the indictment that the messenger had finished the service of writs at Balephuill, and was on his way to Barrapoll. Deforcement must take place while the officer was in the act of performing his official duty, or in actu proximo. There could be no deforcement of an officer while in transitu.¹ (4) There was no sufficient specification of how the officer was prevented from performing his duty. The threats and acts of violence alleged were not sufficiently set forth, and further did not necessarily infer the crimes charged.

Argued for the Lord Advocate ;—(1) Service of the note consisted in service of a certified copy, and not of the writ itself. That was according to the universal practice of the Court. (2) The interlocutor bore "to see and answer," and no person could see the writ unless it were served on him. (3) It was quite true that an officer could not be deforced before he had taken any steps to do his duty, but in this case the

No. 1.

Oct. 18, 1886.
Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
M'Lean.

¹ Hume, i. 387-8; Alison, i. 493; Macdonald's Criminal Law, 2d. ed. 214.

No. 1.
 Oct. 18, 1886.
 Her Majesty's
 Advocate v.
 M'Lean.

messenger had received some forty writs for service on a like number of persons, who were all alleged to have committed one wrong, and must have acted in concert, and who lived near one another. He had begun the execution of his duty, and had served a number of these writs, and was on his way to the next contiguous place where he was to serve others. It was of no consequence that he might sometimes have a mile or two to go to the next house. (4) The specification of threats and violence was quite sufficient, and amounted to the crimes charged.

LORD MURE.—I do not think that any of these objections is well founded. The point raised in the first is as to the messenger not having sufficient warrant to do what he did, inasmuch as he is not said to have had the principal note of suspension delivered to him for service. Now, section 6 of the Statute 1 and 2 Vict. c. 86, uses the words "note of suspension," and not copy of note, when speaking of service, and there is no doubt that what was handed to him by the Duke of Argyll's agent was a copy of the note of suspension, and not the note itself. It is quite clear from the Act of Sederunt of 1838, which was passed under the power given by the Act 1 and 2 Vict. c. 86, that what is to be served is not the principal writ, which lies in the Bill-Chamber. But while the statute says nothing about a copy being served it directs the note to be served "in common form," and the only way in which service of a note of suspension can be made "in common form" is by means of a certified copy of it, which is expressly directed by the first section of the Act of Sederunt to be "prepared for service," being put into the hands of the messenger to be served in the usual way; and it is admitted that what is alleged to have been here done, viz., giving the messenger a certified copy of the note of suspension, is the invariable practice, and was according to the usual form of serving a note of suspension. The next objection is that Lord Trayner's interlocutor does not contain the words "and to be intimidated." But these words are not a statutory requisite, and the words "to see and answer within fourteen days," in my opinion, clearly imply that there should be service of the note, and the messenger when he received the certified copy of that interlocutor was bound to proceed to serve the note in the usual way. On the other two points there is no difficulty. The deforcement said to have taken place at Balephuill occurred within sixty yards or other short distance of that place, where the messenger had served some writs, and when he was in the middle of discharging his duty, and was proceeding to Barrapoll to serve writs there, and the specification of the modus of the deforcement seems to me quite sufficient. Whether it is proved or not will be for the jury to decide.

THE COURT found the libel relevant.

After evidence had been led the jury found all the panels guilty libelled, but strongly recommended them to the leniency of the Court. The Court sentenced the five panels first mentioned in the indictment to six months' imprisonment, and the remaining panels to four months' imprisonment.

CROWN AGENT—WILLIAM OFFICER, S.S.C.—Agents.

JAMES WALLACE THOM, Appellant.—J. C. Thomson.
THE CALEDONIAN RAILWAY COMPANY, Respondents.—Balfour—
R. Johnstone.

No. 2.

Nov. 12, 1886.
 Thom v. Caledonian Railway Co.

Oppression—Bye-law of railway company—Travelling without proper ticket.

—A bye-law of a railway company provided that “any passenger using or attempting to use a ticket on any day for which such ticket is not available, or using a ticket which has been already used on a previous journey, is hereby subjected to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings.” Held that the bye-law was only applicable to cases where an attempt was made to cheat the company, and that it was oppressive to prosecute for the penalty when there was no such attempt.

B and C left Aberdeen by train for Edinburgh on Sunday. B had an unused half of a return ticket which was still available for some months. C took a single ticket, only available for the day of issue, and not transferable. On their arrival at Perth they alighted from the train, and missed it, apparently accidentally, on its leaving for Edinburgh. There was no other train to Edinburgh on that day. They resumed their journey on the evening of next day. On arriving at Larbert Station, where tickets are checked, B shewed C's ticket as his own. The ticket inspector objected to C's ticket as being only available for the previous day, and required payment of the fare from Stirling (the last station) to Larbert. B refused to pay or to give his name and address, and was handed to the police, and convicted of an offence against the bye-law. Conviction quashed on the ground that this was a case of oppressive application of the bye-law.

Process—Appeal—Competency—Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. c. 62), sec. 3, subsec. (1)—Lodging of bond of caution.

—In a case under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875, it was stated that the bond of caution required by the Act only reached the Sheriff-clerk's office by post on the morning after the statutory period of three days had expired. The Sheriff-substitute stated the case, leaving the question of the competency open as one of the questions of law for the opinion of the Court. The appellant's counsel opened the case on the merits without any objection on the part of the respondents to the competency of the appeal. Held that the facts in regard to the lodging of the bond of caution and the relative question of law were not competently part of the case, and that in the circumstances the Court would not entertain the objection to the competency of the appeal.

Opinion (per Lord Young) that if a bond of caution had not been timeously lodged owing to mishap not attributable to the fault of the appellant, the Court might give relief against the mishap.

JAMES WALLACE THOM, confectioner, Great Hamilton Street, Glasgow, was charged at the instance of the Caledonian Railway Company, before the Sheriff of Stirling, Dumbarton, and Clackmannan, at Falkirk, with having contravened the following bye-law of the Company:—“Any passenger using or attempting to use a ticket on any day for which such ticket is not available, or using a ticket which has been already used on a previous journey, is hereby subjected to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings.”

High Court.
 Lord Justice-
 Clerk.
 Lord Young.
 Ld. Craighill.
 Justiciary
 Clerk.

Thom pleaded not guilty, and at the adjourned diet, on 22d June 1886, after evidence had been led, the Railway Company asked for a conviction only on the charge of violating the bye-laws of the Company by using or attempting to use a ticket on a day for which it was not available. He was convicted on this charge, and sentenced to pay a fine of 10s., and expenses, and failing payment, to five days' imprisonment. He appealed, and craved a case, which was accordingly stated for him by the Sheriff-substitute (Bell). The following were the material facts stated in the case:—“It was proved that the ticket libelled, bearing date 13th June 1886, was paid for at Aberdeen by the witness Dunbar, the appellant's

No. 2.

Nov. 12, 1886.
Thom v. Caldonian Rail-
way Co.

manager, and that the appellant was in possession of a return half of a ticket, which he had paid for at Edinburgh on 9th June, and which was available for six months. The appellant and Dunbar travelled from Aberdeen in the same compartment, and arrived at Perth by the train due there at 3.45 p.m. on the 13th June (Sunday). They, having left the carriage for some purpose, missed the train to Edinburgh (apparently accidentally). They then went to Dundee for the night, returned to Perth next day, and on the 14th June (Monday) came by train from Perth to Larbert via Stirling by the 7.20 p.m. train. At Larbert Station the appellant exhibited the said single ticket libelled to the railway officials, as that in respect of which he was travelling. Said single ticket bore marks of having been checked three times, presumably at Aberdeen and Perth. On being told by the officials that the ticket was not available for that day, the 14th June, and being required to pay the fare from Stirling to Larbert, he refused to do so, maintained that the ticket was still available, refused to give his name and address, and was accordingly taken into custody.

"At the first diet, on 15th June, the appellant pleaded 'not guilty,' and in addition to his defence that the bye-law founded on was not legal, and was practically inoperative, he alleged that he had received sanction from some railway official at Perth, whose name he could not give, to use the said ticket upon the 14th June—the day after it was issued. These grounds of defence were repeated at the adjourned diet of trial on the 22d June, but no evidence was adduced in support of the allegation of sanction having been given, except that of the witness Dunbar, the appellant's manager, who admittedly had been affected by liquor at Perth and on arriving at Larbert; and four of the railway officials at Perth Station negatived the allegation."

It did not appear why the appellant and Dunbar had exchanged tickets, but the Sheriff-substitute stated in the case that "having in view the manœuvring by the appellant in adopting the single ticket libelled on as his own at Larbert Station, and his refusal to give his name and address, a penalty of 10s. with the alternative of five days' imprisonment was imposed, instead of dismissing him with an admonition, which might otherwise have been considered an adequate punishment."

At the close of the case the following statement occurred,—“It is proper to state that the Sheriff-clerk had doubts as to the competency of receiving the bond of caution, which, with the requisite attestation, only reached the Sheriff-clerk's office by post, on the morning of 26th June, the day after the statutory period of three days had expired. But the Sheriff-substitute, while entertaining serious doubts whether the bond of caution had been timeously lodged, has thought it right to state a case, as asked by the appellant, leaving the question of competency open for the decision of the superior Court.”

The questions of law argued before the Court were—“(1) Was it competent for the Sheriff-clerk to receive the statutory bond of caution, when not lodged within three days after sentence, and which, having been sent by post, was not received by the Sheriff-clerk until after expiry of three days? (3) Whether the appellant under the provisions of the bye-laws above quoted was guilty of a contravention of the said bye-law in using or attempting to use on 14th June the railway ticket issued on the 13th June?”

The appellant argued;—In the present case there had been an oppressive use of the bye-law by the Railway Company. It was only applicable to cases where there had been an attempt to defraud the Company. The appellant was under the innocent mistake, if it was a mistake, that he could finish the journey on the following day, if accidentally prevented from completing it on the day the ticket was issued. The bye-law, which depended on sections 101 and 102 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, would be illegal if there were no room under it for innocent mistake. The appellant's counsel closed his argument on the merits without any objection having been stated by the respondents to the competency of the appeal. In reply to the objection to the competency, he argued that the due lodging of the bond of caution was a matter for the Sheriff to dispose of before granting a case. In regard to giving notice of the appeal, it had been held sufficient that such notice should be posted within three days.¹

No. 2.

Nov. 12, 1886.
Thom v. Caledonian Railway Co.

The respondents then argued;—The appeal was incompetent, as the bond of caution had not been lodged within the statutory period of three days—(Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, section 3, subsection 1*). The lodging of the bond of caution was a condition precedent to the stating of a case. The bond must be in the hands of the clerk, and there was no reference to posting as in subsection 5,† which was in marked contrast. The cases under that subsection had no bearing. On the merits they argued;—There had been no oppressive use of the bye-law, as the appellant had refused either to pay the fare demanded or to give his name and address. Had he done the latter he would have been protected from detention under the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, sec. 146.‡ The Sheriff-substitute was of opinion that there had been “manœuvring” in regard to the ticket, which was a fact not open to review.

Lord Young.—This appeal is brought under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, which in certain cases, and, indeed, in almost all cases of summary convictions, allows an appeal to this Court on questions of law upon a case stated. The appellant complains of errors in law in a conviction obtained against him by the respondents before the Sheriff-substitute of Stirlingshire at Falkirk. The case sets out the facts and the legal questions on which the appeal is brought, and on which our judgment is desired. The case ought

¹ Charleson v. Duffes, June 10, 1881, 4 Coup. 470, 8 R. (Just. Ca.) 34.

* 38 and 39 Vict. c. 62, sec. 3, provides, subsec. 1,—“The appellant shall not be entitled to have a case stated and delivered to him unless within the said three days he shall (1) lodge in the hands of the Clerk of Court a bond with a sufficient cautioner for answering and abiding by the judgment of the superior Court in the appeal and paying the costs, should any be awarded by that Court, or otherwise, in the discretion of the inferior Judge, shall consign in the hands of the Clerk of Court such sum as may be fixed by the inferior Judge to meet the penalty awarded, if any, and the said costs of the superior Court.”

† Subsection 5 provides,—“The appellant shall, within three days after receiving the case, give notice of appeal in writing, together with a copy of the case to the respondent, and shall within the same time transmit the case by post to, or cause it to be lodged with one of the clerks of the superior Court, together with a certificate under the hand of himself or of his law-agent of intimation as herein required having been made to the respondent.”

‡ 8 and 9 Vict. c. 33, sec. 146.—“It shall be lawful for any officer or agent of the company, and all persons called by him to his assistance, to seize and detain any person who shall be found committing any offence against the provisions of this or the special Act, or any Act incorporated therewith, and whose name and residence shall be unknown to such officer or agent, and convey him with all convenient dispatch before the Sheriff or a Justice without any warrant or other authority than this or the special Act, and such Sheriff or Justice shall proceed with all convenient dispatch in the matter of the complaint against such offender.”

No. 2.

Nov. 12, 1886.
 Thom v. Cal-
 donian Rail-
 way Co.

to set out the facts upon which the judgment appealed against proceeds, and nothing else. I was therefore struck with this statement in the case before us, that "the Sheriff-clerk had doubts as to the competency of receiving the bond of caution, which, with the requisite attestation, only reached the Sheriff-clerk's office by post on the morning of 26th June, the day after the statutory period of three days had expired." That is not a fact having any relation whatever to the judgment appealed against. The facts to be set forth in the case are the facts which the inferior Judge or magistrate held proved, and on which he pronounced the judgment of condemnation or acquittal appealed against. This fact, assuming it to be a fact, is not within a case stated under the Act of Parliament, nor is the question whether or not the bond of caution was lodged in time. It is quite a proper question for a respondent to raise, in the first place before the Sheriff as a reason in his view why no case should be granted, or if the Sheriff repel his objection, as a reason why we are not to consider the case. In short, it is an objection to the competency of the appeal. I stated that I had noticed and was struck by this statement, but when the appellant's counsel was permitted to open the case on the merits without any statement whatever on the part of the respondents that they objected to the competency of the appeal, I assumed that any objection was departed from. I think it would be a course in the highest degree inconvenient to allow a case to be argued on the merits, and then have it stated that there was no appeal that we could hear. I assumed, therefore, that the technical objection was abandoned. There is no substance in it, taking the statement of the Sheriff-clerk that the bond of caution which would have been all right on the evening of one day did not reach him till the morning of the following day. Even if that be the fact, I cannot help thinking there must be—under supposable and not unlikely circumstances—some power in this Court to give relief against a mishap for which the party may be in no wise to blame. The bond may have been posted at such a time that in ordinary course it should have been delivered before closing hours of the third day, and if by accident the delivery was postponed I cannot help thinking there must be some dispensing power in this Court to grant relief against a mishap of that sort. But in the present circumstances I am not disposed to receive the objection at this stage and to require the facts to be gone into. There is no authority for taking the statements in the case for that purpose. I am not disposed to stretch anything in order to receive the objection, and therefore I should be of opinion that the objection to the competency should not be sustained.

In reference to the merits, the whole facts are such that one has a feeling of regret that proceedings should have been taken which were somewhat cruel and harsh, and that this case should ever have been brought. Two friends start from Aberdeen to Edinburgh, the one with a return ticket, which was available not only for that day, but which had still to run for some months, so that that ticket was all right. The other takes a single ticket from Aberdeen to Edinburgh. They missed accidentally the train from Perth to Edinburgh, which was the last train on Sunday night; therefore they were obliged to break their journey. It was stated to us, but it was a mere incidental detail, that, having no friends to stay with in Perth, they went on to Dundee, for which place they could catch a train, remaining there over night. They return to Perth the following day. The one ticket is all right, but the single ticket is said not to be available, and probably that may be so in the sense that it was in the power of the railway officials to refuse to receive it. I should think the ticket collectors would be instructed and authorised to pass the ticket in such circumstances. I should be surprised if it were not so. I cannot commend, as at all likely to command the approbation of the public, the demand for a second fare, the railway company having already received the fare in full. When a passenger presents his ticket at Perth the ticket collector or examiner takes it, presumably examines it, and passes it by checking it off. The appellant could not have got to Larbert without some official examining the ticket in ordinary circumstances. But when he comes to Larbert the tickets are examined again. The ticket collector objects to the single ticket, and says, "This was issued in Aberdeen yesterday, and is not available for to-day. I will thank you for 8d." The appellant says, "It was passed at Perth. I believe it to be a perfectly good ticket." His name and address are demanded, but he will not submit to what he considers an imposition, and being a little haughty on the subject, and refusing to give his name and address, he is handed over to the police. I am surprised, and almost distressed, that the officials at Larbert should have acted so, and still more that the superior officers of the company should have given countenance to such conduct. He gives his name and address after he is handed over to the police, and nevertheless, for the matter of 8d., and without a suspicion of roguery in the matter, he is detained for fourteen hours.

I cannot think that any bye-law would sanction such a proceeding—that is, any bye-law if properly read and construed. The bye-law in question may be very proper if read and applied only to rogues—to people trying to cheat—but this was not a case of that kind at all. It had no aspect of a case of that sort. I am therefore of opinion that upon these facts, and on a proper construction of the bye-law, which is applicable only to persons who intend to cheat, and to evade payment of their fare in a tricky and dishonest manner, that this conviction is not well founded.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD CRAIGHILL concurred, both as to the competency and on the merits.

THE COURT reversed the determination of the inferior Judge, ordained the respondents to repay to the appellant the amount of the fine and of the expenses paid by him in the Sheriff Court, and found the appellant entitled to expenses in both Courts, modified at fourteen guineas.

STURROCK & GRAHAM, W.S.—HOPE, MANN, & KIRK, W.S.—Agents.

ALFRED EVANS FLETCHER, Appellant.—Balfour—C. S. Dickson.
THE EGLINTON CHEMICAL COMPANY, LIMITED, Respondents.—
D.-F. Mackintosh—H. Johnston.

No. 3.

Nov. 13, 1886.
Fletcher v.
Eglinton
Chemical Co.
Limited.

Jurisdiction—Sheriff—Alkali, &c. Works Regulations Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 37)—Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881.—The Alkali, &c. Works Regulations Act, 1881, imposes fines for certain contraventions, and enacts that "every such fine shall be recovered by action in the County Court having jurisdiction in the district in which the offence is alleged to have been committed." The action is to be brought by an inspector, and "for the purposes of such action the fine shall be deemed to be a debt due to such inspector." In Scotland the Sheriff Court is the County Court for the purposes of the Act,

No. 3. "and may sentence the offender to imprisonment for any period not exceeding six months unless the fine and costs be previously paid, and any decision or sentence of such Sheriff or Sheriff-substitute is subject to review and appeal according to law." Held that proceedings for recovering the fines imposed by the statute fall within the Sheriff's criminal jurisdiction, and are competently brought by way of complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, 1864 and 1881.

Nov. 13, 1886.
Fletcher v.
Eglinton
Chemical Co.
Limited.

Complaint—Fine or imprisonment—Limited Company—Relevancy.—A statute making regulations for alkali works enacted that contraveners should be liable to certain fines, and failing payment of fines and costs, to imprisonment.

A complaint against a limited company set forth that the company had contravened the statute in a certain way, "whereby the company" had been liable to a fine and to imprisonment in the event of the fine and costs not being paid, and prayed the Court to convict the company of the contravention, and to adjudge it "to suffer the penalties provided" by the Act.

Objection to the relevancy of the complaint, on the ground that the company was not liable to imprisonment, repelled.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Young.
Ld. Craighill.
Justiciary
Clerk.

ALFRED EVANS FLETCHER, chief inspector, appointed under the Alkali Works Regulation Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. c. 37), with the sanction of Her Majesty's Secretary for Scotland, being the central authority under the said Act, presented a complaint to the Sheriff of Ayrshire, at Ayr, under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, charging "the Eglinton Chemical Company, Limited, manufacturing chemists, Chemical Works, Irvine, . . . with having been guilty of an offence against section 3 of the Act, there having been, on or about said date, escaping from said work into the atmosphere in each cubic foot of air, smoke or chimney gases, one grain and ninety-eight parts of a grain or thereby of muriatic acid, whereby the said Eglinton Chemical Company, Limited, is liable to a fine not exceeding £50, and to the costs of this proceeding, and to imprisonment for any period not exceeding six months, unless the said fine and costs be previously paid."

The complaint prayed the Sheriff to convict the Company of the contravention, and to "adjudge the said Eglinton Chemical Company, Limited, to suffer the penalties provided by the said Alkali, &c., Works Regulation Act, 1881, as the same may be modified or affected by the said Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1881."

The respondents objected to the relevancy of the complaint, and the Sheriff-substitute (Paterson) sustained the objection and dismissed the complaint. The nature of the objection appears from the note to the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, which was as follows;—"The petition sets forth that, in respect of the contravention charged, 'the said Eglinton Chemical Company, Limited, is liable to a fine not exceeding £50, and to the costs of this proceeding, and to imprisonment for any period not exceeding six months, unless the said fine and costs be previously paid,' and prays the 'Court to adjudge the said Eglinton Chemical Company, Limited, to suffer the penalties provided by the said Alkali Works Regulation Act, 1881, as the same may be modified or affected by the said Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1881.'

"Whether the statutory provision empowering the Sheriff to imprison on failure of payment of the fine and costs is to be regarded as providing an alternative punishment, or merely a mode of recovering or enforcing payment of the fine and costs, it is inapplicable to the case of a limited company."

The complainer craved a case.

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was, whether the complaint ought to have been sustained or dismissed, on the ground stated in the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute.

No. 3.

Nov. 12, 1886.
Fletcher v.
Eglinton
Chemical Co.
Limited.

The respondents objected to the competency of the appeal, and of the whole proceedings in the Sheriff Court. They argued;—The case should have been brought in ordinary form in the civil Court and not under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, 1864 and 1881, which applied only to criminal proceedings. The charge was of a contravention of section 3 of the Alkali Works Regulation Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. c. 37),* with a view to recover the fine imposed by that section. But section 22 provided that such a fine was to be recovered by action in the County Court, and was to be deemed to be a debt due to the inspector. The evidence might be recorded, and a party aggrieved either in point of law or on the merits might appeal on a case stated, and the Court of Appeal might draw inferences from the facts stated, as a jury might on the evidence. All the rules relating to ordinary actions and appeals were to apply to this action for a fine. In Scotland the Sheriff Court was to be the County Court, and the Sheriffs' decision was to be subject to review and appeal according to law. The effect of sustaining this proceeding under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts would be to cut off a right of appeal both from the Sheriff-substitute to the Sheriff, and also from the Sheriff Court to the Court of Session and House of Lords, and indeed all right of appeal except on points of law on a case stated. Similar questions were tried by civil proceedings under

* 44 and 45 Vict. c. 37, sec. 3, provides,—“ . . . The owner of any alkali work which is carried on in contravention of this section shall be liable to a fine not exceeding in the case of the first offence £50, and in the case of every subsequent offence £100.”

Section 22 provides,—“The following regulations are hereby enacted with respect to the recovery of fines for offences other than offences against a special rule.

“Every such fine shall be recovered by action in the County Court having jurisdiction in the district in which the offence is alleged to have been committed.

“The action shall be brought with the sanction of the central authority, by the chief inspector, or by such other inspector as the local government board may in any particular case direct within three months after the commission of the offence, and for the purposes of such action the fine shall be deemed to be a debt due to such inspector. . . . The Court may on the application of either party appoint a person to take down in writing the evidence of the witnesses. . . . If either party in any action under this Act feels aggrieved by the decision of the Court in point of law, or on the merits, or in respect of the admission or rejection of any evidence, he may appeal from that decision to the High Court of Justice.

“The appeal shall be in the form of a special case to be agreed on by both parties, or their solicitors, and if they cannot agree, to be settled by the Judge of the County Court on the application of the parties or their solicitors.

“The Court of Appeal may draw any inference from the facts stated in the case that a jury might draw from facts stated by witnesses.

“Subject to the provisions of this section, all the enactments, rules, and orders, relating to proceedings in actions in County Courts, and to enforcing judgments in County Courts, and appeals from decisions of the County Court Judges, and to the condition of such appeals, and to the power of the High Court of Justice, or any Division or Judge thereof on such appeals shall apply to an action for a fine under this Act, and to an appeal from such action in the same manner as if such action and appeal related to a matter within the ordinary jurisdiction of the Court. . . . In Scotland, the Court of the Sheriff or Sheriff-substitute of the county in which the offence is committed shall be the County Court for the purposes of this Act and may award costs to either party, and may sentence the offender to imprisonment for any period not exceeding six months, unless the fine and costs be previously paid; and any decision or sentence of such Sheriff or Sheriff-substitute shall be subject to review and appeal according to law.”

No. 3. the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. cap. 75).¹

Nov. 13, 1886.
Fletcher v.
Eglinton
Chemical Co.
Limited.

The Sheriff-substitute's ground of judgment was also sound. The complaint set forth that this company had incurred the penalties of fine, and failing payment imprisonment, not merely that the statute had imposed them. Both penalties were asked or neither. If the prayer were granted there might be an attempt to imprison the corporators.

Argued for the appellants;—The Sheriff-substitute's ground of judgment was that the complaint set forth all the statutory penalties, and that one of these, viz., imprisonment, was inapplicable to a limited company. But objections might have been taken had the complaint not set out all the penalties.² A complaint did not need to specify the mode of punishment which was most suitable, but only the choice of modes open to the Judge. The Sheriff, if he convicted, need not award imprisonment failing payment of the fine. Under the Summary Procedure Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. cap. 53), schedule K, he could grant warrant of poinding and sale. It had been held competent to proceed against a company under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts.³ As to the objection that the proceedings should have been taken for recovery of the fine as a civil debt, and not under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, the expressions relied on by the respondents were taken from portions of section 22 applicable only to England. Scotland was specially provided for, and the power given to the Sheriff to imprison for a fixed period, failing payment of the fine, according to a well-established rule (recognised in the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, section 28), brought the matter within the Sheriff's criminal jurisdiction. No right of appeal could be affected by the proceedings being in the form of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts.⁴

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Two questions have been argued here ; and the first, a preliminary question, is, whether we are competent to try the question which was intended to be raised in the inferior Court under the Summary Procedure Act. It is maintained that this is a civil debt under the Alkali Works Regulation Act, and that therefore the Summary Procedure Act with its penalties, and the review which we are in the habit of exercising under that statute, are not within the provisions of the Act. I have come to a very clear conclusion that there is no foundation for that argument, and that we should be stretching the words of the Alkali Act, which are founded on, and which refer to the English procedure, in a way which would not be consistent with the other provisions of that statute. The explanation of any apparent difficulty is, that the County Courts in England were thought to be a handy and convenient tribunal to try questions under this Act, which was an important Act for the community ; and as the offences under it were to be punishable by fine and imprisonment, it was thought desirable to make the fines so-called civil debts in the person of the inspector, and recoverable before the County Court, which is a Court of civil jurisdiction. Now, what might be a convenient procedure in England in these circumstances was anything but convenient under the complete system of procedure which we have in regard to penalties in Scotland ; and the question is, whether the words of the statute are so stringent as to exclude that convenient procedure which we

¹ Magistrates of Portobello v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, Nov. 9, 1882, 10 R. 130.

² Thomson v. Wardlaw, Jan. 23, 1865, 5 Irv. 45.

³ Glasgow City and District Railway Co. v. Hutchison's Trustees, March 20, 1884, 5 Coup. 420, 11 R. (Just. Ca.) 43.

⁴ Halliday v. Bathgate, June 1, 1867, 5 Irv. 382.

have in all prosecutions under this statute. I think all difficulty in that matter is removed by the provision of the 22d section—"Any decision or sentence of each Sheriff or Sheriff-substitute shall be subject to review and appeal, according to law." There is no doubt the real meaning of these words leaves it entirely open in Scotland to proceed according to the ordinary forms applicable to the substance of the matter. Now, the substance of the matter is a penalty which has been incurred by a contravention of the provisions of this Act. Such penalties are recoverable every day under the Summary Procedure Act. I am quite clear that it was not intended to exclude the application of it by the terms of this Act. I do not go further into it, for I feel no doubt of the conclusion I have come to.

No. 3.

Nov. 13, 1886.
Fletcher v.
Eglinton
Chemical Co.
Limited.

As to the other question argued, the Sheriff in this case has found that the complaint is irrelevant, because he says it is directed against a copartnery, and it concludes not only for payment of the statutory fine, but, failing payment, for imprisonment; and he says that according to the law of Scotland a company or copartnery cannot be imprisoned. Of course the conclusion for imprisonment against this company is a legal fiction. That is perfectly true; but there has been no attempt here to imprison. There is a conclusion for imprisonment in the complaint. The Sheriff finds that not only irrelevant in itself, but that it makes the whole procedure irrelevant. I do not think so. If the Sheriff had convicted under the complaint, he would not have proceeded to imprison. The £50 would have been paid. Whether paid or not, there are other remedies open for recovering the penalty; and I think it entirely premature to raise this question. I do not go farther into the matter, which has been very ably argued before us, but my opinion is that the complaint is relevant.

LORD YOUNG and LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal; recall the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, and remit to him to proceed: Find the appellant entitled to expenses," &c.

SOLICITOR OF BOARD OF TRADE—J. Y. GUTHRIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

WILLIAM DICKSON, Appellant.—Lyell.

No. 4.

THOMAS LINTON (Public Prosecutor, Police Court, Edinburgh), Respondent.
J. C. Thomson—Boyd.

Nov. 19, 1886.
Dickson v.
Linton.

Public-house—Hotel certificate—Bona fide traveller (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 35), schedule (A) No. 1.—Circumstances which were held sufficient to justify a hotel-keeper in regarding certain persons to whom he sold refreshments on a Sunday as bona fide travellers.

WILLIAM DICKSON, hotel-keeper, Grassmarket, Edinburgh, who held a hotel license for premises there, known as the "Beehive," was convicted in the Police Court, Edinburgh, of breach of his certificate, in so far as upon the 8th day of August 1886, that day being Sunday, he "did open his licensed house in Grassmarket aforesaid, for the sale of exciseable liquors, and did sell exciseable liquors—videlicet, whisky and ale, or one or other of them therein, or on the premises belonging thereto, to Thomas Hatton and to Cecilia Stenison or Hatton, both residing in Stewart Terrace, Edinburgh, or to one or other of them, they not being lodgers in the said licensed house, nor travellers."

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Young.
Lord Young.
Id. Craighill.
Justiciary
Clerk.

Dickson craved a case, which was stated by the Sheriff-substitute

No. 4.

Nov. 19, 1886.
Dickson v.
Linton.

(Sym). It set forth as the facts proved:—"On the Sunday libelled, the appellant's wife supplied whisky and ale to Thomas Hatton, a skinner, and his wife, and that is the contravention charged.

"Hatton and his wife had been living, from the time of their marriage, on 25th June 1886, in Stewart Terrace, Gorgie Road, Edinburgh, with a relative of Mrs Hatton; but on the night previous to the Sunday libelled they slept at the house at Saughton Tanworks which Hatton occupied before his marriage, Mrs Hatton's relative having died in the house at Stewart Terrace.

"They returned to Stewart Terrace on the Sunday morning.

"The name 'Saughton' is given to several houses, all within a short distance to the west of the city boundary, and the furthest point known as 'Saughton' from the 'Beehive' is between two and three miles, Saughton Tanwork being nearer still, and Stewart Terrace, which is within the city boundary, nearer than that.

"On the Sunday libelled Hatton and his wife went out, with the intention expressed at the time, of taking a walk, because Mrs Hatton was 'moping' in the house, in consequence of the death of the relative with whom they had lived, and also of getting some drink for Hatton at the 'Beehive,' he having failed to get drink in the vicinity of Saughton.

"In the course of their walk, and before returning to Stewart Terrace, they went to the 'Beehive.' They were asked by the appellant's wife, before the door was opened, whence they came, and they replied 'Saughton,' and were then admitted; and Hatton wrote his name and 'Saughton' in a book, kept by the appellant in order that persons who use the house on Sunday may put their names in it.

"They were then supplied with the whisky and ale libelled, and on leaving were seen by the police, who, being suspicious of a contravention, questioned them, and then entered the hotel with them, and were shewn the book above-mentioned.

"Thereafter they followed them to the house in Stewart Terrace."

The Judge held that the Hattons were not "travellers" in the sense of the certificate; convicted the appellant of a contravention of his certificate; and, it being a first offence, fined him £3 sterling.

The question of law for the opinion of the High Court of Justiciary was,—“Whether the facts proved are sufficient to warrant the conviction appealed against?”

The appellant argued;—The Hattons had gone out for a long walk, not merely for the purpose of getting drink. They had come on that day from Saughton, which was over two miles from the "Beehive," and had made a circuit on the way. The case fell within the principle recognised in previous decisions.¹ Further, the parties were unknown to the inn-keeper, who was in perfect good faith.

The respondent argued;—The Judge in the Police Court had held that the Hattons were not travellers in the sense of the certificate. That was a matter for him to determine on the evidence, and was not open to review of this Court. *Johnston v. Laing*¹ was in point. At least it was only in very extreme cases that this Court would interfere.² If the Hattons were not travellers, it did not matter whether the appellant thought so. He took the risk of that.³

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In questions like this, there are sometimes cases where

¹ Peplow v. Richardson, Feb. 5, 1869, L. R., 4 C. P. 168; Johnston v. Laing, March 25, 1876, 3 Coup. 250.

² Brunton v. Bremner, Feb. 6, 1878, 4 Coup. 1, 5 R. (Just. Ca.) 20.

³ O'Donnell v. Linton, Nov. 1, 1864, 3 Macph. 6.

the person accused is not morally guilty, and where he did not intend to commit an offence at all. It is necessary that some strictness should be observed in giving effect to the provisions of the statute. Were it not so it would be evaded. On the whole matter here I am of opinion that this case is not made out. I think the Sheriff-substitute has rather misapplied the provisions of the statute in holding that in the circumstances in which these persons received refreshments they were not bona fide travellers, and that he has brought them into a category which their characters did not warrant. No doubt the journey which they took was not a long one. But they had left their house in the morning, and travelled two or three miles, had stopped to get refreshments on the way, and called at this public-house, and told in answer to the question of the appellant's wife where they came from, and then had refreshments from the keeper of the house. I am not disposed to visit the publican with penalties in this case. He, bona fide, believed that they were bona fide travellers. I think the sentence should be set aside.

No. 4.

Nov. 19, 1886.
Dickson v.
Linton.

Lord YOUNG.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I am averse to interfere with the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute in a case of this kind, but I think it a strong case for setting aside the conviction rather than a weak one. I am not absolutely sure that I know all the facts, but so far as they are presented in the statement of the Sheriff-substitute, I think this prosecution ought never to have been instituted. In the most favourable view, it is being far too strict to mark transgression. This man and his wife first had been a long walk. They had this very slight refreshment. They are seen by the police going out of the public-house, and they, being suspicious, question them, and then enter the hotel and are shewn the entry in the book in regard to the place they came from. These people presented the appearance of travellers, and the innkeeper acted bona fide in taking their statement.

Lord CRAIGHILL.—I have come to the same conclusion. In setting aside the decision of the magistrate, I do not think we are doing anything but giving a fair and reasonable construction to the statute said to be contravened. I think the innkeeper acted in perfect good faith. It is plain that his wife believed that these people came from Saughton; and, if so, that they were, in a reasonable sense, bona fide travellers. I think the persons who got the refreshments have also acted in good faith, otherwise if they had not thought that Saughton was far enough away to entitle them to get refreshment they would not have said that they came from Saughton. They shew that they had no desire except to tell the truth. It would require a very strong case to support the conviction.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, and reversed the determination of the inferior Judge.

HORNE & LYEALL, W.S.—MILLAR, ROBSON, & INNES, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 5.

Nov. 20, 1886.
Macbeath v.
Fraser.

THOMAS MACBEATH, Appellant.—Watt.
WILLIAM SUTHERLAND FRASER (Procurator-Fiscal, Dornoch), Respondent.—Wallace.

Sentence—Amendment of incompetent sentence—Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. c. 62), sec. 3.—A Sheriff sitting in the Summary Court sentenced a person to pay a fine of £1, 1s., and ordained him to find caution to the amount of £10 for twelve months. In an appeal, held (dis. Lord Craighill) that it was competent for the Court to amend the sentence to the effect of restricting the period of caution to six months.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Young.
Ld. Craighill.
Justiciary
Clerk.

THOMAS MACBEATH was convicted (along with others) under a summary complaint in the Sheriff Court, Dornoch, of breach of the peace and malicious mischief, aggravated by previous convictions of breach of the peace. He was sentenced to pay a fine of one guinea, and failing payment, to fourteen days' imprisonment, and was ordered to find caution for £10 for a period of twelve months. Macbeath appealed.¹

It was admitted that the latter part of the sentence was incompetent, the Sheriff not having power in a summary trial to order caution for a period exceeding six months (9 Geo. IV. c. 29, sec. 19, and Summary Jurisdiction Acts, 1864 and 1881). No argument was submitted as to the competency of restricting the period of caution to six months.

LORD YOUNG.—I think we do not need any answer here. It is admitted that the period for which the appellant was ordered to find caution is in excess of the Sheriff's power, the rule of law being that sitting in the Summary Court the Sheriff cannot order caution for a longer period than six months, and having ordered caution for twelve months it is conceded that that was in excess of his power, and that to that extent the conviction should be set aside. But in other respects it appears to me, on the appellant's own statement, that the conviction is quite right—(His Lordship then dealt with the relevancy of the complaint). I think we should reduce the period of caution to six months. The Sheriff proceeded on the view that having convicted two panels, and sentenced each to be fined a guinea, he would order the one to find caution for six months, which was within his power, and the other, in respect of his previous conviction, to twelve months. That is in excess of his power. I propose, as being quite reasonable, and in accordance with legal principle, that we should cut down the sentence only so far as it is in excess of the Sheriff's power rather than let the appellant off without any caution at all.

That is my prima facie impression, and I should propose that we should reduce the period to the statutory period of six months.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I agree in everything except as to reducing the period of caution to six months in place of twelve months. There can be no doubt whatever that twelve months was illegal. But I confess I have very great difficulty as to whether we can substitute one punishment for another. We do not make sentences, but we determine whether sentences are or are not according to law.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I entirely agree in the proposed judgment. I have no doubt on the last point. There is nothing to compel us to do what is contrary to the justice of the case. Here the only valid objection to the sentence is that the period of twelve months is beyond the power of the Sheriff.

¹ M'Guire v. Fairbairn, Nov. 9, 1881, 4 Coup. 536, 9 R. (Just. Ca.) 4; Farquharson v. Guthrie, July 15, 1884, 11 R. (Just. Ca.) 55.

I cannot conceive, with the jurisdiction which we have here, that we have no power to do as Lord Young proposes. It would be quite a different thing were there no separable portion of the conviction.

No. 5.

Nov. 20, 1886.
Macbeath v.
Fraser.

LORD YOUNG.—I would refer your Lordships to sec. 3 of the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. c. 62), the Act under which this case is brought. Subsection 9 provides,—“The Superior Court shall have power to affirm, reverse, or amend the determination in respect of which the case has been stated, or to remit the matter to the inferior Judge, with the opinion of the Court thereon, or to make such other order in relation to the matter and the costs of the appeal as they shall see fit.”

THE COURT “sustained the appeal, to the effect of restricting the period for which the appellant should find caution to the period of six months, reversed to that extent the determination of the inferior Judge, and quoad ultra dismissed the appeal.”

WILLIAM OFFICER, S.S.C.—CROWN AGENT—Agents.

SAMUEL MACDOUGALL AND OTHERS, Appellants.—A. S. D. Thomson.
JOHN CAMPBELL MACLULLICH (Procurator-Fiscal of Argyllshire), Respondent.—M'Kechnie.

No. 6.

Feb. 18, 1887.
Macdougall v.
MacLulich.

Procedure—Appeal—Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. c. 62).—An appellant is not entitled to raise on the facts stated in a case under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, any question of law to which he has not specially directed the attention of the inferior Judge in requiring the case to be stated.

Proof—Declaration of accused.—A declaration taken on a charge of assault and mobbing and rioting and breach of the peace held to be competent evidence against the accused in a trial for breach of the peace only.

SAMUEL MACDOUGALL, Archibald Mackay, Donald Mackay, and Donald Clark were tried under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, 1864 and 1881 before the Sheriff-substitute (Campion) of Argyllshire, at Inveraray, on two charges of breach of the peace. They were all convicted of the first charge, and the two former also of the second charge. They craved a case for appeal. In the case the Sheriff-substitute stated in considerable detail the facts proved before him, and the case concluded thus,—“The appellants’ agent objected to the declarations of the accused being read, as the declarations were taken on a charge of assault and mobbing and rioting, and breach of the peace. I repelled the objection, as the charges on which the accused were apprehended and examined related to the same facts as those for which they were on trial before me, although the crime was differently named; and they had been charged in the warrant on which they were examined with the crime of breach of the public peace, for which they were tried before me.”

High Court.
Lord Young.
Ld. Craighill.
Lord M'Laren.
Justiciary
Clerk.

“On the whole evidence, I found it proved that the appellants Samuel Macdougall and Archibald Mackay were present at the times and places libelled, and therefore guilty of breach of the peace as libelled; and that the appellants Donald Mackay and Donald Clark were, as regards the first offence charged, present at the time and place libelled, and guilty of such offence, but otherwise not guilty; and I convicted them all accordingly.”

The questions of law for the Court of Appeal were,—(1) Whether, in admitting the evidence objected to, the Sheriff-substitute’s ruling was sound in law? (2) Whether, on the facts held to have been proved, he was legally warranted in convicting the appellants?

The appellants argued;—There was no overt act proved against any of

No. 6.

Feb. 18, 1887.
Macdougall v.
Maccullich.

the appellants except Archibald Mackay, and it was clear on the case that the Sheriff-substitute thought that mere presence in a crowd implied breach of the peace on the part of all present. [LORD YOUNG.—Was this point stated to the Sheriff? I should suggest to Sheriffs to decline to state a case unless the alleged error in point of law is stated to them.] The Sheriff's attention did not seem to have been called to this when the case was stated. Further, the declarations should not have been admitted. There was a tendency to mislead the accused by examining them on more serious charges than that on which they were otherwise tried.

Counsel for the respondent was not called on.

LORD YOUNG.—This is an appeal under the Act of Parliament upon a question of law on a case stated. In such an appeal we cannot interfere with the Sheriff-substitute's judgment except on a question of law stated to us. I qualify that with the observation that where any legal objection occurs on exhibition of the proceedings as to the relevancy of the complaint or the legality of the conviction we can set it aside as illegal on any such ground manifest on the face of the proceedings, for the statute enables us to pronounce any order that we think just. But our attention is confined to the question of law to be considered on the case. I have already stated my own opinion that where a party is dissatisfied with a conviction or an acquittal, and imputes it to error in point of law on the part of the magistrate, his course is to state the error in point of law, and ask for a case to raise the question, and the case ought to be directed, and, if necessary, strictly confined to such facts as are suitable and necessary to raise the legal question, or questions if more than one. Therefore, with reference to the question stated, not in the case but by the appellants' counsel, whether a party could be convicted for having been present, though innocently present, on such an occasion as this forming the subject of the charge here, I must decline to allow this error to be imputed to the Sheriff-substitute. I do not suppose for a moment that the Sheriff-substitute imagined that if he could characterise the presence of the accused as accidental or otherwise innocent that he would have thought of convicting anyone whose presence he could so characterise. Whether a man was present in sympathy with the rioters on any occasion of riot is a question of fact, and is sometimes a question of some difficulty for the jury or the Judge. How he came into the crowd, how long he remained, what he said, though he was not taking any active part, indeed everything may be taken into account in considering whether his presence was innocent or the reverse. Sometimes people are present out of mere idle curiosity, sometimes with some laudable purpose. All that is a question of fact to be determined on considering the whole circumstances, and I think we cannot here allow the error to be imputed to the Sheriff-substitute, that the quality of the presence was of no importance if the accused were present in point of fact. In reference, then, to the question whether on the facts stated the Sheriff-substitute was legally warranted in convicting, while there are cases where we were satisfied that an exhaustive statement of the facts was made to us in order to determine whether the conviction was legal or not, I do not think the facts are here stated in such a way. I do not think the case was stated with that view, and it was candidly stated to us by counsel that no such question as that now raised was put to the Sheriff-substitute.

The legal question is whether in admitting the declarations the Sheriff-substitute was wrong in point of law. These parties were apprehended and precogni-tions taken, including a full examination before a magistrate on these facts, though the technical term "mobbing and rioting" was the word employed. The precognitions, the preliminary examination, and the commitment would have been exactly the same whatever name had been used to characterise the facts. The name is of no matter of consequence in the preliminary investigation. Our system requires the indictment to be carefully considered afterwards, and even on revision. I am of opinion that we must answer in the affirmative that the Sheriff was right.

No. 6.

Feb. 18, 1887.
Macdougall v.
MacLulich.

LORD CRAIGHILL and LORD M'LAREN concurred.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal.

WILLIAM OFFICER, S.S.C.—CROWN AGENT—Agents.

WILLIAM MACKENZIE (Clerk to the Conon District Fishery Board), Appellant.—D.-F. Mackintosh—Macfarlane.

No. 7.

GEORGE PITCAITHLEY AND OTHERS, Respondents.—C. S. Dickson.

Feb. 18, 1887.
Mackenzie v.
Pitcaithley.

Salmon Fisheries Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 123), sec. 15, subsec. 4—Interpretation of bye-law, schedule E—Size of mesh.

THE SALMON FISHERIES (SCOTLAND) ACT, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 123), sec. 15, subsec. 4, imposes penalties on every person "who fishes for or aids in fishing for salmon with a net having a mesh contrary to any bye-law." The bye-law in schedule (E) of the statute provides "that no net shall be used for the capture of salmon, the meshes whereof shall be under one inch and three quarters in extension from knot to knot, measured on each side of the square, or seven inches measured round each mesh when wet." The Conon District Fishery Board charged George Pitcaithley and other salmon-fishers before the Sheriff of Ross, Cromarty, and Sutherland, with a contravention of the bye-law. The Sheriff-substitute (Hill) found them not guilty. In a case for appeal taken by the Fishery Board he stated in regard to the nets used by the accused that each side of a mesh measured one inch and three quarters from the centre of one knot to the centre of the next knot, but that a ball, which was admittedly seven inches in circumference, could not be passed through the meshes. The question of law for the opinion of the Court was whether the inch and three quarters should be got by measuring from the centre of one knot to the centre of another, or from the side of one knot to the nearest side of the next knot.

The Court remitted to Mr James Leslie, C.E., the only survivor of the Salmon Fishery Commissioners who had framed the bye-law. Mr Leslie stated that "The intention of the original Scotch Salmon Fishery Commissioners in framing the bye-law as to the meshes of nets was that they should be not less than $1\frac{1}{2}$ inches centre to centre of knots, or $3\frac{1}{2}$ inches, if drawn diagonally from knot to knot, between centres, which makes seven inches all round," and pointed out that "if the measure of the mesh be taken from between the near side of the knots that would make the square of the mesh considerably more than $1\frac{1}{2}$ inches, viz., by the difference between the diameter of a knot and the diameter of the twine; and, second, that it would make the round of the mesh considerably greater than seven inches, viz., by one quarter of the circumference of a knot less one diameter of the twine for each corner, or one whole circumference of the knot less four diameters of the twine."

THE COURT having considered the report, stated their opinion that the judgment must be in accordance with it, and dismissed the appeal.

JOHN C. BRODIE & SONS, W.S.—J. & J. GALLETT, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 8.

ANDREW JACK, Appellant.—Rhind.
WILLIAM NAIRNE, Respondent.—G. W. Burnet.

Feb. 18, 1887.

Jack v.
Nairne.

Poaching—Day Trespass Act (2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 68)—Ground Game Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. c. 47)—Farm-servant killing rabbits under authority from his master.—Held that rabbits not being game at common law, a farm-servant snaring rabbits under verbal authority from his master on his master's farm cannot be convicted of trespass in pursuit of conies under the Day Trespass Act (2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 68), and that the provisions of the Ground Game Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. c. 47), sec. 1, subsec. 1, requiring written authority from the occupier to kill ground game, did not apply.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Young.
Ld. Craighill.
Lord M'Laren.
Justiciary
Clerk.

ANDREW JACK, farm-servant, Bowbridge, in the parish of Collace, was charged before the Sheriff of Perth at the instance of William Nairne of Dunsinane of having been guilty of an offence under the 1st section of the Day Trespass Act (2 and 3 Will. IV. cap. 68), "by entering or being upon the complainer's land of Bowbridge, in the parish of Collace and county of Perth, without the leave of the complainer, in search or pursuit of game, or of deer, roe, woodcocks, snipes, quails, landrails, wild ducks, or conies."

Proof was led to the effect that Jack, a yearly servant of the agricultural tenant, and resident on the farm, was found setting snares for rabbits. Evidence was led for him to the effect that he had verbal authority from his master to kill rabbits.

The agricultural tenant produced his lease containing the following clause:—"Reserving also (subject to the provisions of the Ground Game Act, 1880), the whole game on the lands, with the sole and exclusive right, by himself or others to whom he may give permission, to hunt, shoot, and take the same; declaring that for any damage done by the game, or in the exercise of the powers so reserved, the tenant shall be entitled to compensation for injury done to his crops, in the event of such damage exceeding £7 annually, but the tenant shall not be entitled to compensation for injury done by hares and rabbits."

Jack was convicted of the offence charged.

He craved a case for appeal, in which the Sheriff-substitute (Grahame), after setting forth the above facts, stated,—“It was held, without determining whether generally, and where there is no such reservation as in this case, the tenant's right at common law to kill and take rabbits still remained, that the said clause in the lease reserves to the landlord the rabbits on the land.”

The questions of law were:—“(1) Whether, looking to the clause in the lease, and to the provisions in the Ground Game Act, there is in said lease, in respect of the phrase, ‘the whole game on the lands,’ a valid reservation to the landlord of the rabbits on the land, so far as to restrict the tenant's rights to kill or to take the same under the provisions of the Ground Game Act, and specially to the condition set forth in these provisions which requires the authority given to be in writing? (2) Whether the agricultural tenant and the appellant, his servant, resident on his farm, were not at common law, notwithstanding the lease and the terms of provisions of the Ground Game Act, entitled to kill the rabbits? And (3) Whether the complaint was or was not relevant, and whether the appellant did or did not commit a trespass within the meaning of the Act 2 and 3 William IV., chapter 68.”

Argued for the appellant;—It was clear that the tenant had right under his lease to kill rabbits, the game alone being reserved to the landlord. As the appellant had verbal authority from his master, he had been guilty of no trespass under the Act. It would have made no difference had the master's lease reserved the right to rabbits, as the appellant was not bound to know that, and was justified in obeying his instructions.¹

No. 8.

Feb. 18, 1887.

Jack v.

Nairne.

Argued for the respondent;—The effect of the words used in the lease was to reserve to the landlord everything except the statutory right of the tenant under the Ground Game Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. cap. 47). "Game" means game in terms of the statute, which by definition includes in "ground game" hares and rabbits (section 8). If so, the tenant could only give authority in writing to kill rabbits (section 1, subsec. 1). Further, the statute superseded the common law right of a tenant to kill rabbits on his farm, and substituted the more extensive right of killing both hares and rabbits, but subject to the limitations expressed, and, inter alia, to the limitation of requiring a servant to be authorised in writing. The case of Calder was inconsistent with the more recent case of James.²

LORD YOUNG.—This is a clear case. I do not doubt that every argument has been stated that could have been stated. The facts of the case are in a nutshell. A farmer employs his servant to snare rabbits. The landlord's gamekeeper finds him snaring rabbits, and thereupon, on a complaint which charges him with trespassing on land in pursuit of "game, or of deer, roe, woodcock, snipes, quails, landrails, wild ducks, or conies," he is convicted, and the statutory penalty imposed. I should like to remark in passing that it is somewhat ridiculous to charge him with being in pursuit of "deer, roe, woodcock," &c., winding up with "conies"—and the conviction echoes all that. I hope the remarks so frequently made about bundles of alternatives will be attended to, and where the charge is made of being on land in pursuit of rabbits and no more is intended, that no more will be stated. But the question is whether there was any trespass under the Act. I am of opinion, upon the previous decisions and the clear rule of common law, of which these are illustrative, that the appellant was not trespassing in pursuit of game. It is the rule that the tenant of every farm is entitled to kill by snaring or otherwise the rabbits thereon, unless he has otherwise contracted. It is also clear that a contract with respect to game only does not apply to rabbits, which are not game, and therefore the tenant in a lease whereby the whole game is reserved to the landlord is notwithstanding entitled to kill rabbits on the farm. The argument stated is that that is all changed by the Ground Game Act, 1880, which implies an alteration of the common law right of the tenant in this respect, substituting for what he previously had at common law the statutory right to kill both hares and rabbits on certain terms and conditions. I am of opinion that it does not interfere at all with common law rights, and think that perfectly clear. There are certain conditions attached to the right given by the statute (section 1), "provided that the right conferred on the occupier by this section shall be subject to the following limitations." That has nothing to do with the right previously existing at common law; and here there is no right conferred by the section except in addition to the common law, and that is subject to any condition under which it is given. But the right at common law to kill rabbits remains altogether unaffected by the statute. It is said that here by the lease the game was reserved, and that the word "game," as used,

¹ Calder v. Robertson, Nov. 6, 1878, 6 R., Just. Ca. p. 3, 4 Coup. 131.

² James v. Earl of Fife, Jan. 28, 1880, 7 R., Just. Ca. p. 9, 4 Coup. 321.

No. 8. includes rabbits. I think this is clearly not so. I think that is sufficient for the disposal of the case. But the case referred to shews that even this is immaterial, and that on the simple footing that if a farmer tell his servant to go and snare rabbits, or trap rats, or any other kind of vermin, the servant is not required to see a copy of the lease in order that he may know whether he is in safety to obey the order. We held that even where there is a reservation of rabbits in the lease the master's order is a sufficient defence to a servant to go and snare rabbits, and that he is not a trespasser under the Day Trespass Act because of any clause in the master's lease. I have no hesitation in arriving at the conclusion that the conviction is wrong in law, and should be quashed, with expenses.

Feb. 18, 1887.
Jack v.
Nairne.

LORD CRAIGHILL and LORD M'LAREN concurred.

THE COURT quashed the conviction.

BEGG & BRUCE LOW, S.S.C.—G. B. SMITH & DONALD, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 9.

HENRY CLYNE, Appellant.—MacLennan.

PETER KEITH (Procurator-Fiscal of Thurso Burgh Court), Respondent.—

Mar. 18, 1887.
Clynev. Keith.

J. A. Reid.

Theft—Customer carrying off goods on credit against will of seller.—A shopkeeper refused to sell certain goods to one of his customers, unless the customer paid for the goods before delivery. To this the customer agreed, but after the shopkeeper had weighed the goods the customer, who was under the influence of drink, took violent possession of them, and carried them off without payment of the price, 3s., notwithstanding the remonstrances of the shopkeeper. The customer was convicted of theft of the goods. Conviction quashed.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Young.
Ld. Craighill.
Ld. M'Laren.
Justiciary
Clerk.

ON 19th January 1887, Henry Clyne, farmer, Weydale, Thurso, was tried in the Burgh Court of Thurso, at the instance of the procurator-fiscal, on a complaint charging him with theft, in so far as on 31st December 1886, he did from within or near the shop or premises in Olrig Street, Thurso, occupied by Thomas Murray, meal-dealer, "wickedly and feloniously steal and theftuously away take two stones weight or thereby of oilcake, the property and in the lawful possession of the said Thomas Murray, and which oilcake does not exceed the sum of 5s. sterling in value."

The Magistrates, in respect of the evidence adduced, found Clyne guilty of the crime charged, and fined him 10s., with the alternative of seven days' imprisonment.

Clyne took a case. The following were the facts stated:—Clyne had formerly been supplied by Murray with goods on credit, the price of which was at the date of the trial unpaid. Clyne called at Murray's shop on 31st December 1886, at about six o'clock evening, and asked Murray to supply him with a bag of oilcake on credit, which Murray refused to do. Clyne then asked Murray to supply him with four stones weight of oilcake, which he also refused to do, and distinctly informed Clyne that he would not supply him with any oilcake, unless he paid cash for it before delivery, as Clyne was already too deeply indebted to him. Clyne thereupon asked Murray to weigh two stones of oilcake for him, and said he would pay for it before delivery. Murray instructed his shop assistant, Margaret Tait, to weigh two stones of oilcake, but not to give it to Clyne until he had paid for it. She weighed two stones of oilcake, the price of which was 3s. sterling. After she had done so, and as she was proceeding to lay it on the shop counter until Clyne should pay for it, he snatched it out of her arms, and went out of the shop with it to his cart, which was on the street opposite the shop; he then returned to the shop and took a 1s. out of his pocket, which however he did not offer to Murray. Murray called to Clyne to return the oilcake, when Clyne, who had been drinking, became very violent and abusive to him, refused either to pay for the oilcake or to return it, and repeatedly attempted to assault Murray. Murray sent a man named Falconer after Clyne to get possession of the oilcake, when Clyne threatened to split Falconer's skull with the oilcake. He refused to give up the oilcake, and drove away with it. Murray then sent for the police, who proceeded to a hotel, where they found Clyne, and charged him with the theft of the oilcake. He became violent and assaulted one of the police, who after having charged him with the theft of the oilcake, took possession of it out of his cart, which was standing on the street in front of the hotel.

No. 9.
Mar. 18, 1887.
Clyne v. Keith.

The question of law was:—"Whether, in the circumstances stated, the appellant is guilty of the crime of theft?"

LORD YOUNG.—I venture to think that the procurator-fiscal ought to have hesitated before prosecuting this case, and that if he had considered the matter fully he would have declined to prosecute. I do not think that theft is committed wherever the man takes the property of another and makes use of it. It may be a dangerous thing to do, but it may occur in many circumstances where it is not theft. The appellant here was tipsy. That is his excuse. It is a miserable excuse no doubt, and he acted in an altogether rude and unbecoming way, in insisting violently on taking credit for 3s., having only 1s. in his pocket. But I confess that I do not sympathise with the prosecutor who charged him with theft, nor with the magistrates who convicted him as a thief, and I should therefore propose that we should remove that stigma from his character by quashing the conviction. At the same time I should venture to suggest that we should express our disapprobation of his drunken condition and unbecoming conduct by refusing him his expenses.

LORD CRAIGHILL and LORD M'LAREN concurred.

THE COURT quashed the conviction, but found no expenses due.

WILLIAM GUNN, S.S.C.—PHILIP, LANG, & TRAIL, S.S.C.—Agents.

PETER CLELLAND, Appellant.—J. C. Thomson—C. S. Dickson.
A. SINCLAIR AND ANOTHER (Procurators Fiscal of the River-Bailie Court of Glasgow), Respondents.—Sol.-Gen. Robertson—Ure.

No. 10.
Mar. 18, 1887.
Clelland v. Sinclair.

Culpable, reckless, and negligent steering—Collision—Indictment—Specification.—The masters of two steamers which had been in collision in the Clyde were charged in the River-Bailie Court of Glasgow on a single complaint with "culpable negligence and reckless conduct in navigating, directing, managing, or steering steam vessels, whereby a collision took place, and the lives of the lieges were endangered, actors or actor, or art and part, in so far as," at a time and place libelled, the accused "did both and each, or one or other of them, while said vessels were approaching each other, so culpably, negligently, and recklessly navigate, direct, manage, or steer" their vessels "as to bring or cause or permit them to come into violent collision with each other, whereby" the vessels were damaged and the lives of lieges endangered. The charge was found proven against one of the accused, who was fined £3, but against the other

No. 10. it was found not proven. Conviction quashed on the ground that the libel was irrelevant for want of specification of the fault said to have been committed.

Mar. 18, 1887.
Clelland v.
Sinclair.

Observed that if the prosecutor intended to prove that both the masters were guilty of the offence libelled, he ought to have charged them on separate complaints.

Observations on the inexpediency of trying important questions in the River-Bailie Court of Glasgow.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Young.
Ld. Craighill.
Lord M'Laren.
Justiciary
Clerk.

PETER CLELLAND, a licensed pilot, and Duncan M'Tavish, master of No. 4 Hopper Barge, were charged in the Court of the Bailie of the River and Firth of Clyde at the instance of the procurators fiscal of that Court with having been guilty of "culpable negligence and reckless conduct in navigating, directing, managing, or steering steam vessels, whereby a collision took place, and the lives of the lieges were endangered, actors or actor, or art and part, in so far as on Thursday, the 21st day of October 1886, or on one or other of the days of said month, while the said Peter Clelland was in charge or command of the screw steamer 'Horatio,' then sailing down the Firth of Clyde, and the said Duncan M'Tavish was in charge or command of the said 'Hopper Barge,' then sailing up the said Firth of Clyde, and both vessels having met in or near Cartsdyke Bay at Greenock, in said Firth of Clyde, the said Peter M'Clelland and Duncan M'Tavish did both, and each or one or other of them, while said vessels were approaching each other, so culpably, negligently, and recklessly navigate, direct, manage, or steer said vessels, 'Horatio' and 'No. 4 Hopper Barge,' as to bring or cause or permit them to come into violent collision with each other, whereby both vessels were damaged, and the lives of lieges at the time on board both vessels, or one or more of them, were endangered."

The prayer of the complaint was:—"May it therefore please your Honour, on the said Peter Clelland and Duncan M'Tavish complained upon appearing or being brought before you, in virtue of the powers contained in 'The Clyde Navigation Consolidation Act, 1858,' to answer to this libel, to fine and amerciate each in a penalty not exceeding £5, and failing payment, to grant warrant to commit the said Peter Clelland and Duncan M'Tavish to the prison of Glasgow, therein to remain for a period not exceeding sixty days, unless said penalty shall be sooner paid."

An objection to the relevancy on the ground of want of specification was repelled. The accused then pleaded Not guilty.

The Bailie, after evidence, found the charge proven against Clelland, and fined him £3, 3s., but found the charge against M'Tavish not proven, and dismissed him from the bar.

Clelland took a case. The case stated,—"On 21st October last the screw steamer 'Horatio' was sailing down the Firth of Clyde to sea in charge of the appellant as pilot, and 'No. 4 Hopper Barge' was sailing up bound for Port-Glasgow. At Cartsdyke Bay aforesaid the vessels came into collision, the port-bow of the 'Hopper Barge' striking the 'Horatio' midships on the port-side, whereby three plates of said vessel about a foot above the water-line were bent and broken, the engineer's room was burst in, and the port-side of the bridge deck, which was of wood, was broken; one-half of the anchor stock of the 'Hopper Barge' was carried away. . . . I held it proved that 'No. 4 Hopper Barge' was proceeding up the river, keeping closely to her own side of the channel, that the 'Horatio' was sailing down the Firth of Clyde in charge of the appellant, and that the appellant culpably, negligently, and recklessly took the wrong side of the channel with said vessel 'Horatio' when at a considerable distance from said 'Hopper Barge,' and while the vessels were approaching each other, and continued to keep said vessel 'Horatio' on her wrong side of the channel, and so close to the shore as to render it doubtful whether said 'Hopper Barge' could pass with safety on her proper side of the channel, and caused the collision, and that the lives of those on board both vessels were endangered." No. 10.

—
Mar. 18, 1887.
Clelland v.
Sinclair.

The questions of law were:—“(1) Whether the complaint sufficiently specified wherein the culpability of the appellant consisted? (2) Whether on the evidence the appellant was rightly convicted?”

Argued for the appellant;—The complaint was irrelevant for want of specification. All that was libelled was that a collision took place. But the procurator-fiscal was not entitled thus to say, “Let us have an investigation and find out who is to blame.” There should be some statement of the specific fault to be proved.¹ There was nothing in the Clyde Acts to take complaints in the River-Bailie's Court out of the ordinary rules of pleading. The offence charged might be committed in a variety of ways; what the appellant really had been convicted of was the offence of being on the wrong side of the river, which never could have been discovered from the complaint. Even a civil action would require to be more specific.

Argued for the Procurator-Fiscal;—There was here sufficient specification. The complaint was according to the practice in the River-Bailie's Court, but even in the Supreme Court such indictments had been found relevant.² It might be true that in these cases one of the colliding vessels was at anchor, but that was immaterial.

At advising,—

LORD YOUNG.—We have considered this case with some care. For myself, I must own that on reading the complaint I was a little surprised that, if seriously intended, it should have been brought before the Court of the Bailie of the river Clyde. The offence charged is a common law offence, that of so culpably, negligently, and recklessly navigating, directing, managing, or steering two vessels as to bring or cause or permit them to come into violent collision with each other, whereby both vessels were damaged, and the lives of lieges at the time on board endangered. Now, that is on the face of it a very serious offence, such as has repeatedly been tried in the Court of Justiciary both on Circuit and at the High Court. Where life is lost in consequence of culpable negligence and reckless conduct in navigating steam vessels, that is culpable homicide, and may be culpable homicide of a high order however it may have been caused, whether by the vessel running ashore, or on to a rock, or into another vessel; and we have had cases where negligence of a merely negative character has met with serious punishment. But this is a case before the Bailie of the river Clyde, and it concludes for a fine of £5. I should have thought, but I do not give any opinion on the point, which was not argued, that if the offence charged here was seriously meant, and the parties were to be punished accordingly, the Court of the Bailie of the river Clyde was hardly the tribunal to try such a question, and £5 hardly an adequate penalty. But passing from that, and assuming, but without expressing any opinion, that that is a Court in which such an offence may competently and with propriety be tried, I

¹ H. M. Advocate v. M'Alister, Nov. 20, 1837, 1 Swin. 587; H. M. Advocate v. M'Lean, Sept. 21, 1842, 1 Broun, 416; H. M. Advocate v. Henderson, Aug. 29, 1850, John Shaw, 394.

² H. M. Advocate v. Messon, April 29, 1841, 2 Swin. 548; H. M. Advocate v. Macpherson, Sept. 24, 1861, 4 Irv. 85.

No. 10. go on to consider the only question which was argued before us, and which awaits our decision—Whether the complaint here is relevantly stated?

Mar. 18, 1887.
Clelland v.
Sinclair.

It was objected to the relevancy of this complaint that it is not stated wherein the culpa of either the one or the other of the accused persons consisted, and that that ought to have been set forth specifically. It was answered that it is according to usage in indictments in this Court merely to charge culpable, negligent, and reckless steering, whereby the vessel ran upon a rock, or against another vessel which was at anchor, and it was said that that is an authority for a libel in the terms we have here. I do not think so. There can be no culpable, reckless, and negligent steering on the part of a rock or the shore or a ship at anchor; if there is any culpable, reckless, and negligent steering at all, it must be on the part of those who were in charge of the vessel which ran against these obstacles. I can quite understand it to be a relevant complaint to charge the culpable and reckless steering of a vessel on to a rock or the shore or into another vessel at anchor; but when the prosecutor directs his complaint against those who were in charge of two vessels coming in opposite directions, and says that each of the accused in the same way steered culpably and recklessly so that they came into collision, I think that that is quite another matter. The other vessel—take either of them—is according to the prosecution being culpably and recklessly steered. The practical result really is that if two vessels, running in different directions, come into collision, and the prosecutor, as the result of inquiry, thinks that both were being culpably and recklessly steered, he should try those in charge separately. I cannot approve of the course that was taken here of putting both into one libel, and saying they were both alike culpable and reckless. It is plain that it was not intended to libel that they ran into each other intentionally. No sane man would have brought two persons who had done that before a Glasgow bailie, with a complaint concluding for £5 of a maximum fine. What the prosecutor in effect says is,—“There is fault somewhere, and I will put you both into the indictment, and so find out where the fault lay.”

It was explained to us by Mr Dickson that ship captains and pilots are seriously annoyed and injured by these petty prosecutions in the River-Bailie Court. Apparently if the captain of a sea-going steamer is bringing his vessel up the Clyde and she comes into collision with another vessel, both he and the captain or pilot of the other vessel may be tried before the River-Bailie Court. I do not think that that is at all reasonable, and I can well believe that the captains of sea-going steamers should shrink from a trial of their case in the River-Bailie Court. Their reputation and character as seamen are involved far beyond a £5 fine, and I think that in fairness to them the circumstances of such cases should be submitted to a tribunal better fitted to judge of them. Still less do I think it fitting—and that is sufficient for the decision of the present case—that both parties should be brought into Court before the bailie with the statement that both had been guilty of culpable and reckless steering, and so to find out in the course of the trial which is to blame. In this case the bailie came to be of opinion that one of the accused was entirely blameless, because he had kept to his own side of the river, and that the other person was to blame, because he had taken the wrong side. I assume that the bailie is right that one of the steamers was going down the wrong side and when trying to get to the proper side was run into by the other amidships. It would have occurred to me that a £3, 3s. fine was a ridiculous penalty with which to visit such an offence.

But what about the other party? and what about the prosecutor if he knew and intended to present that as his case? That would be totally unjustifiable conduct on the part of any prosecutor. Upon that ground of judgment I have no hesitation, and it is unnecessary to decide that the River-Bailie Court is an inappropriate tribunal for such case, although I personally am strongly of opinion that it is. What I should propose as the ground of judgment on the only question which was argued therefore is that this was an unfitting and unsuitable complaint—unfitting and unsuitable to bring two parties like these together in the same complaint, and merely to say that they were both culpable and reckless, so that they came into collision. The complaint does not meet the facts stated in the case at all, and upon the assumption of these facts it certainly is not such a complaint as any prosecutor should have presented. I propose therefore that we should sustain the appeal, set aside the conviction, and find the appellant entitled to expenses.

No. 10.

Mar. 18, 1887.
Clelland v.
Sinclair.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I entirely agree with your Lordship. I confess that when I read the papers I was surprised at the way in which the complaint had been framed. If the facts proved were in the knowledge of the procurator-fiscal at the time he prepared the complaint, I am quite at a loss to understand how he came to include in it the masters of both these vessels. It is plain in the proved circumstances that one master, and one master alone, was to blame. I think therefore that the master who alone was to blame should alone have been charged, and that he should have been informed in the complaint of the circumstances which constituted the fault which the prosecutor proposed to prove against him. Upon that ground I concur; but more than that, even if the complaint had been sufficient, I think the appellant ought to have been acquitted after the evidence had been led, for the facts proved do not support the case set forth in the complaint; on the contrary, they prove an entirely different set of circumstances.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur. This is not like a case where several persons are charged with the same crime committed in the execution of a common purpose. The two vessels were coming in opposite directions; the crews were strangers to each other; they were probably ignorant of each other's presence until they were close together. The collision may have been the result of the negligence of the one or of the other, or of both, but if the last was the case, then there were separate acts of negligence, and it is not in accordance with the spirit of our law that two persons accused of crimes different in their circumstances should be charged under one criminal libel. I think, too, that the accused is entitled to more specific information as to the facts which constituted the negligence with which he is charged than he obtains under this complaint, which I agree in thinking is irrelevant. I also concur in your Lordship's observation as to the propriety of giving such accused persons the advantage of having their cases tried by a tribunal more fitted to deal with the important questions of responsibility which such cases present.

THE COURT quashed the conviction.

RONALD & BITCHIE, S.S.C.—CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 11.

June 8, 1887.
Morrison v.
Morrison.

JOHN MORRISON, Appellant.—C. S. Dickson.
ALEXANDER MORRISON (Procurator-Fiscal of Elgin), Respondent.—
C. J. Guthrie.

Public-house—Breach of public-house certificate—“Giving out” alone charged.
—A public-house keeper was charged with an offence against the Public-Houses Acts, in so far as at a time and place libelled he did “give out” a certain quantity of whisky in breach of his certificate. He was convicted “of the offence charged,” and appealed on a case stated, pleading, inter alia, that the complaint was irrelevant, in respect that “giving out” by itself did not necessarily import a breach of the certificate. The Court, being of opinion that on the facts stated in the case the appellant had committed a breach of his certificate, refused the appeal.

Public-house—Husband and wife—Proof—Competency of evidence of wife of accused in public-house prosecution.—A public-house keeper, convicted of a breach of his certificate, appealed on the ground, inter alia, that he had tendered his wife as a witness, and her evidence had been rejected by the magistrates as incompetent. The Court, without deciding that the evidence of the wife of the accused in a public-house prosecution was in all circumstances incompetent, refused the appeal.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Young.
Ld. Craighill.
Lord M'Laren.
Justiciary
Clerk.

ON 24th March 1887 John Morrison, public-house keeper, Elgin, was charged in the Burgh Court there, at the instance of the procurator-fiscal, with an offence against the Public-Houses Acts, in so far as he “did give out from the said licensed premises before eight of the clock in the morning of Friday the 11th day of March 1887, and after eleven of the clock at night of Thursday the 10th day of month and year aforesaid, a pint or other similar quantity of whisky to James Mowatt, butcher, residing in North Street, Elgin, in breach of the license certificate held by him.”

Morrison pleaded not guilty, but was convicted “of the offence charged,” and fined £2, 10s., with the alternative of one month’s imprisonment.

He took a case. The following were the facts stated:—“1. That between twelve and one o’clock on the morning in question, two policemen met James Mowatt in Commerce Street, Elgin, when Mowatt, who was the worse of drink, but aware of what he was doing, told them that he wanted a dram, and that he would have one although they followed him till 5 o’clock in the morning. 2. That the policemen, after a little, followed Mowatt to the back door of the appellant’s public-house in Lossie Wynd, Elgin, and saw him standing there. 3. That the policemen, when they saw Mowatt standing at the back door, returned to the front of the house, from which point they could not see the back door, and looking in at a window through a slit or space of about two inches at the top of the window between the roller of the blind and the blind itself, saw the appellant, who had only his shirt and trousers on, filling a black pint bottle with liquid from a metal measure, but could not see what with. 4. That when the appellant ceased filling the pint bottle, he put a cork into it and left the room therewith in a direction which leads to the back door as well as to the upper floor and other parts of the house, but after the appellant left the room the policemen did not see where he went. 5. That soon thereafter (about five minutes), Mowatt came round to the front of the house, when the policemen met him, and found a black pint bottle in the inside pocket of his coat filled or nearly filled with whisky. 6. That Mowatt, before leaving his own house the previous evening, got from his wife 1s. 3d. in money to purchase and take home with him a pint of whisky for their children suffering from toothache. 7. That Mowatt purchased and received a pint of whisky in a black pint bottle in the appellant’s public-house between 10 and 11 o’clock on the same evening, which bottle he put in the inside pocket of his coat, and that he took a pint bottle of whisky home to his wife on the morning in question.

"The appellant's wife was tendered as a witness for him, but her evidence was refused as incompetent.

"Mowatt denied having received whisky from the appellant after 11 o'clock at night, and deponed that the bottle of whisky found on him by the policemen was that purchased by him from the appellant between 10 and 11 o'clock."

The questions of law stated were:—"1. Whether the charge of 'giving out' is relevant? 2. Whether the rejection of the appellant's wife as a witness was justified? 3. Whether the facts proved are sufficient to warrant the conviction appealed against?"

It was admitted at the hearing that the objection to the relevancy implied in the first question was stated to the magistrates and repelled by them.

Argued for the appellant;—(1) The complaint to be relevant ought to have set forth that the accused "did sell and give out." These were the words of the certificate, and it was the result of the authorities that "give out" was merely exegetical of "sell," and could not stand alone in a complaint, as there were many cases of giving out which were not struck at by the Act. The facts proved shewed that both the prosecutor and the magistrates had a difficulty in treating the case as one of selling, and so they charged and convicted under the head of giving out. It was plain that nothing was paid for the whisky, as Mowatt had spent all he had within legitimate hours. Therefore, either on the ground of irrelevancy or on that suggested by the third question, the conviction ought to be set aside. (2) The conviction was also bad in respect that the evidence of the appellant's wife had been improperly rejected. In Bruce v. Linton,² it was no doubt held that the accused himself was not a competent witness in a complaint charging an offence under the Public-Houses Acts, but such an offence was not, properly speaking, criminal—for one thing, the accused might be made liable through the fault of his servant. [Lord Craighill referred to the case of Greenhill v. Stirling.³] A wife's evidence ought therefore to be admitted. Here the case was one of peculiar hardship, for his own mouth being closed, his wife was the appellant's only possible witness, besides the man Mowatt, and she no doubt would have been able to explain away the suspicious circumstances.

The Court did not call on the Procurator-Fiscal.

LORD YOUNG.—The case for the appellant has been very fully and clearly stated by Mr Dickson, but we do not think it necessary to call for any reply. Two objections are taken to this conviction. The first is, that the simple charge of giving out spirits at a given time and place in contravention of the Public-Houses Amendment Act of 1862 is not a relevant charge, inasmuch as there may be disposals of spirits to which the term "give out" is applicable, which nevertheless are not contraventions of the statute. Now, it is a general rule, which we have frequently had occasion to apply in this Court, that either the complaint or the conviction should so specify the facts that the Court may see that the law has not been mistaken by the convicting magistrate. I do not

No. 11.

June 3, 1887.
Morrison v.
Morrison.

¹ Smith v. Stirling, March 6, 1878, 5 R. (Just. Ca.) 24, 4 Coup. 13; M'Petrie v. Cadenhead, March 19, 1885, 12 R. (Just. Ca.) 35; Welsh v. Stewart, May 28, 1886, 13 R. (Just. Ca.) 61.

² Bruce v. Linton, Dec. 13, 1861, 24 D. 184, 34 Scot. Jur. 80.

³ Greenhill v. Stirling, March 19, 1885, 12 R. (Just. Ca.) 37.

No. 11.

June 3, 1887.
Morrison v.
Morrison.

think that that rule applies with any particular force here. We are considering this conviction in an appeal on a case stated by the magistrates, and the facts, according to the case, are these :—That the publican sold a pint of whisky on the occasion specified in the complaint to a customer, who got the whisky, and took it away. That is the result of the evidence of the two policemen, if the magistrates believed them, and they must have believed them, otherwise they could not have convicted, because there was no other evidence. The publican says that that is not true—that he gave out no whisky, so that the issue raised between the prosecutor and the appellant was not the character or quality of the giving out, but whether there was any giving out at all. If there was any giving out, it is certain that it was in contravention of the statute. I am therefore quite prepared to repel that ground of suspension, and in doing so I have this qualification in view, which I now state in supplement of what I have already said, that in any real case, in which the publican says “I did give out whisky, I admit that, but I did so in such circumstances that the giving out was not a giving out in the sense of the statute,” the publican may have perfect safety, for he is entitled to require the magistrates to state a case, and so to enable him to maintain in this Court, as was done successfully in some former cases, that the giving out was not of the character maintained by the prosecutor, but of the character maintained by him.

The second objection to the conviction is that the wife of the appellant was tendered by him as a witness, and her evidence rejected by the magistrates as incompetent. Now that is a large general question, the fact certainly being, so far as we have any information, that in no case under this statute has a wife ever been examined as a witness, and therefore if we should decide that this objection is well founded, taking it in the abstract, we should be deciding for the first time the general question that a wife is in all cases admissible as a witness in a prosecution under this Act. Now, I should desire to avoid deciding this general question, and to make this decision as limited as the exigencies of the case will admit. I do not know whether it is quite logical—prima facie, I rather think it is not—to say that without deciding absolutely and without qualification the question of the propriety of examining a wife in such prosecutions, we may decide that the rejection of the evidence of the wife here is not a sufficient ground of appeal in this case. That would still leave it an open question where the person accused in very special circumstances tendered his wife as a witness to prove a certain specific fact, or certain specific facts, which could not be proved otherwise than by her evidence, and in that way made out a very strong case for allowing her to be examined as a witness to prove that fact or those facts. “Here is a special case,” the accused might say, “The turning point is so and so. My wife is able to give testimony upon that, and no one else is able to give it, and I accordingly tender her as a witness for that purpose.” I am not prepared to say that circumstances such as these might not arise in which the wife's evidence would be admissible. I do not say that the general rule is so general as to exclude such evidence. In the present case it was not stated to the magistrate for what purpose the wife was tendered as a witness, and the appellant's counsel was without information as to any particular fact that she alone could speak to. She was just tendered as a witness generally. I therefore propose to your Lordships that we should reject this ground of appeal also, and all I desire to guard myself against in so deciding is against being supposed to lay down now that in no cases and under no circumstances can we allow a wife to be examined in prosecutions under this Act. On No. 11. the whole matter, I think we should dismiss the appeal.

June 3, 1887.
Morrison v.
Morrison.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I concur in all that your Lordship has said. With regard to the second ground of objection, I think that in the present case the wife's evidence was very properly refused. The course of practice since 1862, and under the Forbes Mackenzie Act, affords sufficient evidence that in ordinary cases the wife is not a competent witness against her husband in public-house prosecutions. No precedent was adduced to us, and I can see nothing exceptional in the facts here.

LORD M'LAREN.—I also concur. In regard to the question of the admissibility of the wife's evidence, I entirely agree in what your Lordship and Lord Craighill have said, that it is only in very special and exceptional circumstances that such evidence may competently be taken. We know that in the ordinary practice of the Criminal Courts there are cases in which the evidence of the wife is admitted—cases of assault in which the wife is the injured party. These are variations of the ordinary rule introduced by the Criminal Courts, and not by statute, and there may be other cases to which it may be found necessary to extend the benefit of the exception. In considering the exceptions to a known general rule, it is impossible to determine beforehand what particular cases are to be regarded as exceptions. It is enough to say of the present case that I do not consider it to be an exception.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal, and affirmed the determination of the magistrates appealed against, with expenses.

BOYD, JAMESON, & KELLY, W.S.—GIBSON & PATERSON, W.S.—Agents.

JAMES GOURLAY, Appellant.—C. S. Dickson.

JOHN LANG (Procurator-Fiscal of the Dean of Guild Court, Glasgow), Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Robertson—Ure.

No. 12.

June 4, 1887.
Gourlay v.
Lang.

Dean of Guild—Guild offence—Alterations "affecting the exterior dimensions" of a building—Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. cclxxiii.), secs. 364 and 365.—The Glasgow Police Act, 1866, secs. 364 and 365, enacts that the proprietors of buildings within the city who, without the authority of the Dean of Guild, alter their buildings "in a manner which will affect the exterior dimensions thereof," shall be guilty of a Guild offence, and liable in a penalty. Held that the insertion of a window 5 feet by 3, which did not project beyond the plane of the wall, in each of two gables of a building was not an alteration affecting the exterior dimensions of the building in the sense of the foregoing enactment.

ON 10th March 1887 John Lang, procurator-fiscal in the Dean of Guild Court, Glasgow, presented a petition in that Court against James Gour- lay, house factor, Glasgow, praying the Court to find that Gourlay had been guilty of a "Guild offence," within the meaning of the Glasgow Police Act, particularly sections 364 and 365* thereof, in so far as he had

HIGH COURT.
Lord Young.
Lord Craighill.
Lord M'Laren.
Justiciary Clerk.

* The Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. cclxxiii.), sec. 364, enacts,—“Every person who intends to erect any building within the city (not expressly authorised by Act of Parliament), or to alter any such building of which he is not the sole proprietor, or to alter any such building of which he is the sole proprietor, in a manner which will affect the exterior dimensions

No. 12.

June 4, 1887.
Gourlay v.
Lang.

altered a building, or part of a building, situated at No. 43 Bridgegate Street, Glasgow, of which he was the sole proprietor, in a manner which affected the exterior dimensions thereof, without a warrant from the Dean of Guild: To find him liable in a penalty not exceeding £50, and to ordain him, if the Dean of Guild should see fit, to restore the building to its former state.

The alterations complained of, which it was not disputed had been made without a warrant from the Dean of Guild, consisted of the insertion of a window, 5 feet by 3, in each of two of the gables of the building. The windows were on the same plane as the rest of the gable, and they had been inserted under an arrangement by which a complaint to the Sheriff under the Public Health Act, 1867, at Lang's instance, as clerk to the Magistrates as the Local Authority of the burgh, to have Gourlay ordained to provide proper means of ventilation in the buildings, had, on 23d February 1887, been dismissed by the Sheriff-substitute, who had previously expressed his approval of the proposed alterations, but without pronouncing a written order.

Gourlay (whose grounds of defence appear from the questions of law to be given immediately) pleaded Not guilty, but was convicted and fined 20s., the Dean of Guild in his note stating that "it has not been considered necessary to impose more than a nominal penalty sufficient to uphold the authority of the Court; and seeing that the alterations made have been a sanitary improvement, the respondent has not been ordered to restore the building to its former state."

Gourlay took a case. The Dean of Guild stated the foregoing facts and the following questions of law:—“(1) Whether the procedure before the Sheriff in the foresaid proceedings under the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, in so far as held proved by me, amounted to an order by the Sheriff to make the alterations complained of; and if so, whether it superseded or rendered unnecessary compliance by the appellant with the provisions of section 364 of the Glasgow Police Act, before carrying out said alterations? (2) And whether I was justified in holding that the forming of the windows in the gable of the building in question is an alteration struck at by section 364 of the Glasgow Police Act?”

LORD YOUNG.—We are all of opinion that the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild Court in Glasgow and elsewhere is a convenient and useful jurisdiction, and we do not wish to do anything which will interfere with it, or hinder its proper and reasonable operation. When new buildings are intended to be erected in a town, or old buildings taken down, or structural alterations made, it is conducive to the public interest and safety in various ways that recourse should be had to a public officer for his sanction to the operations themselves thereof, or to alter any apartment which is registered in pursuance of the provisions hereinafter contained, shall make application to the Dean of Guild for a warrant to do so. . . .”

Section 365 enacts,—“Any person who erects or who alters in any of the respects herein before-mentioned any building within the city, or who converts any apartment which has been so stated to be an apartment not intended to be let or used for sleeping in, to an apartment to be let or used for that purpose, without a warrant, or otherwise than in conformity with a warrant of the Dean of Guild, shall be deemed guilty of a Guild offence and be liable to a penalty not exceeding fifty pounds, besides being bound, if and in so far as required by the Dean of Guild, to take down and remove the said building, or to restore it to the state it was in previous to the alterations thereon, or to alter it in such way as the Dean of Guild shall direct, so as to make it in conformity with his said warrant.”

and to the manner of conducting them. But here we have to deal with a particular case, and the general observations which I have made must be considered with reference to it. The particular case is this: Mr Lang, as clerk to the Magistrates and Town-council of Glasgow, complained to the Sheriff that a house belonging to the appellant was not in a healthy condition, in respect that there was a want of proper ventilation in it; and with the view of preventing further litigation the parties came to consider how this difficulty might best be met, the result being that it was ascertained that by putting one small window into one gable of the house and another small window into another gable, the difficulty might be obviated and the ventilation increased. I say "small" because the windows were to be only five feet high by three wide, which, however, is a pretty large space for ventilation openings—and ventilation, not light, was the main purpose for which it was proposed to have them made. Well, these alterations having been resolved upon and completed,—and the operation was carried out in a way that was entirely unobjectionable, and the windows themselves were not only unobjectionable but highly desirable,—the same officer, Mr Lang, next complained to the Dean of Guild that his old adversary, who had yielded to him in the Sheriff Court, was guilty of a Guild offence, in respect that he had made the windows without having applied for and obtained a warrant from the Dean of Guild; and the Dean of Guild in answer to this application says,—"The alterations which you have made are all right and proper, and in themselves very beneficial, but before making them you should have got a warrant from my Court, and as you have not got one you have committed an offence under the 364th section of the Glasgow Police Act, 1885, which I punish with a fine of 20s." There is then a case stated, the import of which, as regards the facts, I have just given, with two questions for the opinion of the Court, the first of which is this,—"(1) Whether the procedure before the Sheriff in the foresaid proceedings under the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, in so far as held proved by me, amounted to an order by the Sheriff to make the alterations complained of; and if so, whether it superseded or rendered unnecessary compliance by the appellant with the provisions of section 364 of the Glasgow Police Act, before carrying out said alterations?"

I propose that we should not answer this first question as being unnecessary. It was arranged to the satisfaction of both parties that the cause of the complaint to the Sheriff would be obviated on the windows being made as proposed; and the Sheriff, on being satisfied that the cause of complaint had been so removed, dismissed the case. Whether that is tantamount to an order by the Sheriff to make the alterations or not, I do not say—most probably my opinion would be in accordance with the view of the Dean of Guild that it is not—but I do not think it necessary to answer that question, because the answer which I propose should be given to the second question appears to me sufficient for the decision of the case.

The second question is in these terms,—"(2) And whether I was justified in holding that the forming of the windows in the gable of the building in question is an alteration struck at by section 364 of the Glasgow Police Act?"

Now, I understand this question to refer to the very windows with which we are here dealing, and to the forming of these windows. The clause of the Police Act referred to strikes at the making of alterations on a building "in a manner which will affect the exterior dimensions thereof" without the authority of the Dean of Guild, and renders persons making such alterations liable in a penalty.

No. 12.

June 4, 1887.

Lang.

No. 12.

June 4, 1887.
Gourlay v.
Lang.

I think that we must take the language of the clause in the plain common-sense meaning in which a citizen of Glasgow or of any other town would understand it. It is not taking down a building, or a part of a building, in such a manner as to involve danger to the public, and so require the sanction of the Dean of Guild as the guardian of the public safety. It is the alteration of a building in such a manner as to affect the exterior dimensions thereof. That implies that there may be alterations which do not affect the exterior dimensions of the building, and the question here is whether the formation of these two windows is an alteration of the building in a manner affecting its exterior dimensions. Now, I think that, if I wanted by way of illustration to put a case of an operation upon a wall which does not affect the exterior dimensions thereof, I should put this very case of an air-hole or a window, which is not a bow-window, and does not project. I am of opinion, therefore, that the Dean of Guild, in holding that these alterations do affect the exterior dimensions of the building—in holding that technically, for there is no substance in the thing at all, though I do not disparage the technical view—was plainly in error.

I therefore propose to your Lordships to decline to answer the first question, to answer the second in the negative, to sustain the appeal, recall the deliverance of the Dean of Guild, and find the appellant entitled to modified expenses.

LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur in all that has been said as to the interpretation of the clause of the Police Act, and as to the reasonable restrictions on the Dean of Guild's authority. It has fallen to me to have had some experience of the practice in Dean of Guild matters in this city, as your Lordship also has had, and I think that it has never been held, where the proposed alteration neither affects the safety of the building nor its exterior dimensions, nor the rights of neighbours, that it falls within the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild. No doubt it may be a question of degree, but it has long been considered that there may be alterations of so trifling a character as not to require the authority of the Dean of Guild for making them. It may be difficult to lay down a general rule, but it is not difficult in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred to say whether a particular alteration requires the Dean of Guild's authority or not. To take the illustration which your Lordship suggested in the course of the argument, of putting up a clock face on the wall of a house, according to the principle of the Dean of Guild's judgment here such an alteration could not be made without his authority. On the other hand, if the proprietor proposed to convert a large part of a wall of a shop into a plate-glass window for the purpose of exhibiting his goods more favourably to the public, but in such a way that the safety of the lieges might be affected, it may then be necessary for him to apply to the Dean of Guild Court for a warrant to carry out such alterations. Nothing we now say is to be held as negating that.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal: Find it unnecessary to answer the first question in the case; answer the second question in the case in the negative: Reverse the determination of the inferior Judge," with seven guineas expenses.

DOVE & LOCKHART, S.S.C.—CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—Agents.

WILLIAM HESLOP, Appellant.—J. C. Thomson—C. S. Dickson.
GEORGE CADENHEAD (Procurator-Fiscal of Aberdeenshire), Respondent.—
M'Kechnie.

No. 13.

June 4, 1887.*
 Heslop v.
 Cadenhead.

Ship—Employment of person as master who has no certificate—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. cap. 104), sec. 136.—The 136th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, enacts that no ship shall proceed to sea unless the master thereof has a valid certificate under the Act, and that any person who employs any person as master without ascertaining that he is possessed of such a certificate shall incur a penalty.

In a complaint against the owner of a whaling ship for a contravention of the above section, it was held proved by the Sheriff that the accused had employed on board, nominally as icemaster, a person who possessed great experience as a navigator among ice, and as a whale fisher, but had no certificate under the Merchant Shipping Acts, and also another person, nominally as master, who held a master's certificate but was without experience in the two respects named; that, acting under the instructions of the accused, the icemaster assumed the command of the ship from the time she left Scotland till she was abandoned in the Arctic Seas; that he was considered by the crew as master, occupied the master's berth, and with a single exception gave all the orders, although several of the crew deposed that they would have considered themselves bound to obey the certificated master in the event of a difference of opinion; that it was requisite that the person in command should have some special knowledge of ice navigation, and that it would not have been safe to have entrusted the command to a certificated master, however good, who was not possessed of such knowledge; and that the certificated master was entered in the ship's books as master, and signed the articles as such, the icemaster being designed as "icemaster, in full charge." The Sheriff convicted the accused. On appeal the Court (dis. Lord M'Laren) quashed the conviction.

WILLIAM HESLOP, Howie o' Buchan, Aberdeenshire, was charged in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen, at the instance of the procurator-fiscal, with having contravened the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, particularly section 136 thereof,† "in so far as the said William Heslop having, during the period after mentioned, being one of the registered owners, and also the managing owner of the sailing ship 'Catherine,' of Peterhead, a foreign-going ship within the meaning of the said Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, he, the said William Heslop, did, during the period from the 18th of March 1886, to the 29th day of September 1886, employ James Benzie, icemaster or harpooner, then and now or lately residing in or near Maiden Street of Peterhead, in the parish of Peterhead aforesaid, as master of the said sailing ship 'Catherine,' without ascertaining that the said James Benzie was at the time entitled to and possessed of a certificate of competency or service, as required by said Act, and the fact being that the said James Benzie was not at the time of going to sea after mentioned, or during the course of said employment, entitled to or possessed

HIGH COURT.
 Lord Justice-
 Clerk.
 Lord Young.
 Ld. Craighill.
 Lord M'Laren.
 Justiciary
 Clerk.

* Decided June 3, 1887.

† The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. cap. 104), sec. 136, enacts:—"No foreign-going ship or home-trade passenger ship shall go to sea from any port of the United Kingdom unless the master thereof, and in the case of a foreign-going ship, the first and second mates, or only mate (as the case may be), and in the case of a home-trade passenger ship, the first or only mate (as the case may be), have obtained and possess valid certificates. . . . Every person, . . . who employs any person as master, or first, second, or only mate of any foreign-going ship, or as master or first or only mate of a home-trade passenger ship, without ascertaining that he is at the time entitled to and possessed of such a certificate, shall for each such offence incur a penalty not exceeding £50."

No. 13.

June 4, 1887.
Heslop v.
Cadenhead.

of any such certificate, and the said sailing ship 'Catherine' did, on or about the said 18th March 1886, leave the port of Peterhead and go to sea, and did proceed to New Gummilouk, or elsewhere in the Arctic Seas to the complainer unknown, where she was abandoned on or about the 29th day of September 1886, during all which time the said James Benzie continued on board of the said ship as master thereof, and in the employment of the said William Heslop; and the said William Heslop did thus, on or about the 18th day of March 1886, and continuously thereafter up till and including the said 29th September 1886, and at or near the port of Peterhead aforesaid, contravene the said Act, whereby the said William Heslop has rendered himself liable to a penalty not exceeding £50, and with expenses."

Heslop, after stating objections to the relevancy, which the Sheriff (Dove Wilson) repelled, pleaded not guilty, but was convicted, and fined £10.

He took a case. The facts stated were:—“(1) That the ship 'Catherine' of Peterhead left that port on the 18th March 1886, and proceeded to Davis Straits, Hudson Bay, and Melville Bay, to prosecute the whale and other fishings, having on board a crew consisting of William Robertson, master; William Baxter, mate; James Benzie, icemaster; and nineteen other seamen. (2) That said ship arrived among the ice in April, and was abandoned at New Gummilouk, in the Arctic Seas, on 29th September 1886. (3) That accused was the manager owner of the 'Catherine,' and engaged the said James Benzie nominally as icemaster. (4) That the said James Benzie possessed great experience and a good reputation as a navigator among ice, and as a whale fisher, but had no certificate under the Merchant Shipping Acts of competency or service, and that the said William Robertson held a master's certificate, but was without sufficient experience in the two respects named. (5) That Benzie selected the crew and fixed their wages, and that he also engaged Robertson to go the voyage, and took him to the accused, who fixed the wages. (6) That Benzie received £4 a month of wages, 10s. a tun of oil-money, and £4 a ton of bone-money, while Robertson received £2, 10s. a month of wages, 3s. a tun of oil-money, and £1 per ton of bone-money. (7) That when the crew signed articles at the custom-house they did so in presence of the shipping-master of the port, Robertson acting and signing as master and Benzie signing as icemaster. (8) That Benzie, acting, as I held, in view of the whole circumstances, to be proved, under the instructions of the accused, assumed command of the 'Catherine,' and acted as master thereof from the time she left the port of Peterhead until she was abandoned. That he was considered by all the crew as master. That he occupied the captain's berth, and gave all the orders, unless on one occasion, when Robertson gave an order to the carpenter; but that it was at the same time proved by the mate, the first harpooner, and one of the boat-steerers, that, in the event of a difference arising, they would have considered themselves bound in law to have obeyed an order from Robertson in preference to one given by Benzie. (9) That during the voyage Robertson occupied an officer's berth, and that the only stated duties performed by him were those of ship-keeper, in which he took his orders from Benzie. (10) That there is a practice to a certain extent of whaling ships to employ an icemaster to act as master, but the custom was by no means general; one witness stating that in one voyage out of nine, another that in three voyages out of twenty, and a third that in two voyages out of twenty-six, they had acted under an icemaster, while in all the other voyages they had acted under a certificated captain who had practical experience of ice navigation. (11) That it was requisite that the person in command should have special knowledge of ice navigation, and that it would not have been safe to have entrusted the command to a certificated master, however good, who was not possessed of such knowledge.

"There were produced at the trial the ship's articles and list of crew.*

"In these circumstances I found that Benzie was the real master of the 'Catherine,' and was employed by the accused as such. I therefore found the complaint proved, and pronounced" the judgment given above.

The question of law was,—“Whether the facts being as hereinbefore stated, the accused was properly convicted?”

Argued for the appellant;—If the appellant had not employed Benzie he would have fully complied with the Act, yet the ship would not have been so safe. The question really came to turn on this, that Benzie had been allowed to navigate the ship before it entered the ice region, for it could hardly be maintained that after it had done so Benzie ought not to have been allowed to navigate. But whatever Benzie did, he did by permission of Robertson; as appeared from the facts stated in the case, the crew in the event of a difference of opinion between Robertson and Benzie would have felt themselves bound to obey the former. Had Robertson been proved to be incompetent, that would have been a different case, but there was no evidence of that. Robertson was a duly certificated master. He had no special knowledge of ice navigation, and was not required by his certificate to have that; the Board of Trade did not give certificates for such special knowledge, and certificated masters with that knowledge were hardly to be had. It was therefore an eminently proper act to have on board in addition to the master a man who though not in any way certificated was de facto a skilful ice-navigator—as had been done here.

It was also stated for the appellant (and not disputed) that at the Board of Trade inquiry as to the loss of the ship Robertson was regarded as master, and that his certificate was suspended.

Argued for the respondent;—It was not enough to have a certificated master on board, he must be there as master, not as a passenger or as one of the crew. Here the evidence shewed that Benzie from the first assumed the position of master. At all events this was not a question of law, but of fact, and the Sheriff had decided that question of fact—viz., whether Benzie or Robertson was master—adversely to the appellant, and the Court could not get behind that finding.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—(After narrating the complaint and the proceedings)—The offence here charged does not consist in employing a person to fulfil a part, or to fulfil parts of the duties of a master. It is the employing of a person as master, and unless it be shewn that the person who was employed was so employed as to possess the complement of all the duties which are incumbent on a master, it is not possible that the statutory charge can be established. To employ a person as a master means that it is incumbent that he is appointed to a

* The agreement and account of the crew was signed by “William Robertson, master,” and “the particulars of engagement” forming part of the said agreement and account contained, inter alia, the following:—Under the head “Signatures of crew,” the first entry was,—“(1) William Robertson, master to sign first”; then “(2) William Baxter” (the mate); then “(3) James Benzie.” Under the head,—“In what capacity engaged, and if master, mate, or engineer, No. of his certificate,”—the entry applicable to Robertson was,—“52,550 C. of S. master”; to Baxter, “95,559, mate”; and to Benzie, “icemaster, in full charge.” The columns applicable to wages, &c., were blank as regarded Robertson; as regarded Benzie, they gave the figures set forth in article 6 of the statement of facts proved; and as regarded Baxter, the mate, they were £3 of wages, 8s. of oil-money per tun, and £4 of bone-money per ton.

No. 13.

June 4, 1887.
Heslop v.
Cadenhead.

No. 13.

June 4, 1887.
Healop v.
Cadenhead.

master's position, and that the duties which he has to discharge are those which belong to his office. These duties are multifarious. Some have to be performed on shore at the ship's port of departure, others have to be performed on board ship, and there are others which in certain circumstances have to be performed in any port of arrival or at any port at which the vessel may touch. But all belong to the master, and a person that is not appointed to fulfil all cannot be looked on as the master within the meaning of section 136 of the statute. This at anyrate is my reading of the enactment in question. There is, I think, no room for doubt upon the subject. The assumption on which the enactment proceeds is, that there is but one master, and that the person who is doing the recognised duties of master on board is the person to whose office it belongs that these shall be discharged.

What is to be considered therefore is, whether it has been proved that Benzie was engaged as master of the "Catherine." The Sheriff-substitute has so found, and the grounds of his judgment are the duties which he performed in the navigation of the ship from Peterhead to Gummilouk. If the question were, whether or not the man had been employed to navigate the ship there probably could be little if any hesitation in taking the view of the facts that has been adopted by the Sheriff; but the charge is not that he was employed for the navigation of the ship, but that he was employed as master, and whatever he did in the former capacity, though everything may have been done which that special service required, that does not warrant the conclusion that a person so acting had been employed as master. The Sheriff has, I think, overlooked this consideration. He has assumed that the navigation of the ship is everything, and that the person employed in this work was necessarily master. He has held therefore that a contravention was incurred. This view appears to me to be altogether erroneous. There are many duties beyond navigating the ship. There are official duties to fulfil before the ship leaves the port of departure. There are other duties if she returns which have to be performed on her arrival—all by the master, and there are powers which the master is entitled to exercise should there be a case of necessity which no other person on board can fulfil. For example, he is entitled to order necessaries on the credit of the owners. He may hypothecate the ship, he may even sell a portion of the cargo, and there are other the like rights or duties, for they may be the one or the other according to the circumstances in which they may have to be exercised. These are given to him by his appointment as master, but an employment merely to navigate is not an employment by which anything but the duty of navigation is conferred. The judgment of the Sheriff is, I think, open to this further objection. He has limited his views of the evidence simply to what was done in the way of navigation and management of the ship after she was at sea. He has taken no account of the evidence afforded by the conduct of parties before the ship left Peterhead, and of the evidence of the official writings which were executed in fulfilment of the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act. In the agreement and account of the crew of the ship "William Robertson" is set forth, and he signs, as master. Benzie, on the other hand, signs only as icemaster. This was a document prepared and completed at the sight of the custom-house officials, and must, I think, be taken to be the best of evidence as to the persons who were employed in the several situations which were filled by those on board. How Benzie came to do all that was connected with the navigation of the ship has not been explained, and may naturally be the subject of speculation; but he may have done all, and for anything that appears in the proof I think he did all, without being employed as master. That office was filled by Robertson, and as the latter was entitled to and possessed the requisite certificate, there is no ground for the complaint on which the appellant was convicted. Therefore, in my opinion, that conviction ought to be quashed.

No. 13.

June 4, 1887.
Healop v.
Cadenhead.

LORD M'LAREN.—This is a prosecution for a contravention of the 136th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, which provides—confining myself to the part of the section with which we are more immediately concerned—that no foreign-going vessel shall proceed to sea except it be in command of a person who has obtained a master's certificate. Then there are certain provisions with which I need not detain your Lordships. Then the second part of the section provides that—"Every person who employs any person as master, or first, second, or only mate of any foreign-going ship, or as master or first or only mate of a home-trade passenger ship, without ascertaining that he is at the time entitled to and possessed of such a certificate, shall for each such offence incur a penalty not exceeding £50." The averment is that the owners in this case employed Benzie as master of the whaling ship in question without ascertaining that he had a master's certificate; the fact being that Benzie had not a certificate. I think that the requirement of the statute is a beneficial one. In regard to ordinary employments the policy of our times is that employment shall be free, and that the public are to judge of the qualifications of those who carry on their respective trades and professions. There are certain occupations, however, in which the lives, the property, or the reputation of the public more or less depend upon the skill and character of those who exercise such professions. These trades and professions, for reasons of expediency, have been dealt with specially, and with regard to them the Legislature has exacted a certain amount of qualification as necessary for the protection of the interests of those who are served by such professions. In this respect there is no difference in principle between the requirements of the Shipping Act and the requirements of the Acts regulating the admission of persons practising the learned professions. In all such cases the qualification insisted on is nothing more than a minimum qualification. Now, that means nothing more than this—that so far as an examination can ascertain the possession of the qualification necessary for the trade or profession, the candidate for admission shall possess the minimum amount of knowledge which such examination prescribes. If he passes the examination satisfactorily, he is held to possess the minimum amount of knowledge required in anyone carrying on that profession or occupation. I think it can hardly be doubted that the master of any vessel, and especially any foreign-going vessel, ought to be required to give evidence of a certain minimum standard of proficiency in the business of navigation of a ship, and in those matters that cannot be learned by mere experience before the mast, but only by instruction. For instance, he must give evidence of his ability to determine the ship's position by astronomical observation, and after such observation he must be able by means of a chart to find out the position of the vessel, and hence the proper course which he should steer. That is a thing that no man can learn by experience, and which, therefore, is part of the information which he is required to possess before he can take command of a ship. I take it that the purpose of the Legislature in imposing the penalty in the section quoted is to prevent shipowners engaging as de facto commanders of vessels persons who do not possess the requisite qualifications.

No. 13.

June 4, 1887.
Healop v.
Cadenhead.

There are no doubt other qualifications which a shipmaster ought to possess, and which can only be learned by experience. Probably in different parts of the world the experience necessary to make a completely equipped navigator will be very different. It is quite evident upon the statements in this case that a man may be a certificated master and yet may not be qualified to navigate a vessel in the Arctic Seas, whether with the view of whale fishing or seal fishing, or for any other purpose. Without experience it is impossible for him to know thoroughly the dangers of the ice and how to guard against them, how to avoid getting into the ice, and how to extricate himself after he is in. All such things are learned only by experience, which may be gained either before or after the admission to the professional position of master. But surely it is quite possible to find a person competent to take the command of a whaling ship who has a master's certificate, and who has also acquired the kind of knowledge at which I have pointed. If such a person cannot be readily found, I confess I do not see any legal or practical objection to engaging two persons, one a certificated master who will really command the ship in all matters relating to navigation; and another who will conduct the whale-fishing and advise with the captain in matters where knowledge of ice is specially required. If that had been all that was done in this case, I should not have expected the Sheriff to convict the person charged with the offence under this statute. I think it is no offence under the statute, and that it is not within the reason and scope of the provision at all that, in addition to the services of a real shipmaster, the owner should engage a person described as icemaster to be of use specially in conducting the business of the ship in the Arctic Seas. But the case of the prosecution here is that James Benzie, who is described in the contract of employment as icemaster, was employed by the owners to go on board this ship and really to command it, although along with him, to satisfy the requirements of the Act, Robertson, a certificated master, was also employed—not employed to act as master, but to comply with the supposed provisions of the statute. Now, the facts must be ascertained from the statements of the Sheriff in the case. It appears to me that the eighth statement of fact really settles the question, because the Sheriff finds that Benzie acting, as he holds in view of the whole circumstances proved, under the instructions of the accused,—that is, of the shipowners—assumed the command of the “Catherine,” and acted as master until she was abandoned. He evidently was considered to be the master. The Sheriff goes on to give the particulars that impressed his mind, but that in brief is the finding in fact which he makes—that, acting under the instructions of the accused, Benzie assumed command of the ship and acted as master during the whole course of the voyage.

Now, looking to the reason of the thing, I cannot see that the mere appointment in the character of master of a certificated person who is never to act as master at all, can be a compliance with the statute. What the statute requires is the appointment of a person who is to do the duties of a master. If he is not to do these duties it appears to me that he might as well not be there at all. It is a waste of money to employ him if he is merely to occupy a particular berth and do nothing; and what could have prompted the Legislature, if this is to be allowed, to make this a part of the requirements of the Mercantile Marine Law, I am at a loss to conceive. It is very intelligible that they should have desired that one who was to do the duty of master should have a certificate, but that it should enter into the mind of anyone to suggest that it is good for the ship to have a man with a certificate on board to do nothing is to me utterly inexplicable. Yet that is what the Sheriff has found to be the nature of the arrangement with Benzie and Robertson, made with the consent and under the instructions of the owner.

No. 13.

June 4, 1887.
Heslop v.
Cadenhead.

If I had thought that in this case there had been a division of duty, that Robertson was the navigating officer, and that he only gave up his command to Benzie when in the ice, in the same way as a captain gives up his command to a pilot, the captain nevertheless being entitled to take back the command if he finds the pilot is clearly going wrong, then I should not have held the case to be proved. But it seems to me that the Sheriff's findings amount to this, that by an arrangement between the owners and the men, in order to have the ship cleared out of port, Benzie undertook the duties of master, and was de facto the real master during the whole course of the voyage. That appears to me to be just the thing that the statute was intended to strike at—the employment of an unqualified man. It seems to me that the penalty is not avoided by the employment of a qualified man, who, although able to do some of the duties, was not employed actually in the discharge of these duties. It may be that Robertson could not have navigated the ship as well as Benzie in the Greenland Seas. But I think that what the owners ought to have done, and what would have been a proper compliance with the statute, was to employ a certificated master who had also experience in navigation in the Arctic Seas. I am therefore for affirming the judgment of the Sheriff.

LORD YOUNG.—The facts stated by the Sheriff amount in substance to this—A man of the name of William Robertson, who had a valid certificate, was ex facie employed as master. The contract of employment between him and the owner was that he should be the master. He was entered on the ship's books as master. He was announced to the shipping authorities and to the crew as master. He was endowed with all the authority of master which the law gives to a master. That, I think, is all proved ex facie. He proceeded to sea with the ship. Ex facie therefore the statute is complied with. The ship does not go to sea without a person employed as master entered upon the ship's books as such—without a man put into that position with all the authority attached to it, and possessing a valid certificate. There may be some sham and unreality in the matter, but so far as things are on board the ship, she goes to sea with a man employed as master and possessing the requisite qualifications. If there was nothing else—no other person put on board—the prosecution would be ridiculous, but another person was employed as icemaster. It was explained to us that there is at least a difficulty in finding a certificated master who possesses the requisite knowledge of the Arctic Seas—able to take sole charge of a vessel proceeding there. So much is that the case that the owners of such vessels, while employing certificated masters, find it necessary to conjoin with them—for that is stated to be the practice—persons who from experience have a knowledge of the Arctic Seas and of whale-fishing. And this complaint is founded upon the instructions—I suppose really the tacit instructions following upon a common usage—as to the several departments of these two employees. It cannot signify to the charge under the statute what the comparative wages of these two men are. The statute makes no provision about wages, although the facts regarding the wages may be an element in the case if there be any fraudulent conduct about the matter, or anything of that kind. But there

No. 13.

June 4, 1887.
Heslop v.
Cadenhead.

really can be no suggestion of that sort, because the owner of this ship, like the owners of other ships, can have no interest except to provide for the safety of his vessels in the most reasonable manner. Any interest of his is entirely in that direction, and against any other direction.

The wages, therefore, are of no importance. What you can get a man for must depend upon the supply and demand. You may require a man with special knowledge and training and experience of the whale fishing in those Arctic regions. You have to go and find how many such can be had, and what is the rate at which they are paid. You will have to pay more, if there is a considerable demand for them, than you would have to pay perhaps for certificated masters and certificated mates. But such men are to be had and they have their own price. In accordance with the usual custom such a man was employed here, and in point of fact he had higher wages than the master of the ship, and he took a general charge of the ship. But the safeguard of a certificated master on board, which is all that the statute requires, the safeguard that a master with a valid certificate shall be put in possession with all the authority which the law allows a master was here observed, and there is no provision of the statute about controlling a certificated master by any regulation or order in the due exercise of his authority. The charge resolves itself simply into this, that you, the owner, employed a certificated master, you put him on board in that capacity with the authority attaching to his position, but by your orders and instructions you controlled him in the exercise of his duties. There is no provision in the Act of Parliament that is applicable to that so far as I can find. We are very familiar in the case of yachts, larger many of them than this ship I suppose, where the owner has a certificated master on board, and yet thinks—sometimes justly and sometimes not—that he himself is a very good navigator, and therefore takes charge of the ship. In such a case as that he always supersedes the master, but that is not considered to be the case of a ship going to sea without a master. Then, in the case of a merchant who owns large ships himself going to sea on board of one of them—he has probably been a yachtsman or had some experience—or, as I have known to be the case, been an old ship-captain. I say he is on board, and sometimes he will supersede his captain. He has no certificate, but he takes it into his head to amuse himself, and he may do so at any part of the voyage, by taking charge of the ship. For all that the statute is considered to be complied with, notwithstanding that this merchant or old sea-captain takes it into his head to navigate his own vessel. With respect to the very important view of the case suggested by Lord M'Laren, I mean the policy of requiring examinations—if any astronomical observations are required to be made, or any recourse required to be had to the art of navigation—why, the certificated master is on board ready to be resorted to. He is really a guarantee for safety, and therefore the statute requires his presence there; but if the certificated master is there, the statute is complied with. It says, you shall have a certificated master on board; but I cannot say that because another is on board, and even takes charge of the vessel when passing along the common seas before reaching the Arctic Seas, that is any violation of the statute. Indeed it approaches the ridiculous to say that you violate the statute because the owners have taken an admittedly necessary additional precaution in putting the icemaster on board, who is to have a supereminent charge of the ship, because of his superior qualifications. If he had been absent,—this man with his superior qualifications, and ability to help the ship in difficult situations in the ice,—then this prosecution, instituted in the interests of safety, would not have been competent; but his presence, which only gives additional security, and which is paid for by the party interested in the additional security, is the foundation of the prosecution for the promotion of security. No. 13.

June 4, 1887.
Heslop v.
Cadenhead.

Now, I cannot assent to anything like that. I think the statute has been complied with here, not merely literally, but in the spirit of it, for I think that the spirit of the statute is that a certificated master, who may be resorted to in any circumstances requiring resort to him, is to be put on board in that capacity, and I hold that he has here been put on board in that capacity, for he is entered as such in the ship's books, and consequently he has the statutory authority as master. I think that is all that the statute means to exact. It is all the compliance that the statute requires with its provisions. What has to be done for the management of the ship in particular circumstances, or even generally, the statute does not interfere with.

I am therefore of opinion with Lord Craighill, and, I confess, without sharing any of the doubts which I understand my learned brother at one time entertained, that Robertson was the master of this vessel, and that Benzie was not employed as master. I am also of opinion that the instructions to Benzie as to taking charge were not contrary to the provisions of the Act of Parliament. I therefore think the appeal ought to be sustained and the conviction quashed.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, and quashed the conviction.

ALEXANDER MORISON, S.S.C.—CROWN AGENT—Agents.

ARCHIBALD MACAULAY, Complainer.—Young.

ARCHIBALD MACDONALD, Respondent.—Boyd.

No. 14.

School—Failure to educate children—Education (Scotland) Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. cap. 62), sec. 70—Education (Scotland) Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. cap. 56), secs. 9 and 10.—In order to a prosecution under the Education Acts, 1872 and 1883, for failure to educate children, it is essential that there should be produced either a certificate of failure to educate under section 70 of the Act of 1872, or an attendance order under sections 9 and 10 of that of 1883. June 4, 1887.*
Macauley v.
Macdonald.

ARCHIBALD MACAULAY, crofter, North Uist, was charged in the Sheriff High Court at Lochmaddy, at the instance of Archibald Macdonald, compulsory officer of the School Board of North Uist, with having failed to educate his children, John and Jessie, as required by the Education Acts, 1872 and 1883. No certificate in terms of section 70 of the Education Act of 1872† was produced by the prosecutor, and although an attend- Lord Young.
Lord Craighill.
Lord M'Laren.
Justiciary
Clerk.

* Decided June 3, 1887.

† The Education (Scotland) Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. cap. 62), sec. 70, enacts that the school board may summon before them any parent who fails to perform the duty of providing elementary education for his child or children, and if he shall fail to appear, or to satisfy the board that he has not failed in such duty without reasonable excuse, and if he shall not undertake to perform such duty, "it shall be lawful to and shall be the duty of the school board to certify in writing that he has been and is grossly and without reasonable excuse failing to discharge the duty of providing elementary education for his child or children, and on such certificate being transmitted to the procurator-fiscal of the county or district of the county in which the parent resides, or other person appointed by the school board, he shall prosecute such parent before the Sheriff of the county for such failure of duty as is in the certificate specified. . . ."

No. 14.

June 4, 1887.
Macaulay v.
Macdonald.

ance order under the Act of 1883 * was produced it was dated the year previous, and referred to John and another child of Macaulay's named Mary, but not to Jessie.

The Sheriff-substitute (Webster) convicted Macaulay, and imposed a penalty. Macaulay brought a suspension.

Argued for Macaulay ;—It was a condition of a prosecution under the Education Acts for a penalty for failing to educate children, that either a certificate under the Act of 1872, or an attendance order under that of 1883, should be produced ; here there was neither, for the attendance order produced was a year old, and referred to different children.

Argued for the respondent ;—There was here a substantial compliance with the Act of 1883. The parent had had full notice, and the Judge of a Summary Court was satisfied that the prosecution ought to be entertained, and that was all the Act required. The attendance order produced was in the circumstances enough.

LORD YOUNG.—I am very sorry to interfere with the Sheriff Court proceedings in a case of this kind, but in the circumstances I think it is unavoidable. It is always a delicate matter to interfere with a parent in the education of his children, and therefore the compulsory provisions of the statute ought to be enforced with great discrimination and forbearance. The leading check is the opinion of the school board. The school board must be satisfied that the parent is neglecting his duty as a parent, and has no reasonable excuse. If they are satisfied of that, they may authorise a prosecution before a magistrate, who may decline to find that the parent is neglecting the duty of educating his children, or in his discretion may find that the parent is guilty of that neglect. Here it does not sufficiently appear that the school board satisfied themselves of the parent's neglect. There was no application for a certificate under section 70 of the Act of 1872, nor was there an attendance order under the later Act. There was nothing but an application to the magistrate to punish the parent de plano, and I think that the magistrate, in so proceeding to punish him, has erred. I am of opinion, therefore, that this appeal should be sustained.

LORD CRAIGHILL and LORD M'LAREN concurred.

THE COURT passed the bill and suspended the conviction.

MACPHERSON & MACKAY, W.S.—TODD, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—Agents.

* The Education (Scotland) Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. cap. 56), sec. 9, enacts,—“ If the parent of any child without reasonable excuse neglects to provide efficient elementary education as aforesaid for his child, or fails to secure the regular attendance of his child at some public or inspected school, it shall be lawful for the school board, after due warning to the parent of such child, to complain to a Court of summary jurisdiction, and such Court may, if satisfied of the truth of such complaint, order that the child do attend some public or inspected school willing to receive him and named in the order. . . . An order under this section is in this Act referred to as an attendance order.”

Section 10 enacts,—“ Where an attendance order is not complied with, without reasonable excuse, a Court of summary jurisdiction, on complaint made by the school board, may, if it think fit, impose a penalty not exceeding twenty shillings, with expenses, or of imprisonment not exceeding fourteen days.”

HERCULES SCOTT, Appellant.—C. J. Guthrie.
DAVID THOMSON, Respondent.—J. C. Thomson—Law.

No. 15.

June 4, 1887.
Scott v.
Thomson.

Administration of Justice—Alleged competition of civil right—Day poaching.
—A person charged on a summary complaint with day poaching produced a written permission by a burgh to shoot “over the lands belonging to” the burgh, and alleged that the locus libellè in the complaint formed part of the lands belonging to the burgh. The burgh declined to state whether they claimed the ground in question as their property, and it was not disputed that it was in the occupation of one of the complainer’s tenants. The Sheriff-substitute dismissed the complaint in respect that it involved a question of civil right. On an appeal, held that no question of civil right was involved, and case remitted to the Sheriff-substitute to be tried.

On 30th March 1887 David Thomson, labourer, Bervie, was charged in High Court. the Sheriff Court, at Stonehaven, on a summary complaint, at the instance Lord Young. of Hercules Scott, Esq. of Brotherton, with an offence within the meaning Ld. Craighill. of the Act 2 and 3 Will. IV. cap. 68, in so far as on 15th March 1887, he Lord M’Laren. did, in the daytime, commit a trespass in pursuit of game on a ploughed Justiciary Clerk. field on the farm of Annieston in the parish of Benholm, and county of Kincardine, the property of the complainer.

The case was adjourned till 25th April, on which day the Sheriff-substitute (Brown) pronounced this interlocutor:—“The Sheriff-substitute, in respect the complaint involves a question of civil right, dismisses the same.”

Mr Scott took a case. The facts stated were:—“The respondent pleaded not guilty to the complaint. He produced a written permission in his favour to shoot over the lands belonging to the burgh of Inverbervie, signed by the town-clerk by order of the town-council, and alleged that the place libellèd was on the lands of the said burgh. He further produced a copy of a crown-charter in favour of the said burgh dated 1595, and alleged that the place libellèd was within the boundary therein described. He also produced the Ordnance Survey plan of the district, and alleged that the place libellèd was shewn thereon to be within the boundary of the lands belonging to the burgh. In support of the complaint the appellant produced a notarial instrument in his favour in the lands and estate of Brotherton, recorded in the General Register of Sasines on 23d April 1860, and alleged that the place libellèd was on the lands therein conveyed.”

The question of law was:—“Whether, in the circumstances stated, the proper procedure was to dismiss the complaint?”

At the hearing on the appeal the appellant produced a copy letter dated 15th April 1887, from his agent, Mr Falconer, to the town-clerk of Inverbervie in which, after setting forth the nature of the complaint against Thomson and of the defence, Falconer continued:—“Up to the present time no intimation whatever has been made to Mr Scott by the burgh that any such claim was pretended, and he can scarcely believe that any permission granted by the burgh to Thomson ‘to shoot on the ground belonging to the burgh,’ was intended to authorise Thomson to shoot on the farm of Annieston. In view, however, of the defence put forward by Thomson, and of his case coming up again on Monday, 25th inst., to which date it was continued, I am directed by Mr Scott to call on the burgh to say distinctly whether the authority granted to Thomson ‘to shoot on the ground belonging to the burgh’ was intended to apply to Mr Scott’s farm of Annieston, and whether such a right to that farm, as Thomson stated, is maintained by the burgh.”

No. 15.

June 4, 1887.
 Scott v.
 Thomson.

The reply of the town-clerk, dated 23d April, was to refer Falconer to the terms of the permission granted to Thomson.

The appellant further stated that the ground in question was part of a farm belonging to him, and occupied by his tenant.¹

LORD YOUNG.—I have no hesitation in setting aside the deliverance of the Sheriff-substitute here, and remitting the case to him to be tried, which it has not yet been. The case is this :—A perfectly relevant and unambiguous complaint charging the offence of day poaching against the respondent was presented to the Sheriff-substitute and in ordinary course he ought to have tried it, but he refused to try it and instead pronounced this deliverance :—"The Sheriff-substitute, in respect the complaint involves a question of civil right, dismisses the same." The complaint involves no question of civil right : it simply states that on a ploughed field belonging to the appellant the respondent was found poaching in contravention of the statute. There was nothing to be tried but that. Then there is the case which the Sheriff-substitute has stated, but, how is there in the statements in it any question of civil right raised? Who is the person claiming against Mr Scott of Brotherton's seisin, and his averment that he is in possession of the farm which is worked by his tenant? Nobody in the world, except this alleged poacher, who produces a permission to shoot over the lands belonging to the burgh, and points to a copy of a crown-charter dated nearly 300 years ago, and to an Ordnance Survey map, and says, "You will find that these shew that the place mentioned in the complaint is burgh property, and so is within my permission." But the burgh do not say that the land is theirs—they claim nothing. When asked civilly by Mr Scott whether they did so, they decline to make any answer. They decline to raise any question of civil right. I am of opinion that the whole argument on which the Sheriff-substitute has acted is erroneous. I think we ought to sustain the appeal, and remit to the Sheriff-substitute to try the case, and find the respondent liable in expenses.

LORD CRAIGHILL and LORD M'LAREN concurred.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, answered the question in the case in the negative, recalled the judgment appealed against, and remitted to the Sheriff to try the case, finding the appellant entitled to five guineas of expenses.

COWAN & DALMAHOY, W.S.—D. ROBERTS, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 16.

June 4, 1887.
 Linton v.
 Sherry.

THOMAS LINTON (Procurator-Fiscal in the Police Court of Edinburgh), Appellant.—D.-F. Mackintosh—Boyd.

ELIZABETH SHERRY, Respondent.—Lyell.

Public-house—Penalty—Modification—Home Drummond Act (9 Geo. IV. cap. 58), sec. 30—Public-houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 35), sec. 17—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 33), secs. 3 and 6—Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879 (42 and 43 Vict. cap. cxxxii.), sec. 319.

¹ Respondent's Authority.—Higgins v. Earl of Moray, Sept. 9, 1884, 12 R. (Just. Ca.) 1.

THE EDINBURGH MUNICIPAL AND POLICE ACT, 1879, sec. 319, in dealing with offences against the Home Drummond Act and the Public Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862, enacts that "Every such offence or breach shall be proceeded with, tried, and determined, and all penalties incurred shall be recovered and applied by the Judge of Police in the manner and subject to the conditions provided in the said Acts."

By the Home Drummond Act, section 30, a power was conferred upon the Court of mitigating the statutory penalties to not less than one-fourth part thereof, but that power was taken away by The Public Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862. By the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1881, sec. 3, it is provided, inter alia, that "where there is a general or local Police Act in force, it shall be optional in police prosecutions either to use the forms prescribed by such Act, or the forms provided by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts." Sec. 6, subsec. (a), of the same Act enacts that when the punishment of a penalty or a fine is imposed, the Court may reduce the amount of such fine.

In a prosecution for an offence against the Public Houses Act, which was brought under the Edinburgh Police Act of 1879, and not under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts of 1864 and 1881, the magistrate convicted the accused, but imposed a modified penalty. The prosecutor appealed on a case stated, the question being—"Whether the power to mitigate penalties, conferred by section 6 (subsection A) of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1881, can or can not be competently exercised in proceedings under the Public Houses Act brought in the Police Court of Edinburgh, by virtue of the provisions of the 319th section of 'The Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879'?"

THE COURT, without calling on the respondent, and without delivering opinions, refused the appeal.

W. WHITE MILLAR, S.S.C.—R. H. MACDONALD, Solicitor—Agents.

No. 16.

June 4, 1887.
Linton v.
Sherry.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Young.
Ld. Craighill.
Lord M'Laren.
Justiciary
Clerk.

No. 17.

July 13, 1887.
Nicol v.
M'Neill.

ROBERT NICOL, Complainer.—Strachan—Craighie.

DUNCAN M'NEILL (Procurator-Fiscal of Arbroath Police Court).—Murray
—C. S. Dickson.

Procedure—Competency of summary complaints not under Summary Jurisdiction Acts 1864 and 1881 (27 and 28 Vict. cap. 53, and 44 and 45 Vict. cap. 53)—Sunday Trading—Act 1661, cap. 18.—A complaint in a Police Court at the instance of the procurator-fiscal charging a contravention of the Act 1661, cap. 18, "for the due observation of the Sabbath-day," set forth that the accused was "liable, on conviction, to pay a penalty of £10 in Scots money, or 16s. 8d. in sterling money, and failing payment of said penalty, is liable to be exemplarily punished in his person, namely, to be imprisoned for any period not exceeding twenty days," and prayed that the accused should be punished "according to law." The complaint did not bear to proceed under any of the statutes relating to summary procedure. The evidence of the witnesses was recorded, and the recorded depositions were signed by the respective witnesses and by the presiding magistrate. The accused was convicted. On a suspension, conviction quashed, per the Lord Justice-General, Lord Young, and Lord M'Laren, on the ground that the case of Bute v. More, Nov. 24, 1870, 1 Coup. 495, 9 Macph. 180, decided that a summary complaint for a contravention of the Act 1661, cap. 18, was incompetent, and per the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Mure, Lord Craighill, and Lord M'Laren, on the ground that, even if a summary complaint were competent, the present complaint could not be sustained, not being brought under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts 1864 and 1881.

Observations on the question whether the Act 1661, cap. 18, was in desuetude.

No. 17.

July 13, 1887.
Nicol v.
M'Neill.

HIGH COURT.
Full Bench.
Justiciary
Clerk.

ROBERT NICOL, baker, Arbroath, was charged at the instance of the procurator-fiscal of the Police Court there on a complaint in the following terms:—

“Unto the Honourable the Magistrates of the burgh of Arbroath, officiating in the Police Court of Arbroath;

“The complaint of Duncan M'Neill, superintendent of Police of Arbroath, and Procurator-Fiscal of Court for the burgh of Arbroath, for the public interest; “Humbly sheweth,—That Robert Nicol, baker or shopkeeper, in or near High Street, in the burgh of Arbroath, and county of Forfar, has contravened the Act passed by the Scottish Parliament in the year 1661, chapter 18, entitled ‘an Act for the due observation of the Sabbath-day,’ more particularly that part of said Act which relates to or prohibits the using of merchandise on Sabbath-days: In so far as on Sabbath, the 4th day of July, 1886 years, the said Robert Nicol did open, or cause or permit the shop or premises situated at 236 High Street, in the burgh of Arbroath, and county of Forfar, then, and now or lately occupied or rented by him, to be opened, and did keep, or cause or permit the same to be kept open for the using of merchandise, namely, the sale of goods, and did sell, or cause or permit pies, pastry, and lemonade or other goods or merchandise to be sold within said shop or premises on said Sabbath-day, to both or one or other of William Cargill, a fisherman, and now or lately residing in or near High Street, James Keir, assistant shop-keeper or messenger, and now or lately residing in or near John Street, both in the burgh of Arbroath and County of Forfar; and to several, or one or more of the lieges, whose name or names and place or places of abode are to the complainer unknown; said selling of goods or using of merchandise on said Sabbath-day not being a work of either necessity or mercy, whereby the said Robert Nicol is liable, on conviction, to pay a penalty of ten pounds in Scots money, or sixteen shillings and eightpence in sterling money, and failing payment of said penalty, is liable to be exemplarily punished in his person, namely, to be imprisoned for any period not exceeding twenty days.

“It is therefore craved that warrant be granted for summoning the accused to answer to this complaint, and for citing witnesses for both parties, and that said accused be thereafter punished according to law, or or that such other judgment be given as the case may require.

“According to Justice, &c.

“(Signed) D. M'NEILL,

“Procurator-Fiscal.”

On 7th July the magistrate granted warrant to summon the accused to appear on 12th July, which warrant was executed on the same day by delivering a copy of the summons, with a list of the witnesses annexed, to the accused.

On 12th July the accused by his agent stated the following preliminary objections, viz. :—“(First) That the petition in present form is incompetent must be in form of criminal libel, with major and minor propositions, and must libel and quote Act of Parliament, and clause founded on; (Second) That the present petition is further radically defective in respect that it states the punishment, failing payment of the fine, to be twenty days in place of thirty days; (Third) That the prayer of the petition is incompetent in respect that the definite punishment is not specified and concluded for.”

The magistrate repelled these objections. The accused then pleaded not guilty. Evidence was led for the prosecution and also for the defence the depositions of the witnesses being recorded, and the recorded depositions signed by the witnesses respectively and by the magistrate.

The magistrate found the complaint proved, and the accused guilty of the contravention charged, and therefore sentenced "the said Robert Nicol in the statutory penalty of ten pounds Scots money, or sixteen shillings and eightpence sterling money, and failing payment thereof within fourteen days from this date, sentences the said Robert Nicol to be exemplarily punished in his body, by being imprisoned in the prison of Dundee, for the period of seven days from the time of his incarceration," and granted warrant to apprehend. No. 17.
July 18, 1887.
Nicol v. M'Neill.

Nicol brought a suspension, stating—" (6) The preliminary pleas stated by the complainer's procurator before the magistrate, and hereinbefore quoted, or at least one or other of them, were sound in law, and ought to have been sustained. The proceedings in connection with the said complaint were regulated by the Act 19 and 20 Vict. cap. 48, which extended to magistrates of Police Courts the procedure introduced by the Act 9 George IV. cap. 29, and according to the form of libel or complaint in schedule C appended to the last-mentioned statute, it is necessary to 'specify the punishment concluded for' in the prayer of the libel. There was no punishment specified in the prayer of the libel or complaint against the present complainer, and there was thus a failure to comply with the said statute; moreover, it was necessary in a complaint founded on the statute libelled in this case that a definite punishment should have been specified and concluded for. (7) Further, it was set forth in the said complaint that the complainer was liable, on conviction, to pay a penalty of ten pounds Scots money, or sixteen shillings and eightpence in sterling money, and failing payment of said penalty, is liable to be exemplarily punished in his person, namely, to be imprisoned for any period not exceeding twenty days. There is no period of imprisonment specified in the Act of Parliament libelled, and the complainer had no authority for specifying twenty days as the maximum period of imprisonment which could follow on a conviction of the offence libelled. By the foresaid statute, 19 and 20 Vict. cap. 48, the summary jurisdiction of the magistrate is limited to cases concluding for a fine not exceeding £5, or for imprisonment not exceeding thirty days, and the maximum period of imprisonment which could be inflicted in the present case was accordingly thirty, and not twenty, days, as specified in the said complaint. (8) There was no relevant offence under the foresaid Statute 1661, cap. 18, either charged against the complainer or established by the evidence adduced under the said complaint. The said statute prohibits the 'keeping of mercats or using any sort of merchandise on the said day, and all other profanation thereof whatsoever, under the pains and penalties following.' And it is libelled in the said complaint that the complainer was guilty of a violation of the said statute, in so far as on the Sunday libelled he sold pies, pastry, or lemonade, or other goods or merchandise within his shop in the High Street of Arbroath. What was established by the evidence was that he sold two buns and two bottles of lemonade, which are not merchandise within the sense or meaning of the said Act. Moreover, to constitute an offence under the said statute, it is necessary that the act complained of should be calculated upon reasonable grounds to shock the feelings of the religious and well-behaved portion of the community, and it was neither averred nor proved that the act complained of was of that character. There was no open shop kept by the complainer in the ordinary sense of those words. The complainer and his family live behind and above the small shop kept by him, and on the occasion in question the shutters were not off the windows, and only the half of the shop door was open. This portion of the door was open to allow access to the kitchen, and not to admit customers."

No. 17.

July 13, 1887.
Nicol v.
McNeill.

After a hearing before the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Young, and Lord Craighill, the case was appointed to be heard before a full bench.

Argued for the complainer;—The grounds of suspension were (a) that the complaint was incompetent, and (b) that the Act 1661, cap. 18, if it was intended to prohibit sales like those alleged here, was in desuetude, at least as regarded such sales. On the first point, *Bute v. More*¹ ruled that a summary complaint charging a breach of the Act 1661, cap. 18, was incompetent. That was the opinion of the majority of the Court in that case, and received effect in the interlocutor, which bore,—“Find that the offence charged in the complaint, on which the conviction and sentence complained of followed, could not competently be tried under the Summary Procedure Act,” and was conclusive against the present prosecution.

The Court called on the respondent without hearing the complainer on his second point.

Argued for the respondent;—Bute v. More did not decide that a summary complaint charging an offence against the Act 1661, cap. 18, was incompetent, though there might be opinions obiter to that effect. All that it settled was that where there was no restriction of the punishment, and no record of the evidence, the complaint and proceedings were incompetent. Here the punishment was restricted—for the fair reading of the prayer was by reference to the narrative of the complaint, by which the punishment was limited to imprisonment for twenty days; and the evidence had been recorded. The case here, therefore, was not ruled by Bute v. More. It was competent to restrict the punishment in the case of a statutory offence.² [LORD M'LAREN called attention to the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1881, sec. 3.*] That provision affected only cases falling under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1864.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case raises some questions of considerable interest. It is a suspension of a judgment pronounced by the Magistrates of Arbroath on a complaint proceeding on the Statute 1661, cap. 18, for the better observance of the Sabbath. Substantially it charged the party complained against with having on the particular day in question sold lemonade and buns to a customer in breach of that Act. The case came up for hearing in the Justiciary Court before Lord Young, Lord Craighill, and myself. We thought that whatever might be the opinion of the members of the Court upon the general question of the propriety of enforcing that statute, the case in its facts was of too trivial a character to make it desirable that a question of such large and general importance, and involving points of policy to a considerable extent, should arise and have to be decided in such a form. We therefore suggested to the parties that they should withdraw the case. That advice, however, was not followed, and consequently we thought that trivial as the case in its facts might be, the general importance of the questions involved made it desirable that it should be heard before a full bench, and accordingly it has been heard by your Lordships.

The two questions which we intended should be argued before the full bench

¹ Bute v. More, Nov. 24, 1870, 9 Macph. 180, 1 Coup. 495.

² Clark and Bendall v. Stuart, June 8, 1886, 13 R. (Just. Ca.) 86.

* The Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 33), sec. 3, is, with the Summary Procedure Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. cap. 53), sec. 32, quoted in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk, infra, p. 51.

was, in the first place, the competency of the proceeding, and secondly, the merits of the conviction. The case has been argued, but only with respect to the question of competency as yet, and it is upon that question that we are now to give judgment. No. 17.
July 13, 1887.
Nicol v.
M'Neill.

The case of Bute v. More in 1870 dealt with most of and decided some of the questions which are raised in this complaint. It was there held that a complaint of the same nature, and proceeding upon the same statute, could not competently be brought under the Summary Procedure Act, which was the phrase at that time, and the main grounds upon which that judgment was pronounced, and upon which the Court, I think, was unanimous, were, in the first place, that there was no punishment concluded for, or rather no punishment concluded for as mentioned in the Act; and, in the second place, that there was no record of the evidence, and therefore no provision for an appeal, which those old statutes seem to contemplate. Upon these points the Court were, I think, substantially agreed. There were some observations made with regard to other forms which might have been adopted. Some of the Court thought that the Act 19th and 20th of the Queen might have been a good vehicle in such a case for raising the question, but nothing was decided beyond the points which I have mentioned. There were also opinions expressed, and I think that on that matter also we were unanimous, that those Acts were not in desuetude, but could still be enforced.

This bill of suspension, if it had been in the form required by the Summary Procedure Act, would certainly have raised a different question from that which occurred in the case of Bute v. More, because the two specialties referred to in the case of Bute v. More do not occur in this case—that is to say, there is here a specific penalty concluded for, and there is also a record of the evidence. At one time I did think that perhaps this conviction might have been sustained as a conviction under the Summary Procedure Act, but even that ground I am now satisfied is not tenable, for this complaint is not brought under the Summary Procedure Act, but under the 19th and 20th of the Queen. It does not contain a prayer as enjoined by the Summary Procedure Act, and it does not contain the designation that it is brought under the Summary Procedure Act, which is required by the schedules of that Act, and what is of more consequence, the proof which has been taken under it is taken in the forms prescribed by the 19th and 20th of the Queen. That being a condition of affairs, we are referred to the Statute of 1881, which appears to me to leave us no choice whatever. For that statute provides that the option which was formerly given either to use the forms of the Summary Procedure Act, or to use other forms in the special Acts on which the complaints proceeded, should be taken away. The clause in the Summary Procedure Act is the 32d, which provides,—“The proceedings in any action or complaint for the prosecution for offences or recovery of penalties under any Act of Parliament may either be according to the form prescribed by such Act or any Act incorporated therewith, or according to the form prescribed by this Act, or where such proceedings are before the Sheriff, according to the form prescribed by the first recited Act.” But a statute was passed in 1881 which appears to me to be of the greatest possible consequence. That was an Act to amend the Act of 1864, and in its 3d section that later Act has this provision,—“The provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, shall apply to all summary proceedings as enumerated and described in the 3d section of the Summary Pro-

No. 17.

July 13, 1887.
Nicol v.
M'Neill.

cedure Act, 1864, and to all proceedings of the like nature which by any future Act are directed or authorised to be taken summarily or under the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, and the 32d section of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1864, is hereby repealed." I read that in connection with the context of the sentence—which I do not trouble your Lordships by going over—to be substantially an enactment that in summary proceedings the forms of the Summary Procedure Acts—or rather of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts—are alone to be followed, and that the forms established by the Act 9 George IV., applicable to Sheriff Courts, and by the Act 19 and 20 Victoria, applicable to Burgh Courts, are no longer available for prosecutions of the kind brought in this case. I have come to that conclusion, and I think it unnecessary to express any further opinion in the matters that have been brought under our notice.

LORD YOUNG.—When this case was argued before the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Craighill, and myself, I thought it one of the greatest possible importance, not, I confess, upon the question which has been argued before the full bench, and upon which I understand we are now to decide the case, but upon the more important question whether the old Scots Act of 1661, chapter 18, anent the due observance of the Sabbath, and authorising exemplary punishment to be inflicted upon the person of anyone who violated its provisions, is still in force or is in desuetude. I thought that a very interesting question, and when I rather urged upon my learned brethren to refer the case to a full bench—and they were good enough to yield to my request—it was really that question of importance—a question deserving of the utmost consideration—that I had in view.

We were referred in the course of the argument to the case of Bute v. More in 1870—seventeen years ago—as deciding that a prosecution under the Sabbath Observance Act could not competently take place under the Summary Procedure Act of 1864, and we were also referred to that case as containing very strong and distinct expressions of opinion by the learned Judges who took part in the decision that the Act of 1661 was not in desuetude, but was in observance. Of course the decision being that the whole prosecution was inept, there could be no decision ultra upon the question whether the Act of 1661 was in desuetude or not. Nevertheless, the opinions expressed by the learned Judges, although in a case which was dismissed as inept, upon a question which would have presented itself had the proceedings been regular, are of the greatest possible value, and entitled to the greatest possible respect. Still there was no decision, nor could there be, and the weight and respect due to an expression of opinion by the learned Judges is of a different order from the weight and respect which is due to a judgment; and as some—I rather think all—of the learned Judges, although expressing the opinion that the Act was not in desuetude, but was in observance, declared that no instance of a prosecution under it had been referred to, and that they were not themselves aware of any prosecution under it, it appears to me to be not unworthy of reconsideration by the Court—whether an Act more than 200 years old upon such a subject, and having for its immediate companions in the Statute-book statutes of the kind to which we have been referred requiring people, for example, to attend church—and to attend the parish churches—under severe penalties, is still enforceable. It occurred to me also that if we were to look not to the expressions of opinion on this matter in a case which was inept in itself, but to the actual judgment of the Court, which was unanimous, that judgment was conclusive of the prosecution here as being directly applicable to it. That question alone was argued before your Lordships, the question, namely, whether, under the judgment which was pronounced in 1870 in the case of Bute v. More, the form of prosecution in this case could be sustained, or whether it must be dismissed as inept. Now, I am of opinion upon the authority of Bute v. More alone, and irrespective of the Act of 1881 altogether, which, with great deference to the Lord Justice-Clerk, I think has no bearing upon this case, that the procedure here is inept, and that the case must be dismissed accordingly.

No. 17.

July 13, 1887.

Nicol v.
M'Neill.

We were referred in the course of the argument to three statutes. The first was the Act 19 and 20 Vict., passed in the year 1857, and extending, with certain qualifications, the very familiar provisions of the Sheriff Court Act of 9 Geo. IV. to the Justice of Peace and Burgh Courts. The second Act to which we were referred was the Summary Procedure Act of 1864, and the third was the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1881. Now, my opinion is that if an offence against the old Scots Act of 1661 can be prosecuted under any one of these three Acts, or could ever have been so prosecuted, there is no objection to this prosecution—at least the only one of them that would suggest an objection to the form of process adopted here is the 19 and 20 Vict., because that Act requires the punishment to be specified in the prayer of the complaint, and it is not concluded for here. The prayer of this petition is,—“It is therefore craved that warrant be granted for summoning the accused to answer to this complaint, and for citing witnesses for both parties, and that said accused be thereafter punished according to law, or that such other judgment be given as the case may require.” There is no limitation in the prayer. Now, that might have founded an objection before the Act of 1864 to this prosecution proceeding in summary form before the Justices, but under the Act of 1864 it is absolutely unobjectionable. There is, as far as I can see, no objection to this complaint under the Summary Procedure Act of 1864 in point of form. The offence which is charged may not be triable under the Act of 1864. I think it is not—at least I think that it was so decided in Bute v. More—but if it is triable under the Act of 1864 I can see no objection to the form of it. It is quite true that the complaint does not bear in its title to proceed under the Act of 1864 as the schedule to the Act suggests, but then the Act itself provides “that no objection shall be allowed by any Court to any complaint under this Act for any alleged defect therein in substance or in form,” and it would not be dreamt of as an objection to the complaint that the title “Under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1864,” was omitted, the complaint itself being in all respects as required by the provisions of that Act, as I think this complaint is. Now, the Act of 1881 makes no provision at all about the forms of process. Here are the words of it—“The provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, hereinafter called the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, shall apply to all summary proceedings as enumerated and described in the 3d section of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, and to all proceedings of the like nature which by any future Act are directed or authorised to be taken summarily.” The procedure here is not under a future Act—that is to say, an Act subsequent to the Act of 1864 directing summary procedure. Therefore clause 3 of the Act of 1881 has no further application, so far as we are concerned, than to the summary procedure enumerated and described in the

No. 17. 3d section of the Summary Procedure Act of 1864. Then is this a summary

July 13, 1887.
Nicol v.
M'Neill.

proceeding enumerated and described in the 3d section of the Summary Procedure Act of 1864? If a prosecution under the Act of 1661 is a summary proceeding enumerated and described in the 3d section of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, then the decision in Bute v. More was wrong, for the decision there was that it was not. The prosecution there was held to be inept, and was dismissed just because it was. Allow me to make that plain. Your Lordship in the chair who delivered the first opinion in that case said this,—“But, in the first place, it occurs for consideration whether this complaint can competently be tried with reference to the first subdivision of the 3d section of the Summary Procedure Act.” That refers to the first part of the subsection, which makes any prosecution theretofore competent under 19 and 20 Vict. or 9 Geo. IV. competent under the Act of 1864. Your Lordship negatives the notion that the complaint in question was one which fall within either of these statutes, and the conclusion of the paragraph of your Lordship's opinion is—“It is consequently incompetent to try it under the first subdivision of the 3d section of the Summary Procedure Act itself.” Then the residue of the 3d section is dealt with by your Lordship, with the result that you arrive at the conclusion that the prosecution is as incompetent under the 2d subsection as under the first. The other learned Judges concurring in that opinion—I should have thought unanimously, but there may have been a difference of opinion on the part of the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Ardmillan—the judgment of the Court is—“Find that the offence charged in the complaint, on which the conviction and sentence complained of followed, could not competently be tried under the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, and that the offence having been so tried, the conviction is invalid and void.” That is the judgment in Bute v. More—that the offence could not competently be tried under the 3d subsection of the Summary Procedure Act of 1864, and consequently I think that the Act of 1881 has no bearing upon this case at all. It was passed for a very legitimate and intelligent purpose, with which we are not now concerned. Before it was passed prosecutors thought it was in their option either to proceed under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, or under the special Acts which created the particular offence which they were prosecuting, and that option was taken away by the Act of 1881, and it was very fitting that it should be taken away. But we are not concerned here with any such option, but only with this—if this was competent under the 3d section of the Summary Procedure Act of 1864, it must now be tried under that Act, and under nothing else. But then, as I have tried to explain, section 3 of the Act of 1864 has been decided not to be applicable to cases of contravention of the Act 1661, cap. 18, for preventing Sabbath desecration, and therefore in my view the prosecution falls altogether. If competent under the Act of 1864, it is competent under the Act of 1881, which indeed makes no change in the procedure. What seems to me to be said is simply this—that you shall not prosecute upon another statute which deprives the Court of the discretion as to penalties which the Summary Procedure Acts confer on the Court. I have heard that since the Act of 1864 there have been prosecutions under the 19 and 20 Victoria and the Act 9 George IV. Had the information not come from such a source as one cannot doubt I should have doubted it, because after the Act of 1864 there can be no object in prosecuting under the two older Acts. The form of procedure under these Acts is very similar to that under the Act of 1864, the only difference being that the Act of

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE COURT OF SESSION, &c., 1886-87.

WINTER SESSION.

WILLIAM COOK, Pursuer (Respondent).—M^r Kechmie—J. Wilson.
ALEXANDER STARK, Defender (Appellant).—D.-F. Mackintosh—
C. S. Dickson.

No. 1.

Oct. 15, 1886.
Cook v. Stark.

Reparation—Master and Servant—Power of manager to delegate his duty of superintendence.—While the manager of a quarry may in ordinary circumstances delegate his duty of personally superintending particular operations in the quarry, yet, if the operation be one of peculiar difficulty, danger, and rarity, it is his duty personally to superintend it, and if he neglects to do so, and one of the workmen taking part in the operation is injured, the fact of his absence will be a ground for rendering his employer liable in damages to the injured workman, under the Employers Liability Act, 1880.

Reparation—Master and Servant—Contributory negligence.—Held that an ordinary labourer in a quarry, who, along with a skilled quarryman appointed by the manager, was employed in extracting an unusually large unexploded blast charge, which was an operation of peculiar difficulty, danger, and rarity, and was injured by an explosion caused probably by the skilled workman having made use of a steel jumper instead of a copper needle, was not barred by contributory negligence from obtaining damages from his employer.

ON 15th July 1885 William Cook, a labourer in the service of Alex-^{2D DIVISION.}
ander Stark, quartermaster, Auchinstarry Quarry, Kilsyth, was engaged Sheriff of Stir-along with James Stark in the quarry in extracting an unusually large ling, Dumbercharge of gunpowder which had missed fire about an hour before. ton, and Clack-James Stark was a brother of Alexander Stark, and also of William Stark, mannan.
the manager of the quarry, and was a quarryman of experience. Stark I.
had begun the operation with a copper needle, but before Cook had come up (to take the place of another workman) had exchanged that for a steel jumper. Cook held the jumper in the bore, and poured water into the bore, and Stark struck the jumper with a hammer. After this had gone on for about half an hour the charge exploded, probably in consequence of a steel jumper having been used instead of a copper instrument, and Cook's left hand was blown off, and his eyesight injured. He brought an action against Alexander Stark, under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, in the Sheriff Court at Stirling, averring that the injuries were due to the fault of William Stark, the defender's manager.

In defence Alexander Stark maintained (1) that James Stark and the pursuer were engaged in the operation of extracting the charge without the authority or knowledge of William Stark, the manager; (2) that if

No. 17.

July 13, 1887.
Nicol v.
M'Neill.

pared to sustain the objection which has been urged against the regularity of the conviction before us. But for that Act, so far as I can see, these proceedings are just as competent as any proceedings that could have been taken under the 19th and 20th of Victoria. If there was a restriction of the punishment to thirty days' imprisonment or a fine of £5, then any proceedings could competently be brought in the form prescribed by the Act Geo. IV. cap. 24. That required no doubt a limitation of the punishment, and there is a limitation of the punishment here. My brother (Lord Young) says that in the prayer there is no restriction, but I think that in truth that is a misreading of the prayer, for in the words used in the prayer we are referred back to the concluding sentence of the paragraph in the petition which immediately precedes. There a punishment of twenty-one days is invoked. There also we have a limitation of the fine, which is also within the limits prescribed for magistrates. That being so, in so far as regards the form of the prayer, there is no difficulty, and there being no difficulty in regard to that, we break ground upon which objection was taken in the case of Bute v. More. You have the limitation, and the limitation so brought within the restriction of 19 and 20 Vict. No doubt it may be said, and has been said more than once in the course of the discussion, that where you are dealing with a statutory punishment you are not entitled to limit the discretion of the magistrate. It was farther said—or it might have been said—that when you have personal pains prescribed as the appropriate punishment you must use the expression, and you must allow that to be carried into effect by the magistrate in pronouncing sentence. I think that that contention is entirely overruled, first by the consideration that a prescription of punishment, so far as regards the person, in the Act of 1661 had by all our authorities been regarded as superseded by personal imprisonment. It was so said by Hume long ago, and that is the view that has been adopted by the expressions of opinion of the Judges, and acted on in the procedure of our Courts. It is further said that there is a statutory penalty, and that you are not entitled to restrict it. That is provided for by the decision in this Court in the case of Clark, 13 R. (Just. Ca.) 86. That case was brought under the 11th section of the Criminal Law Amendment Act of 1885, which prescribed that for an offence under that statute there may be imposed as punishment a sentence of imprisonment for a period not exceeding two years. Clark was said to have contravened the statute, and the case was brought before the magistrate in Edinburgh under the Summary Procedure Statutes, but there was a limitation of the imprisonment to sixty days. There was a suspension brought, and the case in that way came before us. It was contended that to make a limitation of the imprisonment so as to bring the case within the Summary Jurisdiction Acts of 1864 and 1881 was in truth to change the enactment in the Criminal Law Amendment Act. The Court had no difficulty in overruling that contention. They held that a statutory punishment, just as much as a common law punishment, might be limited by the prosecutor, and that the prosecution could be instituted and carried forward before the magistrates acting under the provisions of the Summary Procedure Act of 1864. And so I think that but for the enactment of 1881 this is a case that might quite well have been tried—and in point of fact was tried, under what misapprehension I know not, except forgetfulness of the statute—under 19 and 20 Vict. For there was proof taken, and proof recorded, and the proof was authenticated in the way prescribed by the Act. All that was done—of course forgetting the Act of 1881—solely for the purpose, as I imagine, of getting the better of that objection which was brought forward No. 17.

in Bute v. More, to the effect that the non-recording of the proof, the adoption July 18, 1887.
of a form of proof by which there was no record of the proof—had the effect of Nicol v.
taking away the right of appeal which otherwise belonged to the accused. But M'Neill.
when under the Act of 19 and 20 Vict. there could be that record, then it is plain that that objection no longer could be urged, and it was for the purpose of overcoming that, as I think, that this course was adopted.

On the whole matter I am of opinion that the conviction must be set aside on the grounds set forth in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Mura.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree with Lord Young that the Acts of Parliament referred to are all Acts having relation to a summary criminal jurisdiction of the same character, and therefore that if under one of these statutes a prosecution for Sabbath-breaking is not competent, neither is such a jurisdiction competent under any of the other statutes of the same class. The enactments I refer to are the summary clauses of 9 Geo. IV. (Sir William Rae's Act), which apply to Sheriff Court prosecutions, the Statute of 19 and 20 of the Queen, which applies to the jurisdiction of burgh magistrates and justices, and the two Summary Jurisdiction Acts which apply to prosecutions before Sheriffs, magistrates, and justices.

I also agree with the Lord Justice-Clerk that the Summary Jurisdiction Acts have superseded the two earlier statutes, and on both grounds I conceive that the decision in Bute v. More is conclusive against the competency in the present prosecution.

If the Statute of 1661 is in force at all, the offence against which the statute is directed is an offence against the ecclesiastical polity of the country, and although in a certain sense it is to be tried summarily, I think the accused is entitled to require that it should be stated in the form of a criminal libel, and that an interlocutor of relevancy should be pronounced as a protection against the risk of the statute being strained, and in order that citizens may not be interfered with in the exercise of that liberty of opinion and action in matters of religious belief which the constitution of the country prescribes.

As the question of the statute being in desuetude was not argued, we give no opinion upon it. But, as the question may hereafter arise, I desire to say that while opinions of great weight were offered on this question in the case of Bute
v. More, I conceive it to be a question entirely open to consideration, no decision having yet been pronounced upon that question. I wish to reserve my opinion on it, because in point of fact the statute has not been enforced within living memory, and the public opinion of the country does not demand its enforcement.

These, it may be well argued, are the conditions for the tacit repeal of a statute in conformity with the ancient Scottish constitutional doctrine.

LORD YOUNG.—Your Lordship will permit me to make an explanation. Lord Craighill seems to think that in the observations I made I referred to the power of a prosecutor to limit the punishment in his conclusion. I did not refer to that. What I referred to was the power claimed by the prosecutor to limit a Judge in his discretion in mitigating the penalty. I never doubted the prosecutor's power of limiting his conclusion. I meant also, with respect to the

No. 17. prosecutor's power of limiting his conclusion, to say that where he brings the prosecution in the form prescribed by the Act of 1864, which is the same as the Act of 1881, he thereby necessarily limits the conclusion without expressing the limitation. And the correct view of the law—which is in accordance with the practice with which we are familiar—is stated by Mr Moncreiff in his useful book on Review in Criminal Cases, p. 126. "Under this form," he says, referring to the form under the Act of 1864, "it is not necessary as it is under schedule C of the Act 9 Geo. IV. cap. 29, to specify the punishment concluded for, but the pains of law competent to follow in such a complaint are of course restricted to those mentioned in the recited Acts."

July 18, 1887.
Nicol v.
M'Neill.

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—I think that Bute v. More is conclusive against the competency of this prosecution, and I have nothing more to say.

LORD ADAM was present at the hearing, but was taking a proof in the Court of Session at the advising.

THE COURT quashed the conviction.

T. F. WEIR, S.S.C.—WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 18. GEORGE CADENHEAD (Procurator-Fiscal of Justice of Peace Court of Aberdeenshire), Appellant.—D.-F. Mackintosh—Cheyne.
RICHARD MILNE, Respondent.—J. C. Thomson—Orr.

July 14, 1887.
Cadenhead v.
Milne.

Road—Locomotive on Highway—Locomotive Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. cap. 70), sec. 6—Locomotives Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. cap. 58).—A bridge on a highway may be stopped for locomotive traffic by a bye-law relating to it passed under the powers given by the Locomotives Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1878, by the road authorities of the district, and, after the advertisement specified in that Act, duly confirmed; and, therefore, a complaint alleging a contravention of such bye-law does not require to libel the Locomotive Act, 1861, or to set forth that, as required by section 6 of that Act, a notice was placed at the bridge itself that it was insufficient for the ordinary traffic of the district.

HIGH COURT. RICHARD MILNE, the driver of a traction-engine, was charged before the Justice of Peace Court for Aberdeenshire, with having contravened the bye-law for regulating the use of locomotives upon the highways, and preventing or regulating the use of locomotives upon bridges situated within the county of Aberdeen, made by the Aberdeen County Road Trustees as the road authority under the Locomotive Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1878, and confirmed on 27th July 1886, by having driven a locomotive and waggons across Cromriehilloch Bridge, in the parish of New Deer, Aberdeenshire, which bridge was specified in the schedule subjoined to the bye-law, without having previously obtained the consent in writing of the road surveyor of the district in which the bridge was situated, whereby he was liable in a penalty.

Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Young.
Ld. Craighill.
Justiciary
Clerk.

Inter alia, the following objections were stated to the relevancy—First, that it was not stated in the complaint that a notice that it was insufficient to carry weights beyond the ordinary traffic of the district had been placed, as required by section 6 of the Locomotive Act, 1861,* at the

* The Locomotive Act, 1861, 24 and 25 Vict. cap. 70, enacts by sec. 1, that "it shall not be lawful for the owner or driver of any locomotive to drive it over any suspension bridge, nor over any bridge on which a conspicuous notice has been placed by the authority of the surveyor or persons liable to the repair

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE COURT OF SESSION, &c., 1886-87.

WINTER SESSION.

WILLIAM COOK, Pursuer (Respondent).—M'Kechnie—J. Wilson.
ALEXANDER STARK, Defender (Appellant).—D.-F. Mackintosh—
C. S. Dickson.

No. 1.

Oct. 15, 1886.
Cook v. Stark.

Reparation—Master and Servant—Power of manager to delegate his duty of superintendence.—While the manager of a quarry may in ordinary circumstances delegate his duty of personally superintending particular operations in the quarry, yet, if the operation be one of peculiar difficulty, danger, and rarity, it is his duty personally to superintend it, and if he neglects to do so, and one of the workmen taking part in the operation is injured, the fact of his absence will be a ground for rendering his employer liable in damages to the injured workman, under the Employers Liability Act, 1880.

Reparation—Master and Servant—Contributory negligence.—Held that an ordinary labourer in a quarry, who, along with a skilled quarryman appointed by the manager, was employed in extracting an unusually large unexploded blast charge, which was an operation of peculiar difficulty, danger, and rarity, and was injured by an explosion caused probably by the skilled workman having made use of a steel jumper instead of a copper needle, was not barred by contributory negligence from obtaining damages from his employer.

ON 15th July 1885 William Cook, a labourer in the service of Alexander Stark, quarrymaster, Auchinstarry Quarry, Kilsyth, was engaged along with James Stark in the quarry in extracting an unusually large charge of gunpowder which had missed fire about an hour before.
James Stark was a brother of Alexander Stark, and also of William Stark, the manager of the quarry, and was a quarryman of experience. Stark had begun the operation with a copper needle, but before Cook had come up (to take the place of another workman) had exchanged that for a steel jumper. Cook held the jumper in the bore, and poured water into the bore, and Stark struck the jumper with a hammer. After this had gone on for about half an hour the charge exploded, probably in consequence of a steel jumper having been used instead of a copper instrument, and Cook's left hand was blown off, and his eyesight injured. He brought an action against Alexander Stark, under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, in the Sheriff Court at Stirling, averring that the injuries were due to the fault of William Stark, the defender's manager.

In defence Alexander Stark maintained (1) that James Stark and the pursuer were engaged in the operation of extracting the charge without the authority or knowledge of William Stark, the manager; (2) that if

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Stirling, Dumbarton, and Clack-mannan.
I.

No. 18.

July 14, 1887.
Cadenhead v.
Milne.

repealed, and it was quite applicable. It applied whether there had been a bye-law made under the Act of 1878 or not. The objection was not technical, for without such a conspicuous notice at the bridge itself a driver could not know whether he might cross or not. These engines travelled widely over the county, and the driver, while he might have studied the bye-law and been well aware that particular bridges came under it, had no way of identifying the particular bridge in the absence of a notice posted thereat. This was a good illustration, for more than a hundred bridges were named in the schedule to this particular bye-law. It was just when a driver had studied the bye-law that he needed the notice.

LORD YOUNG.—I am quite of opinion that the Justices have fallen into an error in this case, and if the prosecutor thinks fit in the circumstances to proceed with the complaint I think that the Justices must try it.

If this was a case of an innocent transgression, the case is a strong one for a modified or nominal penalty, or even a withdrawal of the prosecution. But on the legal ground, whether a bridge can be stopped for locomotive traffic by a bye-law regularly made under the Act of 1878, irrespective of a notice under the Act of 1861, such as is contended for by the respondent—the bye-law being alleged in the complaint—I have no doubt whatever. This bridge then having been stopped for such traffic by a bye-law, and it being alleged in the complaint that there has been a transgression of the bye-law, I think that if the prosecutor insists in the complaint, as for all I know he may have good reason to do, the Justices must try the case.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, and remitted the case to the Justices.

MACKENZIE & KERMAK, W.S.—PHILIP, LAING, & TRAIL, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 19.

July 20, 1887.
Bremridge v.
Gray.

RICHARD BREMRIDGE (Registrar under the Pharmacy Acts, 1852 and 1868), Complainer (Respondent).—Murray—Shaw.

ANDREW W. GRAY AND OTHERS, Respondents (Appellants).—D.-F. Mackintosh—Orr.

Pharmacy Act, 1868, 31 and 32 Vict. c. 121, secs. 1 and 15—Sale of drugs—Chemist and Druggist—Joint stock company.—A limited company carried on business as "Wholesale Chemists, Druggists, and Tea-merchants," doing both a wholesale and retail business. None of the shareholders was a duly qualified chemist and druggist under the Pharmacy Act, 1868, but the dispensing of drugs was done by duly qualified chemists and druggists. Held that the individual shareholders were not liable under sec. 1 and sec. 15 of the Act to be prosecuted for the offence of unlawfully taking and using the name chemists and druggists, and advertising the company as chemists and druggists.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Young.
Ld. Craighill.
Justiciary
Clerk.

ANDREW W. GRAY, and six other persons, were charged in the Sheriff Summary Court at Edinburgh at the instance of Richard Bremridge, registrar under the Pharmacy Act, 1868 (with concurrence of the Procurator-fiscal of Midlothian), with an offence against section 1 and section 15 of that Act,* in so far as, first, between 1st December 1886 and 17th May 1887, they did all, acting together or separately, in contravention of

* The Pharmacy Act, 1868, 31 and 32 Vict. c. 121, on the narrative that it is expedient for the safety of the public that persons keeping open shop for the retailing, dispensing, or compounding of poisons, and persons known as these sections, "put up, use, or exhibit . . . the name or title of chemists and druggists, above or in connection with a shop at No. 49 Leith Walk, Leith, and in the county of Midlothian, occupied by them, or by the Leith Depot, Limited, of which they are the sole partners or shareholders; and also with another shop at No. 33 Ferry Road, Leith, in said county, occupied by them or by the Leith Depot, Limited, of which they are the sole partners or shareholders: And the said Andrew W. Gray, . . . all and each, or one or more of them, did, during said period above libelled, or part thereof, within or near the shops occupied by the said Leith Depot, Limited, at 49 Leith Walk, Leith, and 33 Ferry Road, Leith, aforesaid, and at other places in Leith and Edinburgh, the particular place or places being to the complainer unknown, in the county of Midlothian, unlawfully, and in contravention of the said 1st and 15th sections of the said recited Act, issue to the public, or cause or procure to be issued to the public, in connection with the businesses or either of them, carried on by them or by the said Leith Depot, Limited, of which they are the sole partners or shareholders, in the premises at 49 Leith Walk and 33 Ferry Road, Leith, aforesaid, printed circulars, labels, and advertisements, having the words chemists and druggists printed or written thereon, none of the said Andrew W. Gray; . . . being a duly registered pharmaceutical chemist, or a chemist and druggist within the meaning of the said recited Act," whereby they had each become liable to a penalty of £5.

No. 19.

July 20, 1887.
Bremridge v. Gray.

Objection was stated to the relevancy of this charge, on the ground that it "did not set forth that each or all of the appellants had as an individual or as individuals, put up, used, or exhibited, the title chemist and druggist, or had as an individual or individuals, issued to the public circulars, labels, and advertisements bearing the words chemist and druggist, and that the complaint charged was in truth a complaint against the Leith Depot, Limited, in respect that the company put up, used, or exhibited the title chemists and druggists in the manner set forth, and also issued to the public, in connection with the business of chemists and druggists, should possess a competent and practical knowledge of their business, and to that end that from and after the day herein named all persons not already engaged in such business should, before commencing such business, be duly examined as to their practical knowledge . . . enacts, by sec. 1,—“From and after the 31st December 1868 it shall be unlawful for any person to sell or keep open shop for retailing, dispensing, or compounding poisons, or to assume or use the title ‘chemist and druggist,’ or chemist or druggist or pharmaceutical or dispensing chemist or druggist in any part of Great Britain, unless such person shall be a pharmaceutical chemist or a chemist and druggist within the meaning of this Act, and be registered under this Act, and conform to such regulations as to the keeping, dispensing, and selling of such poisons as may from time to time be prescribed by the Pharmaceutical Society, with the consent of the Privy Council.”

Sec. 6 makes provision for the due examination of persons desirous of becoming qualified as chemists and druggists.

Sec. 15.—“From and after the 31st December 1868 any person who shall sell or keep an open shop for the retailing, dispensing, or compounding poisons, or who shall take, use, or exhibit the name or title of chemist and druggist, or chemist or druggist, not being a duly registered pharmaceutical chemist, pharmacist, or chemist and druggist, or who shall take, use, or exhibit the name or title pharmaceutical chemist, pharmacist, or pharmacist, not being a pharmaceutical chemist, or shall fail to conform with any regulation as to the keeping or selling of poisons made in pursuance of this Act, or who shall compound any medicines of the British Pharmacopœia except according to the formularies of the said Pharmacopœia, shall, for every such offence, be liable to pay a penalty”

No. 19.

July 20, 1887.
Bremridge v.
Gray.

the company, circulars, labels, or advertisements, bearing the words chemists and druggists, and that such a complaint was irrelevant."

The Sheriff-substitute (Rutherford) repelled the objection, on the grounds stated in his opinion,* which was held as part of the case

* " OPINION.— . . . On the part of the respondents, an objection has been taken to the relevancy of this charge, which, it was maintained on their behalf, should have been directed against the Leith Depot, Limited, and not against them as individuals, because none of the respondents is alleged to have as an individual assumed the title chemist and druggist, but merely to have used or exhibited that title in connection with the premises occupied by the company, or with the business which it carries on. Now, I must take it for granted, in so far as concerns this particular charge, that none of the respondents did assume the title chemist and druggist in his or her individual capacity. They did not put it on their visiting-cards, or on the door-plates of their private dwelling-houses. Nothing of that kind is alleged. But then the 15th section of the Act does not require that in order to constitute the statutory offence a person must make use of or exhibit the title chemist and druggist in his individual character or in connection with his own name, and I am of opinion that it is sufficient to infer liability for the penalty that the partners or shareholders in a company of this kind, none of them having the requisite qualification, assume the title in connection with the business carried on in the name of the company. It must be kept in view that the leading purpose of the Legislature, as shewn in the preamble of the Act, was the safety of the public, and it was with that end in view that it was judged expedient that persons known as chemists and druggists,—that is, persons who openly deal in chemicals and poisonous drugs,—should possess a competent practical knowledge of their business. If no one of the partners in a company of this kind required to be a duly qualified chemist or druggist, it is manifest that the purpose of the Act might be easily defeated. There would be nothing to prevent any seven persons from setting up a business for the sale of poisons and other drugs in the name of a company registered under the Companies Acts, and adding the designation chemists and druggists. They would by this device of uniting themselves into a company evade the Act in a way which no single individual could possibly do. For it has been decided, and I must assume rightly, by the House of Lords in a case cited in the course of the discussion—The Pharmaceutical Society v. The London and Provincial Supply Association (July 22, 1880, L. R., 5 App. Ca. 857)—that the word 'person,' as used in the 1st and 15th sections of the Act of 1868, does not include a corporation, the reason being that it is not possible for a corporation to qualify. A corporation cannot offer itself for examination, and go through the other preliminaries required by the statute with a view to registration; and accordingly it was held that any prosecution for penalties must be instituted not against the body corporate but against the individual offender. But the very fact that a company cannot obtain the qualification, and cannot be registered, shews conclusively to my mind that the title chemists and druggists, if adopted in connection with the name of the company, and the business carried on by the company, could only be assumed by individual shareholders, or at all events by some of their number, and that this prosecution has therefore been properly directed against them. It has been said that this view is contrary to the opinions expressed by some of the noble and learned Lords in the case to which I have referred. I think that, so far from that being so, it is only carrying the opinions of their Lordships to their just and logical conclusion. A great deal of light is thrown upon the case of The London and Provincial Supply Association by turning to the reports of what was done in the Queen's Bench Division (25th April 1879, L. R., 4 Q. B. D. 313), and afterwards in the Court of Appeal (16th March 1880, L. R., 5 Q. B. D. 310), whose judgment was affirmed by the House of Lords. The decision in the Queen's Bench, if it had not been reversed, would have led to the result that no corporation could carry on the business of chemist and druggist even although every one of its members might be duly qualified, and obtained by the accused as after stated. Proof having been led, the Sheriff-substitute in respect thereof convicted the accused, and imposed a penalty. They took a case for appeal. The facts stated were,—“None of the appellants are duly qualified chemists and druggists under the statute. They are the sole shareholders of the Leith Depot, Limited, registered under the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867. The company had two shops, one at No. 49 Leith Walk, and the other at No. 33 Ferry Road, Leith. The objects for which the company was established, as set forth in the memorandum of association which was produced, are the carrying on of the business of wholesale and retail chemists and druggists, as well as that of selling and dealing in tea, tobacco, spices, perfumery, and generally articles for domestic use or ornament. In addition to a wholesale trade in articles such as chemical food, syrups, and tinctures, but not in drugs or poisons, the business of an ordinary retail chemist and druggist was carried on at each of the shops. The title exhibited above both shops is ‘The Leith Depot, Limited, Wholesale Chemists, Druggists, and Tea-Merchants.’ All circulars, labels, and advertisements bore the words, ‘The Leith Depot, Limited, Wholesale Chemists, Druggists, Tea-Merchants.’ In the circulars and advertisements prominent reference was made to the retail and dispensing business carried on, and it was alleged that goods were retailed at wholesale prices. The shop at 49 Leith Walk was under the management of the appellant Mr Andrew W. Gray, one of the shareholders, and an assistant, Mr Nicholas Dodds, who is a duly qualified chemist and druggist. The shop at No. 33 Ferry Road was managed by an assistant, Mr Henry Forewell, who is a duly qualified chemist and druggist.”

No. 19.
July 20, 1887.
Bramridge v.
Gray.

The questions of law were:—“(1) Whether the first charge in the complaint is or is not relevant? And assuming the first query to be answered in the affirmative, (2) Whether the use and exhibition of the title chemists and druggists by the appellants as aforesaid, was or was not a contravention of the 15th section of ‘The Pharmacy Act, 1868’?”

Argued for the appellants;—I. The decision of the Sheriff was erroneous in itself, and inconsistent with that of the House of Lords in the case of The London and Provincial Supply Association.¹ The appellants were the shareholders of a corporation, being a company under the Companies Acts. It had been decided in the case of *The London and Provincial Supply Association*¹ that a corporation not being a natural person was not a “person” in the sense of the Act, and could not be sued for a penalty. Such a “person” could not be examined by the board established by the Act, or comply with other requirements imposed on “persons” by it. This prosecution was therefore brought against the individual partners of the incorporated company, and the contention of the prosecutor must be that a company could not sell drugs unless the part-it was, I think, in connection with that view of the matter, and by way of deprecating that result, that the Lord Chancellor and Lord Blackburn expressed themselves as they did in those passages of their opinions which were founded upon by the counsel for the respondents in the present case. The company was sought to be made liable in a penalty for selling poison, although the person by whom the sale was effected, who was himself a partner of the company, was a duly qualified chemist and druggist; that was manifestly a very different case from this, where the prosecutor alleges that not one of the partners possesses the necessary qualification. According to the judgment of the House of Lords, proceedings must be taken not against the company but against the individual wrongdoer, and that is just what the prosecutor has done here. I therefore repel the objection to the first charge.”

¹ Cited in Sheriff-substitute's opinion.

No. 19.

July 20, 1887.
Bremridge v.
Gray.

ners were qualified chemists. It was submitted on the contrary that it was sufficient that a company dispensed drugs by duly qualified agents. In the one shop, which was managed by the appellant A. W. Gray, this company had a qualified chemist and druggist to assist Gray, while the other shop was managed by a duly qualified assistant. If an unqualified person dealt in drugs, it would be no defence under the Pharmacy Act that he was only an agent and not a principal, and his employer, whether a corporation or a natural person, might be liable as art and part with him, but the Act did not interfere with a corporation which transacted its business through a duly qualified person. The mischief to be guarded against, as the preamble shewed, was danger to the public, and that was sufficiently secured by the construction that the Act struck at the unqualified compounder of drugs, whether principal or agent. The Sheriff-substitute seemed to think that the judgment of the House of Lords merely went the length of holding that where one member of the corporation was duly qualified the corporation escaped liability. The judgment, however, was that a corporation might legally carry on the business. If it could do so, it was impossible to hold that every member of it was liable to be prosecuted for acts lawfully done by it.

II. As to the second question, the appellants did not call themselves "chemists and druggists," but "wholesale chemists, druggists, and tea-merchants." The taking of that designation was not unlawful under the Act. No doubt the appellants did in fact carry on a retail business.

Argued for the respondent;—The House of Lords had decided that a corporation could not under the Pharmacy Act, 1868, be indicted for a penalty, and that was accepted by the prosecutor here, who indicted the individuals composing it. It had not decided that a corporation might call itself chemists and druggists. In the Court of Appeal Lord Justice Thesiger said,—“I feel bound to add that I am by no means satisfied that although a corporation as a separate entity be not liable to the penalty which is sought to be recovered in this case, the individual members of the corporation, whether directors of the company or otherwise, may not be liable, and thus the mischief be remedied.” It also appeared from the opinions of Lord Justice Bramwell and of Lord Blackburn in the House of Lords that in their view a corporation could not use the name “chemists and druggists.” In a case of selling, indeed, the corporation would be employing a “person” in the sense of the Act to sell for them, but in “keeping open shop,” using the name “chemist and druggist,” this corporation was itself acting. Although the corporation might escape because it was not a “person,” the unqualified individuals who were assuming the name and keeping open shop could not. The statute had not said that they might use the name if they had a qualified assistant. They might probably have escaped if they had held out by their signboard and advertisement only that Nicholas Dodds, their assistant, was a “chemist and druggist.”

As to the point that they called themselves not chemists and druggists, but wholesale chemists, druggists, and tea-merchants, it was idle to take that distinction so long as it was admitted that they were doing a retail business.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This has been an interesting discussion, and the subject is one that no doubt deserves and requires consideration. Fortunately for us, the principles involved in the debate have been the subject of debate in the House of Lords, which is of great weight and authority, and I am of opinion, though not without some difficulty, that the principles announced in that judgment of the House of Lords must govern this case, and that consequently the conviction cannot be sustained. No. 19.

I do not require, at any length, to go into the grounds upon which the controversy has been maintained. The Act is a very defective Act, and the state of facts disclosed in this case is simply not provided for. The draftsman of the statute, whoever he was, had not taken into account that some of the acts provided against in this statute might be acts authorised and enjoined by persons who could not acquire the statutory qualification, and who might carry on such businesses as are dealt with through the agency of others. That, truly, is the origin of all the difficulty here. It was a category that should certainly have been in view, and the reasonable provision to be made for it was that if the business was carried on by persons who were not themselves capable of acquiring the qualification or expected to acquire it, it should be sufficient that they carried on business and kept open shop solely by persons who had acquired the requisite qualifications. That was all that was required, and there was no provision of that kind in the statute, and the common sense view of the case could only, therefore, be reached by way of inference. The inference, I am bound to say, is not of the clearest or most transparent description; but it is found by the judgment of the House of Lords that the word "person" in this Act signifies what is called "a natural person," that is to say, an individual and not a collective body, corporation, or company. Their Lordships came to that result, and I do not see that we can well differ from the result. The result of that would be that this Act does not apply to a partnership at all. That is the view at which I arrive. I do not think it applies in any of its parts to partnership. It seems to me that that is the result of the judgment of the House of Lords, and that no liability can here be inferred under the penalty clauses of the Act against the shareholders of this corporation. It seems to me that that is the necessary result of the limitation of the word "person" which the judgment of the House of Lords has imposed. So I should very much doubt whether a corporation, or a member of a corporation, would be responsible even although the person who carried on the business was not qualified. That might be inferred, but it is not so said in the Act. On that question, however, I reserve my opinion, as I do not think it is the question before us at present. Nor do I think it necessary to say more. I think the judgment of the House of Lords leaves us no alternative, and that we should therefore decide this case in conformity with that judgment.

July 20, 1887.
Bremridge v.
Gray.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. I think the judgment in the House of Lords case conclusively governs this case, but I confess I am not sorry that the House of Lords arrived at the conclusion at which they did arrive, and that we have an opportunity now of expressing our concurrence in that judgment, arriving at the same conclusion not only in deference to the judgment of the House of Lords, but also because we approve of the grounds upon which their Lordships proceeded.

It is a matter of considerable importance no doubt—I think it is of first-rate importance to the public—that drugs and chemicals should only be dispensed by qualified persons. I am very doubtful, however, whether any special legislation is necessary to that end, or whether the ordinary competition in that, as in other trades, would not secure all that the public desires in that direction. But, assuming that a qualification ought to be exacted by the Legislature from those

No. 19. who compound or sell drugs, I should be disposed to go no further than is manifestly necessary to that end in the construction of the statute or otherwise, and avoid carefully putting any constraint upon trade. The public are interested in having such drugs or chemicals as they require at reasonable prices, and it is a matter of common knowledge that most extravagant prices are exacted, and from very poor people who have occasion to go to ordinary chemists' shops, for the drugs which are prescribed by their physicians. I was informed, and I give it as a mere illustration, by a physician of eminence, and in large practice, that a patient to whom he had given a prescription complained to him after a while of the cost of the article. He had to get his little phial filled repeatedly, and the charge to him on each occasion was two shillings. The physician said he compassionated the poor man, and told him the two articles of which it was compounded, directing him to get the one in one chemist's shop and the other in another chemist's shop, and with the result that he got for threepence what made some dozens of bottles, bottles which in the chemist's shop were sold at two shillings each. Well, it is not unreasonable that the public should desire some check to be put upon that. There is no grudging of payment for professional skill; but, where the payment for skill is extended to matters of that sort in that way, the public are interested in companies, even in joint stock companies, taking the sale of drugs and chemicals into their business as part of their ordinary trade, these companies being careful at the same time that that part of their business is conducted by duly qualified people. And I suppose this corporation introduced this sale of drugs into their business for that very reason, that conducting it by means of duly qualified people they were able to supply the public upon much more reasonable terms than ordinary chemists did. And I very thoroughly concur in what Lord Selborne said upon this head in the case which has been put before us, and where the very statute under discussion was sought to be put in force so as to terminate any such trade by corporations who could not be qualified chemists and druggists. His Lordship says, L. R., 5 Ap. Ca. at p. 867, after noticing that drugs and chemicals were extensively sold by corporations before the Act—by joint stock companies who kept open shop for their sale,—proclaiming the fact of selling in open shop those very things,—“That having been the state of the law and the facts, I think it would be wrong for your Lordships without necessity to impose upon the word ‘person,’ used in such a context as that in which you find it here, a construction which might render illegal that mode of carrying on business of chemists and druggists by such corporations, although there is no direct reference from the beginning of the Act to the end to any such bodies or to that kind of case.” Lord Blackburn says very emphatically the same thing,—“My Lords,” he says, “my conclusion, looking at this Act, is that it is clear to my mind that the word ‘person’ here is so used as to shew that it does not include a corporation, and that there is no object or intention of the statute which shews that it is requisite to extend the word to a sense which probably those who used it in legislation were not thinking of at all.” Then his Lordship says that he does not think that the Legislature were thinking of the construction contended for by those who were prosecuting, and he begins with the preamble, and then examines the Act, and goes on to say that it all leads to the conclusion that a corporation is not to be prosecuted as a person. He said that if the prohibition contained in the Act were directed against a corporation as a person, if in the language of the clause prohibiting the thing to be done, the word "person" was used in a sense which included in that word "person" No. 19.

 a corporation, which it might, then he should have no difficulty in including it in the clause imposing the penalty, for a penalty may be imposed upon July 20, 1887.
 a corporation; but he says the two things are to be taken together, and if the Bremridge v. Gray.
 word "person" in the clause prohibiting the act—declaring it to be illegal—does not include a corporation, neither is it included by the same word in the other clauses. He says,—“The 15th section imposes a penalty, and the 15th section in imposing the penalty repeats the words which make the thing unlawful. I think these two sections must be construed together, and looked at together.” Now, the result was that the prosecution for a penalty was dismissed, and the judgment of the magistrate, who refused to convict, was affirmed; but that was not upon the ground that the corporation might not have incurred a penalty, but on the ground that the word “person” in the clause prohibiting the thing, in consequence of which the penalty was said to have been incurred, did not include a corporation.

Now, in view of that case and the state of the facts to which reference has been made, I can hardly characterise the attempt which is now being made to attain the same result in another way than as a contrivance. It was held upon the proper merits that by the statute corporations are not intended to be prohibited from keeping open shop for the sale of drugs, and that upon grounds of public policy—that without necessity an end is not to be put to a trade which was carried on extensively before, and which was carried on extensively by corporations and associations before the Act was passed. Well, what is the contrivance that follows? You cannot complain of a corporation, because the statute does not prohibit a corporation from doing it; but they say—“Oh! we will prosecute you—the whole individual members composing the corporation.” My Lords, if we allowed that construction of the statute, or a construction that permitted that, would it not be a construction which led to the result that Lord Selborne, then Lord Chancellor, so deprecated as terminating without any necessity a trade that was extensively and lawfully carried on before? You cannot terminate it by prosecuting a corporation. It is entitled to do the thing that is complained of.
 But you can terminate it now by prosecuting each of the seven or seventy or seven hundred members composing the corporation, and thus attain the same result which was sought to be attained in that case in England. I have no hesitation in dismissing a complaint which strives to reach that end in that way, and I dismiss it entirely on the same grounds on which the other case was dismissed, and I repeat what your Lordship has noticed, and what Lord Selborne and Lord Blackburn dwelt upon, that the real object and purpose of the statute does not require such a result for the protection of the public. The public are sufficiently protected already, and that is all the public interest in the statute—that the public should be sufficiently protected. The trades’ union interest is not one which I should look upon very favourably. The public interest is entirely protected by the provision, that if this business is carried on in any shop it shall be conducted, the drugs shall be compounded and dispensed, and everything in which the safety of the public is concerned shall be done, by duly qualified individuals.
 There may be a difficulty, or there might have been a difficulty but for the
 In deference of these noble and learned Lords in a former case, who are quite clear pursuers upon the point,—I say there might have been a difficulty in the authorisation of prosecution under the statute against an assistant dispensing or compounage, who himself is not duly qualified, but their Lordships say that

No. 19. they have no difficulty in saying who might be prosecuted ; and so the whole public interest, ends and objects, and the safety of the public which were in view in the passing of this statute, are entirely attended to and preserved. Without any hesitation, therefore, I agree with your Lordship, and I repeat that I am very glad that we have an opportunity of expressing this view of the law, which I think is one beneficial to the public, and quite consistent with the public safety. I am for quashing this conviction.

July 20, 1887.
Bremridge v.
Gray.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I agree. I think the decision in this case is governed by the decision of the House of Lords. In the judgment in the House of Lords it was found that the Act of Parliament in question does not apply to corporations. When we reach that length by the aid of that decision—when corporations cannot be prosecuted for infringing the statute—I do not think that individual members of a corporation can be said in this particular matter to contravene it, as is alleged here. They are not liable, therefore, to the penalties sought to be recovered in the complaint. I therefore concur in the judgment.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor :—“ Having considered the case, and heard counsel for the parties, sustain the appeal: Reverse the determination of the inferior Judge, and decern: Find the appellants entitled to expenses: Allow an account thereof to be given in, and remit the same when lodged to the Clerk of Court to tax and to report.”

WISHART & MACNAUGHTON, W.S.—P. MORISON, S.S.C.—Agents.

ads to the
A. He said a corporation
g to be done,

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE COURT OF SESSION, &c., 1886-87.

WINTER SESSION.

WILLIAM COOK, Pursuer (Respondent).—M'Kechnie—J. Wilson.
ALEXANDER STARK, Defender (Appellant).—D.-F. Mackintosh—
C. S. Dickson.

No. 1.

Oct. 15, 1886.
Cook v. Stark.

Reparation—Master and Servant—Power of manager to delegate his duty of superintendence.—While the manager of a quarry may in ordinary circumstances delegate his duty of personally superintending particular operations in the quarry, yet, if the operation be one of peculiar difficulty, danger, and rarity, it is his duty personally to superintend it, and if he neglects to do so, and one of the workmen taking part in the operation is injured, the fact of his absence will be a ground for rendering his employer liable in damages to the injured workman, under the Employers Liability Act, 1880.

Reparation—Master and Servant—Contributory negligence.—Held that an ordinary labourer in a quarry, who, along with a skilled quarryman appointed by the manager, was employed in extracting an unusually large unexploded blast charge, which was an operation of peculiar difficulty, danger, and rarity, and was injured by an explosion caused probably by the skilled workman having made use of a steel jumper instead of a copper needle, was not barred by contributory negligence from obtaining damages from his employer.

ON 15th July 1885 William Cook, a labourer in the service of Alex-^{2D DIVISION.}
ander Stark, quartermaster, Auchinstarry Quarry, Kilsyth, was engaged Sheriff of Stir-along with James Stark in the quarry in extracting an unusually large ling, Dumbercharge of gunpowder which had missed fire about an hour before. mannan.
James Stark was a brother of Alexander Stark, and also of William Stark, I.
the manager of the quarry, and was a quarryman of experience. Stark had begun the operation with a copper needle, but before Cook had come up (to take the place of another workman) had exchanged that for a steel jumper. Cook held the jumper in the bore, and poured water into the bore, and Stark struck the jumper with a hammer. After this had gone on for about half an hour the charge exploded, probably in consequence of a steel jumper having been used instead of a copper instrument, and Cook's left hand was blown off, and his eyesight injured. He brought an action against Alexander Stark, under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, in the Sheriff Court at Stirling, averring that the injuries were due to the fault of William Stark, the defender's manager.

In defence Alexander Stark maintained (1) that James Stark and the pursuer were engaged in the operation of extracting the charge without the authority or knowledge of William Stark, the manager; (2) that if

No. 1.
Oct. 15, 1886.
Cook v. Stark.

William Stark knew that they were so engaged he did not know that they were using a steel, not a copper instrument, and that he was entitled to trust to the skill and discretion of his brother James in the management of the operation without himself giving it any personal superintendence; and (3) that the pursuer was barred by reason of his contributory negligence in taking part in such a dangerous operation as using a steel jumper to extract an unexploded charge.

A proof was allowed. The findings in fact of the Sheriff (Muirhead), which were affirmed by the Second Division on appeal, taken along with the facts above narrated, explain the nature of the evidence. These findings were:—“(1) That the pursuer, on 15th July 1885, was a labourer in the service of the defender, Alexander Stark, in his quarry at Auchinstarry, and in receipt of a wage of 21s. a-week; (2) that the manager of said quarry was William Stark, a brother of the defender's; (3) that in the forenoon of said day the pursuer, having finished loading stones into a canal boat, was told by the defender to apply to the said William Stark for instructions as to what he was to do next; (4) that having done so, he was directed by the said William Stark, as manager aforesaid, and in the exercise of the superintendence entrusted to him by the defender, to go and work along with James Stark (a brother of the defender's and of the said William Stark); (5) that the said James Stark was then engaged in attempting to extract from a bore a charge of powder which had missed fire about an hour before; (6) that said bore was four feet deep, and was charged with fourteen inches of powder, covered with two feet of sand stemming, and furnished with a gutta percha ‘strum’ or fuse; (7) that the extraction of such a charge had rarely if ever been attempted in defender's quarry, and is an operation of very considerable danger; * (8) that the pursuer had never before seen such an operation performed; (9) that the said William Stark, when he directed the pursuer to go and work along with James Stark, knew that the said James Stark was attempting to extract the aforesaid charge, but did not apprise

* On this point the Sheriff in his note stated,—“That the operation of extracting this charge was peculiarly hazardous, I cannot doubt. The defender himself says,—‘I consider that what the pursuer was doing that day was dangerous. If I had known it was being done, I would have stopped it.’ In many quarries it is not allowed, and in metalliferous mines it is absolutely prohibited by statute. The words of general rule No. 2 are—‘A charge of powder which has missed fire shall not be unrammed’—(35 and 36 Vict. cap. 77, sec. 28). The Act does not apply to quarries, but the prohibition shews how dangerous the operation is usually considered.

“Miss-fires of ordinary plug charges, furnished with straw fuses, are not uncommon on the defender's quarry; but a miss-fire of so great a charge as in the present case seems to have been very rare (probably because such heavy charges are infrequent). William Stark, the manager, who has been connected with the quarry for thirteen years, says,—‘I have had no experience of an unexploded shot of this kind. This was the first case in our quarry in which the charge has missed fire with a fuse or strum.’ No doubt James Stark says that in the ten years in which he has been in the quarry it has happened twice, and that on one at least of these occasions he drew the charge in accordance with instructions received from the manager. It is difficult to reconcile these statements. The evidence of the defender seems to corroborate that of his manager, for he says,—‘I have never seen it done (i.e., a charge drawn) in my experience. I have no experience of drawing shots. We generally bore a new hole when a shot fails to explode.’ As the defender and his manager, according to their own avowals, had no experience of such an operation, the pursuer may be believed when he says,—‘I never bored a shot before, or was present when one was being bored.’”

No. 1.

Oct. 15, 1886.
Cook v. Stark.

the pursuer of the danger, nor give him any instructions as to the precautions proper to be taken in the circumstances; (10) that the said William Stark did not personally superintend the operation; (11) that while the pursuer was assisting the said James Stark, and holding in the bore a steel jumper which the said James Stark was striking on the head with a 'mash' or hammer, in order to dislodge the stemming, the charge exploded, and the pursuer's left hand was thereby blown off above the wrist, and his eyesight temporarily injured; (12) that there was no contributory negligence on the part of the pursuer."

On 18th March 1886 the Sheriff-substitute (Buntine) assoilzied the defender, being of opinion that while the manager, William Stark, was aware that his brother James and the pursuer were extracting the charge, he did not know that they were using a steel jumper, and that they were guilty of negligence in using such an instrument.

On 21st April 1886 the Sheriff (Muirhead) pronounced this interlocutor (after the findings in fact above quoted):—"Finds in law that, the facts being as above set forth, the defender is liable to the pursuer in damages; therefore recalls the interlocutor appealed against; assesses the damages at £150 sterling," with interest and expenses.

The defender appealed.¹

LORD YOUNG.—(After expressing his opinion that the pursuer took part in the operation with the knowledge and authority of William Stark, but that the latter did not know that a steel jumper was being used.)—That leaves only this kind of case then, irrespective of the plea of contributory negligence, with which I shall deal last, that there was no negligence on the part of William Stark in allowing the pursuer to go on with this operation, because although the pursuer was himself a man quite inexperienced in this sort of work, he was nevertheless under the immediate superintendence of James Stark, who was a quarryman of considerable experience. Now, I can understand that sort of case generally. The manager of a quarry may not be able to give personal superintendence to every operation that is going on in the quarry,—in a large quarry there may be several going on at the same time in different parts of the quarry,—and it may be said truly that the manager will usually perform his duty perfectly if only he takes care that no dangerous operation goes on without some one of the workmen being a person of experience. But here the operation was not only highly dangerous but of extremely rare occurrence, so rare that in this particular quarry it had never occurred before—at the least the manager says so, and I think we may take his evidence, seeing that it is adverse to himself. He is quite explicit that this was the first case in the quarry in which a charge with a fuse or strum had missed fire—not an ordinary plug charge; instances of these missing fire had occurred before. Now, this admittedly highly dangerous operation was performed here in a highly dangerous manner. Then, is no one to blame? Is the manager to blame? He knew that this highly dangerous and almost unprecedented operation was going on, that it had been going on for nearly half an hour, and yet he never interfered to see whether it was being proceeded with in a proper manner or not. In these circumstances I cannot take it from him that he was entitled to trust to his brother James so as to absolve his employer from ¹ Authorities.—Pollock v. Cassidy, Feb. 26, 1870, 8 Macph. 615, 42 Scot. Jur. 303; Stark v. M'Laren, Nov. 2, 1871, 10 Macph. 31, 44 Scot. Jur. 56; Robertson v. Brown, May 17, 1876, 3 R. 652. (On the question of contributory negligence)—M'Gee v. Eglinton Iron Co., June 9, 1883, 10 R. 955; Senior v. Ward, Jan. 13, 1859, 28 Law Jour. Q. B. 139.

No. 1. liability to the pursuer. That leaves only the question of contributory negligence. It is all very well to say that most human beings of average intelligence know that if you strike rock with steel there will be sparks, and that sparks are dangerous when they come in contact with gunpowder. But the gunpowder here was in a deep hole, packed deep, and I suppose the object of using the steel jumper when the copper needle failed to extract the charge was to widen the hole at the top, so that even sparks there were not necessarily dangerous, and the operation had in point of fact been going on for half an hour before the accident took place. It is enough that it was not so obviously dangerous that the pursuer, an inexperienced workman, was inexcusable in continuing to assist James Stark in obedience to the orders of William Stark, the manager. I therefore negative the plea of contributory negligence, and, on the whole matter, think that we ought to affirm the judgment of the Sheriff.

Oct. 15, 1886.
Cook v. Stark.

LORD CRAIGHILL concurred in thinking that the pursuer took part in the operation of extracting the charge with the manager's knowledge and authority, and was further of opinion that as the manager knew that a steel jumper, not a copper needle, was being used, the defender was liable in damages.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I concur with your Lordship in the chair, and have nothing to add.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find in fact and in law in terms of the findings of the Sheriff's interlocutor of 21st April last; dismiss the appeal; affirm the judgment of the Sheriff appealed against; of new ordain the defender to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £150," with interest and expenses.

WILLIAM DUNCAN, S.S.C.—DOVE & LOCKHART, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 2. JOHN MACRAE (John Lightbody's Trustee), Pursuer (Appellant).—Strachan—Salvesen.
J. & P. HUTCHISON, Defenders (Respondents).—Balfour—C. S. Dickson.

Oct. 16, 1886.
Lightbody's
Trustee v. J. &
P. Hutchison.

Carrier—Goods—Condition—Construction of contract.—Question, whether a printed circular post-card sent by shipowners to possible shippers of goods in Galway, which stated that the s.s. "Clara" would sail from Glasgow to Galway on a date named, and contained this intimation:—"All goods carried on conditions as per sailing bills," which conditions relieved the shipowners from all liability for the consequences of their own or their servants' fault, could be held to apply to the return voyage of the "Clara" from Galway to Glasgow, so as to import the conditions on the sailing bills into a contract for that voyage.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
1.

In February 1884 John Lightbody, marble merchant, Glasgow, bought a lot of Irish black marble from Millar & Moon, marble manufacturers, Galway, which, on 19th February, Millar & Moon shipped on board the s.s. "Clara," belonging to J. & P. Hutchison of Glasgow, for conveyance to Lightbody. The marble having been delivered in a damaged condition, John Macrae, the trustee on Lightbody's sequestrated estate, in March 1885, brought an action of damages in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against J. & P. Hutchison.

J. & P. Hutchison, in defence, stated, inter alia, "that by the terms of defenders' sailing bills, which were well known to the shippers of said goods, defenders are not liable for inward condition, leakage or breakage, contents or weight of packages,' nor for any loss or damage 'arising from the act of God, . . . steam navigation, or from any peril of the seas or rivers, or act, neglect, or default whatsoever of the company or their agents or servants, or from any defect in the steamer, its machinery, equipments, ballasting, or stowage, . . . or any other cause whatsoever, or from any consequences of the causes above stated, it being an express condition that the . . . owners of . . . goods undertake all risks whatsoever.' Further, the 'shipping and landing of goods is performed at shipper's risk,' and 'all bills of lading and other receipts for . . . goods signed by any agent or officers of the company shall be subject to these conditions, whether or not the same be repeated therein.'"

No. 2.
Oct. 16, 1886.
Lightbody's
Trustee v. J. &
P. Hutchison.

The defenders pleaded;—(3) Any damage to said goods occurring while in defenders' hands having been caused by the risks of carriage, for which, under their conditions of carriage, defenders are not responsible, they should be assoilzied, with expenses.

A proof was allowed. The evidence, in so far as it related to the foregoing ground of defence, was directed mainly to the question whether the defenders had sent a post-card in the following terms to Millar & Moon:—

"Direct Steamers.—Glasgow to Galway and West of Ireland.—The undernoted or other first-class steamer is intended to be despatched from Glasgow direct to Galway:—S.S.....on.....188... Carrying goods at lowest rates for Athenry," and a number of other towns in Ireland.—"For freight, &c. apply to J. & P. HUTCHISON, Coal Yard, New Dock, Galway.—Head office—62 Broomielaw, Glasgow.

".. All goods carried on conditions as per sailing bills."

The defenders adduced evidence to shew that they had sent such a post-card, the blanks in which were filled in by the word "Clara" and a date applicable to the voyage of the "Clara" from Glasgow to Galway immediately preceding that on which she took the marble from Galway to Glasgow. The defenders further maintained that this post-card, if received, was sufficient to import the conditions on the sailing bills. One of the sailing bills was produced. It had, inter alia, the conditions above quoted printed on the back, and on the front a statement of certain sailings of the "Clara" (in May 1881) both to and from Galway.

The pursuer adduced evidence to shew that Millar & Moon had never received such a post-card, and he further contended that in law the post-card, even if received, was not sufficient to import the conditions on the sailing bills into the contract.

It was admitted that no bill of lading or other document had been granted for the marble.

On 31st August 1885 the Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that in February 1884 Messrs Millar & Moon shipped at Galway for delivery to the bankrupt, on whose estates the pursuer is trustee, on board the defenders' general cargo steamer 'Clara' the quantity of black marble in slabs consigned on: Finds that by the advertisements or sailing bills of said ship it was notified that the defenders carried goods on the conditions only, inter alia, that they were not liable for any loss or damage to such goods, arising from any peril of the seas or rivers, or act, neglect, or default whatsoever of the company or their agents or servants, or from any defect in the steamer, its machinery, equipments, ballasting, or stowage, or from any consequences of the causes above stated, it being an express condition that the owners of goods undertake all risks whatsoever: Finds that the advertisement or sailing bill was duly intimated to the public and intending shippers including Messrs Millar & Moon, who must be taken as acting for the pursuer in this matter: Finds that the marble was badly and unskilfully stowed, the

No. 2.

Oct. 16, 1886.
 Lightbody's
 Trustee v. J. &
 P. Hutchison.

slabs being laid in the hold flat, and not as they ought to have been, on their edges, whereby many slabs were delivered broken: Finds that by the terms of the said advertisement or sailing bills, constituting the contract with the pursuer's author, the defenders are not liable for the damage arising as aforesaid: Therefore assoilzies the defenders, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses."

On 20th February 1886 the Sheriff (Clark) on appeal adhered.
 The pursuer appealed.

LORD YOUNG.—(After reviewing the evidence, and coming to the conclusion that the terms of the defenders' sailing bills had not been communicated to Millar & Moon, the pursuer's agents)—It is not necessary to decide the point, though I think it may be proper to indicate an impression, approximating at all events to an opinion, which I myself have, that I should not be satisfied in point of law that proof of the receipt of a circular applying to the sailing of a particular vessel on a particular day from Glasgow to Galway, and importing conditions into the contract of carriage of goods by that vessel and voyage by reference to the back of a sailing bill, was sufficient to import these conditions into a contract for the carriage of goods from Galway to Glasgow. One would not be disposed to be astute to import by way of inference into a contract terms which would have the effect of discharging one of the parties from nearly all his common law liabilities. I should say that, as a general proposition, the carrier of goods, whether by land or sea, who wishes to free himself from the common law rules of liability, ought to make a special contract for the purpose. There are many cases shewing how this may be done. It is a question whether it is sufficient to notify such conditions on the back without printing a reference on the front to the back. But here there is neither a front nor a back. The contract was a parole contract, constituted merely by sending the goods, and I am not disposed to be subtle to introduce into it by way of inference terms which would qualify the ordinary legal liabilities of the ship-owner in the way which it is attempted to do here. But, as I have said, it is not necessary to decide that point in the view which I take regarding the transmission of the circular.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I am of the same opinion. The special contract which the defenders here aver is a very peculiar one, which would require the very clearest proof to establish it, because its necessary result, if established, would be to free the defenders from all liability for injuries which may happen to goods entrusted to them for carriage. I agree with your Lordship that such a contract has not been established by the proof which has been here led.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of the same opinion. I am satisfied on the proof that no circular was ever sent to Millar & Moon. It was incumbent on the defenders to produce the very clearest evidence of this in order to import terms so remarkable into the contract, and this, in my opinion, they have failed to do. I further share Lord Young's doubt whether the circular can be construed so as to apply to the inward as well as to the outward voyage. That seems to me a very doubtful question.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Find in fact, first, that on 19th February 1884 twenty-five slabs of marble were by Messrs Millar & Moon, acting for John Lightbody the bankrupt on whose estate the pursuer is trustee, delivered to and received by the defenders at Galway, for carriage by them in their steamer "Clara" to Glasgow, and delivery there to the said John Lightbody; second, that the said slabs of marble were carried and delivered by the defenders accordingly; third, that in the course of the carriage, and when in the custody and charge of the defenders, the said slabs were broken and damaged, and were in that condition delivered to Mr Lightbody; fourth, that the money value of the said damage is £26 sterling; fifth, that there was no contract or agreement between the parties whereby the legal liability of the defenders at common law, as carriers of the said marble, was limited or affected; sixth, in particular, and separatim, that the terms of the defenders' sailing bills, referred to by them on record, were not communicated or known to Messrs Millar & Moon, and that the contract for the carriage of the said marble slabs was not made with reference to the said conditions: Find in law that the defenders are liable to compensate the pursuer as trustee foresaid, for the damage to the said marble slabs: Therefore sustain the appeal; recall the interlocutors of the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute appealed against; ordain the defenders to make payment to the pursuer of the said sum of £26," with interest thereon, and with expenses.

No. 2.

Oct. 16, 1886.
Lightbody's
Trustee v. J. &
P. Hutchison.

PETER DOUGLAS, S.S.C.—J. & J. Ross, W.S.—Agents.

SCOTTISH RIGHTS OF WAY AND RECREATION SOCIETY, LIMITED, AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Respondents).—Murray—W. C. Smith.
DUNCAN MACPHERSON, Defender (Reclaimer).—Asher—Cosens.

No. 3.

Oct. 23, 1886.
Scottish
Rights of Way
and Recreation
Society v.
Macpherson.

Process—Proof or jury trial—Declarator of right of way.—An action of declarator of a public right of way appointed to be tried by a Lord Ordinary without a jury, in respect that the alleged right of way, which was in Forfarshire, had been the subject of correspondence in the Scotsman newspaper, and of a report submitted by the Scottish Rights of Way and Recreation Society to its members.

THE SCOTTISH RIGHTS OF WAY AND RECREATION SOCIETY, LIMITED, an association formed for the preservation and defence of public rights of way in Scotland, with members from all parts of Scotland, raised an action against the proprietor of Glen Doll, near Kirriemuir, for declarator of a public right of way across his property. The alleged right of way extended from Glen Clova to Braemar, passing through the defender's property. Two persons, one a farm manager in Glen Clova, the other a shepherd in the district, were also pursuers.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Kinneir.
M.

The defender maintained that the case should be tried by the Lord Ordinary without a jury on the authority of Blair's case.¹ It appeared that a deputation from the Society in July 1885 had gone along the road, and the directors had referred to this fact, and to their intention of taking proceedings, in their annual report to the shareholders of the Society. The road had also been mentioned and the steps taken to preserve it referred to in the general report of the Society to its members. There had, besides, been, in 1885, two letters in the Scotsman newspaper, and one in the London Standard newspaper on the subject of the alleged right of way.

¹ Blair v. Macfie, Feb. 2, 1884, 11 R. 515.

No. 3.

Oct. 23, 1886.
Scottish
Rights of Way
and Recreation
Society v.
Macpherson.

The Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) appointed the case to be tried before himself and a jury on issues.*

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The case was similar to Blair's case, in which the principal ground of judgment was that the minds of the public had been biassed by public discussion of the matter. Although the road was in Forfarshire, the members of the society were to be found in the Edinburgh district, and it was there that the Scotsman newspaper was read.

The pursuers argued that the general rule was to try such cases by a jury. Blair's case had several specialties,—first, the right of way claimed was complicated; next, the pursuer had himself sent the correspondence there complained of to the newspapers, and was therefore barred from any favour in the eyes of the Court.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Had I been to act on my own impression I should not have been disposed to interfere with the Lord Ordinary's discretion, but I understand that it is the general feeling of the Court that this case will be better tried by the Lord Ordinary without a jury. Considering that feeling, and looking to the authority of the case of Blair, I move your Lordships that it should be so tried.

LORD YOUNG, LORD CRAIGHILL, and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and remitted to him "to proceed without a jury."

ANDREW NEWLANDS, S.S.C.—TAIT & CRICHTON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 4.

Oct. 27, 1886.
M'Inally v.
King's Trustees.

JOHN M'INALLY, Pursuer (Appellant).—Rhind—A. S. D. Thomson.
ARCHIBALD KING AND OTHERS (King's Trustees), Defenders (Respondents).
—Low—Craigie.

Reparation—Master and Servant—Contributory negligence.—An action of damages was raised against quarrymasters by the representatives of a workman killed while engaged at the quarry in tunnelling a bank of earth with a view to its removal. The work was thus carried on: Two chambers were cut about ten feet apart, and a tunnel was cut between them, supports being left for the roof on each side. The supports were then removed, and the soil allowed to fall in. This work was safe at first, but became dangerous as it approached completion. It was the practice, as a necessary precaution to prevent accident, to station a man on the top of the ground, as the work became dangerous, to warn the workmen below if any cracks shewed themselves, but it did not appear to be under-

* "NOTE.—The defender maintains that this case should be tried without a jury, on the ground to which the Court gave effect in Blair v. Macfie, viz., that the minds of the public, and particularly of that part of the public from which juries are drawn, have been prejudiced in regard to the merits of the case by discussions in the newspapers. But the only publications for which the pursuers are responsible appear to me to be of a very different character from the letters which were addressed to the newspapers by the pursuer in the case referred to. It cannot be supposed that the public mind has been so prejudiced by anything that appears in the pursuers' reports as to render a fair trial by jury impossible or improbable; and the mode of trial ought not to be affected by the letters of persons for whom the pursuers are not shewn to be answerable, or by letters addressed to a newspaper published in London. This case is distinguishable from that of Blair on another ground, because the road now in question is at a distance from Edinburgh, so that there can be no local feeling upon the subject in the district from which the jury are to be drawn."

stood whether it was the duty of the foreman or of the workmen engaged in the work to see to this being done when it became necessary. When the accident happened the deceased was engaged in removing one of the supports, and no watcher had been stationed on the surface of the tunnel.

No. 4.
Oct. 27, 1886.
M'Inally v.
King's Trustees.

Held that there was fault on the part of the employer in respect either that the foreman had not sent a man to watch the surface or made it clear to the workmen that that was their duty, and that there was no contributory negligence on the part of the deceased, who was entitled to rely on the precaution having been taken, and did not carelessly rush upon a seen danger.

THE testamentary trustees of James King, builder, were owners of a 2^d Division. freestone quarry near Coatbridge, and in November 1885 were engaged in stripping the face off a portion of the quarry so as to open it up, John M'Inally being one of the labourers employed by them at this work. The workmen, in order to remove the earth, dig two chambers in the face of the bank of earth, and then tunnel between them, leaving in supports until the tunnel is finished. They then take out the supports or "legs," and the tunnel falls in. The loose earth is then carted away. On the 26th November M'Inally and two other men had been working at a tunnel of this kind, and on the morning of the 27th they finished it and were beginning to take out the "legs," when the earth above, in weight about twelve tons, fell in upon M'Inally and killed him. The weather had for some days before the accident been frosty, but during the night of the 26th there had been heavy rain. In this state of the weather the soil is especially liable to slip.

Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
I.

M'Inally's father brought an action against the trustees for reparation for the death of his son. He averred,—“The accident was caused by the fault or negligence of the defenders, as trustees foresaid, and of their foreman, Robert Miller, in ordering the pursuer's son, and others, to do work of a dangerous character, without taking all ordinary and necessary precautions to prevent accidents. In particular, they ought to have had a man on the ground above, so as to give warning to those working underneath the moment he saw signs of the ground giving way.”

The pursuer pleaded;—The pursuer having suffered loss, injury, and damage, through the fault or negligence of the defenders, as trustees foresaid, or of those for whom they are responsible, the pursuer is entitled to decree.

The defenders stated;—“It is the duty and custom of defenders' workmen, when they are ready for a fall of earth, and begin to take out the supports, to send one of their number above to watch and give warning to the pickmen below taking out the supports when there are any signs of the earth giving way.”

The defenders pleaded, first, that the accident was a damnum fatale; and, second, that the deceased had contributed to the accident by his own negligence.

A proof was allowed. It appeared that a new foreman (Miller) had come to the quarry the day before the accident. It was proved that in the ordinary case of a fall such as had occurred, before it took place cracks would shew themselves in the soil above. It had been customary for a man to be stationed above the tunnel as the work approached completion, and it came near the time for removing the "legs," to watch for these cracks, and warn the workmen in time for them to escape. Until the work reached that stage there was not much danger. The only serious conflict in the evidence was as to whether the foreman set this man to watch, or the workmen did so themselves.* The Court did not de-

* Alexander Robb, a fellow-workman, said,—“A new foreman had come to the works the previous day. His name was Miller. The foreman before that

No. 4.
 —
 Oct. 27, 1886.
M'Inally v.
King's Trustees.

termine this, holding that at all events it had not been shewn that there was an established rule of the quarry to the one effect or to the other, and that therefore the system of management was defective.

The Sheriff-substitute (Birnie), on 1st July 1886, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds, in fact, that, on 27th November 1885, the deceased John M'Inally was killed while in the employment of the defenders, bringing down a fall in a field near Langloan Quarry, and that the pursuer, his father, has suffered damage thereby to the extent of £50: Finds that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence: Finds, in law, that the defenders are not liable in the damage suffered by the pursuer; assoilzies them from the conclusions of the action."*

was called Dawson. In Dawson's time there was always a man at the top to give warning, so as to protect the men working below . . . Cross.—We were working away, thinking that someone was watching on the surface. I thought so, because there was always a man watching before. It was not one of our squad that usually watched. By the Court.—We did not send word to Dawson when we thought we required a watch, but he sent and put on a watch. There were different squads holing along the face. The face was pretty much in a line. Dawson would send a man from some of the other squads when one squad was to bring down a fall."

The evidence of several other labourers examined for the pursuer was to the same effect, and Mitchell, one of the defenders' witnesses, deponed,—“It was the custom, when a squad were ready to take out supports, to send a man above. I would not have started to take out supports without a man above. We had been warned by the gaffer, Dawson. We were always warned, when we commenced the holing, to put a man on the watch. Cross.—I know Dawson. He knew his business well enough, and attended to it. He always warned us not to go in without sending some of us up. I have seen Dawson send men up to watch. If Dawson had been present he would decidedly send a man to the top. I do not know whether it was Dawson's duty to send a man to the top or not. I know that, since the accident, there is always a man watching at the top, or Miller watches himself.”

On the other hand, Miller the foreman (a witness for the pursuer, recalled by the defenders), deponed,—“It is not customary for the foreman to send a man above to watch. I have been a quarryman all my days since I was fourteen or fifteen, and I am now forty-three or forty-four. The men send a man out of their own squad. Dawson might send up a man sometimes, and he might not. In his time the men did it themselves. While Dawson was foreman I was filling bogeys, the same as I was doing at the time of the accident. Had I been holing I would not have started to take out supports unless a man was watching above. I would not expect any man to do it.” A labourer, Moffat, also deponed,—“It was the men's place to have seen there was a watchman before they commenced. Cross.—I was never but once sent by Dawson to watch for a fall on the top. I never saw other men sent by Dawson to watch. The men gaed themselves that were holing. The particular way to do it is, the men that are holing—one of them—go up to see the danger.”

* “NOTE.—It is admitted that there ought to have been a watch on the top, at all events, when the legs began to be taken out. The pursuer says it was the duty of the foreman to set that watch—the defenders that it was the duty of the men themselves. The evidence leaves this in doubt, and it is a point on which there ought to have been no doubt. Had there, therefore, been nothing else in the case, I would have been inclined to think the defenders were liable, on account of their defective system of working. But it seems to me impossible not to hold that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence, in commencing to take out a leg without seeing that there was a watch. No doubt, in certain cases, a workman is entitled to trust to his superior taking the requisite steps for his safety, but it is not proved, in the present instance, that the foreman always set the watch, and still less that the deceased was entitled

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—There should have been a watch. That was admitted. It was then the duty of the master to provide it, or to make it very clear that he left that to the workman. There then was fault in the defenders, a fault in carrying out a plain duty, or a fault in their system. Trust by the workman that the master would do his duty was not contributory negligence, which implied that one rushed into plain danger with open eyes. No. 4.
Oct. 27, 1886.
M'Inally v.
King's Trustees.

The defenders argued;—The workman, by stepping back a yard or two, could have seen whether a watch had been set or not. He knew well that a watch was necessary, and on the evidence it had been shewn that the workmen had often supplied that watch for themselves.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case the Sheriff-substitute is of opinion that there was a breach of duty on the part of the employers on the ground that the system of working in this quarry was defective, that there was an obligation to place a watchman on the top of the place where excavation was going on in the circumstances on which this action proceeds, and that that obligation was not fulfilled. But the Sheriff-substitute has held that the pursuer was guilty of contributory negligence in proceeding to take out the legs without seeing that there was a watchman. I am unable to come to that conclusion on the assumption that the Sheriff's premise is sound, for, if it was the duty of the employers to set a watch, the workman was entitled to rely on that duty being fulfilled, and that is sufficient to dispose of the plea of contributory negligence.

That plea is not an exact counterpart of the obligation incumbent on the employers; there may well be duties on the part of the employer, which do not attach at all to the workman. The principle is that workmen are not to make their master responsible for all accidents which are attributable to their own carelessness. There is no room for that plea here. It was the duty of the foreman to have a watch set, and that all the more that there had been a rainy night after frost. In these circumstances there is no room for the principle of contributory negligence, and there being negligence on the part of the employer I think he is liable to the pursuer's representatives.

LORD YOUNG.—That is my opinion also, but it is not without hesitation and after consideration that I have come to the conclusion that the Sheriff-substitute's judgment, which obviously is well considered, ought to be altered. In supplement of what your Lordship has said, I may express my own view in a very few sentences.

First, this was a dangerous operation, and admittedly there ought to have been a watcher on the top to see what effect the mining was having on the mass above, cracks usually shewing themselves in time for warning to be given by anyone stationed above. It is conceded that it was the foreman's duty either to go himself or to send someone to see if there were any indications of that. There then is fault to begin with. That was a precaution, proper to be taken, which was omitted, and which, if not omitted, would have made the accident less likely to happen. That is in law sufficient to found liability. The accident has happened, and therefore there will be liability, unless there is contributory negligence.

to trust to him doing it. It was easy for the deceased to see if there was a watch or not. The foolhardiness of taking out a leg without making sure of this was manifest, and it would, in my view, be of bad example, and likely to lead to much danger, were workmen to be encouraged in such foolhardiness."

No. 4.

Oct. 27, 1886.
M'Inally v.
King's Trustees.

All the contributory negligence amounts to no more than this, that the workman should have been intelligent enough to refuse to go to work unless he was satisfied that there was a watchman there, or ought to have stopped sooner unless he was satisfied that Miller had done his duty, and that the watchman was there. That is a narrow case of contributory negligence. The ordinary case is that a man rushes into a seen danger in disregard of the ordinary rules of prudence. I do not think M'Inally was doing that here. I rather think he was entitled to assume that Miller had done his duty. I cannot say that he was guilty of a reckless disregard of his own safety in going to his work and continuing his work, for it is according to evidence that this precaution was usually taken. If there was any rule that a workman was to work on until the work became dangerous in his judgment and then appeal to the foreman to set a watch, that ought to have been established as a rule. There should have been no doubt about it. If there was a doubt about it, then the system of this work was bad.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I have found this a very narrow and troublesome case, but I do not differ.

LORD CRAIGHILL was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find, first, that on the morning of 27th November 1885 John M'Inally, son of the pursuer, with other workmen in the employment of the defenders, by orders of Robert Miller, their foreman, resumed work in making excavations in the face of a bank of earth in order to bring down the superincumbent soil, on which work M'Inally had been engaged on the preceding day, and that while in obedience to said orders he was so occupied the earth fell upon him and killed him; second, that it was the duty of the defenders to have placed a man on the summit of the bank to watch and give notice to the workmen engaged below whenever the surface gave indications of being affected by the excavation, but that they failed to do so, and that the death of the said John M'Inally is attributable to their failure; third, that he did not by any fault or negligence on his part contribute to his death: Find in law that the defenders are bound to compensate the pursuer for the loss and damage sustained by him through the death of his son: Therefore sustain the appeal: Recall the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute appealed against: Assess the compensation due to the pursuer at £100," &c.

WILLIAM OFFICER, S.S.C.—R. T. GIBSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 5.

Oct. 29, 1886.
Oastler v.
Dill, Smillie,
& Wilson, &c.

MRS BEATSY YATES OR OASTLER, Pursuer (Appellant).—J. C. Lorimer.

DILL, SMILLIE, & WILSON AND OTHERS, Defenders (Respondents).—

J. C. Thomson—R. L. Orr.

Agent and Client—Liability of agent—Agent for both parties to a loan—Presumption.—In an action brought by a client against a firm of law-agents for recovery of money invested through them on a bad security, it was proved that the agents acted for both parties, the borrowers being the brothers of the leading partner of the agents' firm. The client, a widow lady of middle age, handed the money, a sum of £400, to this partner, and he lent it at five per cent on the security of house property bought by the borrowers immediately before for £1350, and already burdened with a bond for £1000 and a feu-duty of £15. The pursuer averred and deponed at the proof that she had told her agent to lend her money on a first bond, and had given no further instructions; the agent, on the other hand, averred and deponed that he had arranged with a relative and adviser of the pursuer, since dead, before he met her, that this particular security should be taken, and that it was taken with her full approval and in knowledge of its being a postponed security. There was no other material evidence.

Held on the proof that the defender had been employed as agent for the pursuer, and that that agency was not limited, as the defender averred, and that, therefore, the security being such as no prudent agent should have taken for a client, the defender was liable for the loss.

Question (per Lord Justice-Clerk) whether the defender's allegation, even if proved, would have availed him.

Opinion (per Lord Craighill) that, the agency and receipt of the money being proved, the onus was upon the defender.

Observations (per Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Craighill) on the impropriety of the same agent acting for both borrower and lender.

MRS BEATSY YATES OR OASTLER, a widow lady of middle age, living in Glasgow, raised an action in March 1886 against the firm of Dill, Smillie, & Wilson, writers in Glasgow, Mr T. J. Smillie, the only surviving partner of the firm and the executor of Mr Wilson, who, with Mr Smillie, had carried on the firm's business as sole partners for some years. Mrs Oastler's summons concluded for a sum of £480, being a principal sum of £400 invested by her through the firm, and arrears of interest to the amount of £80. The principal sum she had in November 1874 placed in the hands of Mr Smillie, who acted for his firm throughout the transaction, and it was by him invested in a postponed bond at five per cent over house property in Braehead Street, Glasgow. This property was bought in November 1874 by George and Matthew Smillie, two brothers of the principal defender, at a sum of £1350. £350 of this only was paid, the balance being left as a first bond on the property. Besides this, the property was liable in a feu-duty of £15, 2s. Not having received interest for several years, Mrs Oastler raised this action for the principal and arrears of interest, offering to assign the bond on receiving payment.

She averred that she had given Mr Smillie "instructions to invest it in a first bond upon good heritable security." She further averred that she "did not learn till some considerable time afterwards that her money had been invested in the said second bond. She then, and frequently thereafter, complained to the defender Smillie about the transaction, but he put her off from time to time, stating that her money was all right, and that he would see she lost nothing."

Defences were lodged for the firm and Mr Smillie. They denied the pursuer's averments, and averred that the firm had, before the purchase, got a valuation of the subjects at £1450 above the feu-duty. They further alleged that Mrs Oastler had consulted Mr Brownlee, her brother-in-law, as to investments. Mr Brownlee was a retired farmer, and was in the habit of advising her. He, it was averred, had called on the firm, and discussed several loan proposals. In particular, a proposal from the Smillies over the Braehead property was submitted to him, along with the valuation, and it was also explained to him how much had been paid for the property, and the amount of the first bond. The said George Brownlee was so satisfied that he accepted the loan for Mrs Oastler as an investment for her money, and he was to inform Mrs Oastler of the arrangements he had made for her.

It was also averred,—“On the 7th of November Mrs Oastler called and stated that Mr Brownlee had informed her of the arrangements he had made for the investment of her £600 (of which the £400 was part); and after the transactions had again been fully explained to her she left the £600 to be so invested, for which an interim receipt was given her. The

No. 5.

Oct. 29, 1886.

Oastler v.

Dill, Smillie,
& Wilson, &c.2d DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

B.

No. 5:

Oct. 29, 1886.
Oastler v.
Dill, Smillie,
& Wilson, &c.

said George Brownlee and the pursuer were both aware at the time of the transactions that the two loans were on second bonds, and the rate of interest was fixed at five per cent, being the rate usually paid on second bonds." The defenders attributed "the present position" of the security to the depreciation of trade, and stated that if trade improved "it may confidently be anticipated that the value of the property will be sufficient to meet the pursuer's bond."

They pleaded;—(3) The said sum of £400 having been placed in defenders' hands for the special purpose of being invested as a second loan over the property in Braehead Street belonging to George and Matthew Smillie, and the money having been invested as instructed, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor, with expenses. (4) All the particulars connected with said security having been fully explained to the pursuer and to her friend, George Brownlee, on her behalf, and she having, while fully cognisant thereof, agreed to lend said money as a second bond at the increased rate of 5 per cent, being the amount usually paid on second bonds, was bound to take the risk of the property depreciating in value, and the defenders are entitled to absolvitor, with expenses.

A proof was led. The result of it was that Mrs Oastler deponed to the truth of her averments, and Mr Smillie to the truth of those made by him on behalf of the firm and himself.* Mr Brownlee was dead by this time.

* Mrs Oastler deponed,—“I knew the difference between first and second bonds. I was warned after my husband's death by my son-in-law and a brother to be very careful not to put any money on a second bond—to make sure it was a first. My sister, Mrs Brownlee, said if I had a little money, to invest it with Mr Smillie. I did so. I called upon him one day with some money. Mrs Brownlee was with me. I left the £600 on that date. I gave him the money and got a line that he had received it. I gave it to him to put on a good investment on a first bond. I was particular about that. I never authorised Mr Brownlee to find an investment for me. He never did so in his life. I had no conversation with Mr Brownlee about the investment. . . . I trusted Mr Smillie with the £400, and told him to put it on a first bond. Mr Smillie was very highly thought of by Mr Brownlee at that time. Mr Smillie did not explain on the day I left the £600 that it was to be put on a second bond in Braehead Street. He did not tell me of the investment at all at that date. I was only a few minutes in his office. I did not get the bond till two years afterwards. I wrote for it to Mr Smillie repeatedly. My son-in-law read it very carefully, and he told me first that it was a second bond. I was very much astonished. I called upon Mr Smillie and asked him why he had put the money upon a second bond. . . . He said on different occasions that I would lose nothing by him, not a farthing. The interest was paid to me up to 1880. I told Mr Brownlee about my money being put on a second bond after I found it out, and he was very much struck with it. He never knew where the property was, and never knew it belonged to Mr Smillie's brothers till I found it out. Mr Brownlee told me so.”

Mr Smillie deponed,—“In 1874 we were frequently consulted by Mr George Brownlee with reference to investments of money belonging to himself, and once or twice regarding investments for pursuer. He informed me that pursuer had asked him to look out for a suitable investment for her. . . . A variety of proposals were submitted. They are in the books, and were attended to by Mr Wilson, and signed by Mr Wilson. Numerous proposals were made to Mr Brownlee, and investments were made for him. On 1st October 1874 we wrote:—‘We have a chance just now to invest £250 on security of a valuable property in North Street. It would be a first bond, and the interest 5 per cent. It is to take the place of an existing bond. This might suit Mrs Oastler very well.’ That proposal was declined. On 2d November 1874 I placed a proposal before Mr Brownlee for a second loan of £400 over this property in Braehead

The Sheriff-substitute (Lees), on 18th June, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that in November 1874 the pursuer granted a loan of £400 on a second bond over a property in Braehead Street, which has proved a security insufficient for the loan: Finds that the pursuer has not proved that this loan was effected on the advice and responsibility of the defenders as her agents: Finds in law that, in these circumstances, the defenders are not responsible to compensate the pursuer for the loss she has suffered: Therefore, assoilzies them from the conclusions of the action, and decerns." * No. 5.
Oct. 29, 1886.
Oastler v.
Dill, Smillie,
& Wilson, &c.

Street. He accepted that proposal on behalf of pursuer. There were two proposals—one of £200 to M'Kinlay, and this £400, and both were settled at the same time. I explained to Mr Brownlee everything about these properties. I had nothing to conceal. I told him that the purchasers of the property were my two brothers; I told him the price that was being paid; and I stated, what I then believed, and what I still believe, that the properties were well purchased at the time, looking to the situation and other prospective attractions. I left him to decide himself. About that time there were three other proposals, and these were rejected. I had never spoken to pursuer before she and her sister, Mrs Brownlee, called on the morning of the 7th. I had no communication whatever. I assumed she had been communicated with by Mr Brownlee on the particulars, and took for granted she was familiar with them. . . . That money was paid to me for the specific purpose of being invested on these two loans. I have no doubt whatever of that. Pursuer did not then say that the money was to be placed on a first bond. She knew it was a second bond, and that the interest was 5 per cent, and she knew the investments Mr George Brownlee had. I presumed she knew the property. I gave her the particulars she required. Mr Brownlee was neither old nor infirm. He was up in years, but in sound health up to within a few days of his death. He was a thoroughly shrewd man, more especially in connection with money matters. He was a man who would naturally prefer large interest on his money. I considered him quite capable of judging for himself when I put the particulars before him." He denied that he had accepted any personal responsibility for the loan, but stated that he had expressed sympathy for the pursuer.

The books of the firm shewed that Mr Smillie had had meetings at this time both with Brownlee and the pursuer. She was not charged anything for the transaction, all charges being, as usual, paid by the borrower.

* "NOTE.—The case on which the pursuer comes into Court is set forth in the second article of her condescendence, and is as follows:—"Sometime prior to 12th November 1874 the pursuer placed a sum of £400 in the hands of the defenders, Dill, Smillie, & Wilson, with instruction to invest it in a first bond upon good heritable security.' Whatever other points may be in doubt through the lapse of time, this is certain, that that statement is not true. It is clearly proved that the pursuer did not place this or any other sum in the defenders' hands with such instructions. On the contrary, the first time she saw the defenders was the day she came with the money. The loan having been resolved on, the defenders were thereon employed to carry through the transaction. Assuming that it was an imprudent loan—as I think it was—the question is, is a law-agent liable in compensation for the loss that is caused by carrying into execution an imprudent loan which his client has resolved to grant? . . . It seems to me, on a consideration of the whole case, that the pursuer has not proved that she employed the defenders as her agents, or that they agreed to act as such, either for payment or gratuitously, at any period of the negotiations, which would imply that they were responsible to her for loss caused by negligence or imprudent advice on their part as to the sufficiency of the security.

"If these views be sound the defenders are entitled to absolvitor. But I only give them half the expense attending the proof—a step which I stated to them in the course of the proof I might have to take—inasmuch as at least one-half

No. 5. The pursuer appealed.

Oct. 29, 1886.
Oastler v.
Dill, Smillie,
& Wilson, &c.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It is always an unpleasant duty which the Court has to discharge in judging of a question involving personal responsibility like this. The charge is made against a firm of writers in Glasgow that they invested the money of their client on a security which they knew, or ought to have known, was insufficient. That it was insufficient is not now, I think, disputed, and indeed it hardly could be.

The Sheriff-substitute admits, in very strong and forcible language, that it was a kind of transaction that no prudent agent would have gone into with a proper view to the interests of his client, and I agree with him. I do not say that all second bonds should be excluded from transactions of this kind. But here the margin, the apparent margin, was very small; no valuation has been shewn to us that makes out the transaction to have been a proper transaction, and the rate of interest in itself indicates that there was a certain amount of risk.

But the transaction becomes far more unfavourable for the law-agent when it appears that the person in whose favour the loan was negotiated was the brother of the agent. Mr Smillie, too, acted both for the borrower and the lender, a situation in which no law-agent can with propriety place himself.

All these things are not doubtful, but the case, as stated for the defenders, is, that Mr Smillie undertook nothing, that Mr Brownlee had settled with him that the money was to be invested in the way in which it was, and consequently that he, the defender, is no way responsible for the failure of the security. That would be a very singular kind of case, and I doubt whether, even if it had been proved, it would have availed the defender. Mr Smillie knew that the money was Mrs Oastler's, and therefore he was bound to have very sufficient proof of the authority of the third party to settle with him. But there is not a trace or a vestige of such a thing on the face of the transaction. If Mrs Oastler is to be believed—and I see nothing that is satisfactory to contradict her—she stipulated for a first bond, she gave Mr Smillie the money, and trusted to him doing his best in investing it on proper security. I find nothing to contradict that in the written documents, and indeed nothing in the case except Mr Smillie's evidence. I do not prefer it to that of Mrs Oastler. I do not say that I think every word she says is accurate, but I think it is proved that she handed the money to Mr Smillie in the confidence that a proper investment would be found for it, and a proper investment was not found.

LORD YOUNG.—I think this is an exceptionally clear case. That the relation of agent and client for the purpose of lending money existed is too clear to be contested. I believe Mrs Oastler's testimony, and I am prepared to act according to it.

Mrs Oastler then lent her money on a security on which no man of business could possibly be justified in lending his client's money. There of the evidence led by them was to shew that, even if they had advised the pursuer in regard to this loan, the advice was not imprudent. In my opinion this point is hardly open to question. The property was bought at £1350, and was subject to a feu-duty of £15, 2s., and to a first bond of £1000. Whatever doubt there may be as to when a second bond is expedient, I think it is certain that by no stretch of indulgence could it be said that the property was fit a few days afterwards to bear a second bond of £400."

is apparently a margin of £350 on the price of the house, but when you take the feu-duty into consideration there is really no margin at all, there is no security at all, and I agree therefore with the Sheriff-substitute when he says, "Whatever doubt there may be as to when a second bond is expedient, I think it is certain that by no stretch of indulgence could it be said that the property was fit a few days afterwards to bear a second bond of £400."

No. 5.

Oct. 29, 1886.

Oastler v.

Dill, Smillie,

& Wilson, &c.

The case for the defender then is this, that a shrewd old gentleman, Mr Brownlee, who was in the habit of giving advice on such matters, selected this as a good security, leaving nothing to the agent's judgment, and freeing the agent therefore from responsibility. But any such case is inconsistent with the character attributed to Mr Brownlee. This defence—that the agent received special instructions to lend this money on this particular security, be it ever so bad—is not in my opinion proved. It is against the evidence of Mrs Oastler, against the evidence of Mr Brownlee, which we have through her, and against all probability.

I agree with your Lordship, and I am prepared by our judgment to negative the defender's version of the case and affirm that given by the pursuer.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I concur, and I agree with Lord Young in thinking that this is about as clear a case of the kind as ever was brought before a Court. It is much to be regretted that such a case was ever defended, and I am grieved and astonished to think that so many of these cases are connected with the fact that the agent for the lender is also agent for the borrower. It is hard for any man faithfully to serve two masters, and I would have agents earnestly to consider that, if they cannot do justice to both, they should accept employment from one only, so that fidelity to him shall not be affected by any duty due from them to the other.

As regards the first question here, there is no doubt at all that the pursuer employed the defender to lend out her money. He owed her a duty then, and that duty was to advise her as to the security on which the money was to be lent. If all he had to do was to lay out the money on a security already selected and see that the necessary deeds were drawn up, then he had no duty to advise her as to the security. But if there is no evidence to the contrary, the presumption is that she looked to her agent for advice as to whether the proposed security was such a security as is generally accepted for sums proposed to be advanced. The defender does take up the position that he had no duty to give advice, the property to be taken in security having already been made matter of agreement. I have said what, if we were left to presumption, would be the presumption in such a case, but I agree in thinking that the defender's allegations are negatived by the proof.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I agree.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor :—"Find in fact, 1st, That in November 1874 the pursuer employed the defenders, as her agents, to invest a sum of £600 then placed by her in their hands; 2d, That she did not authorise the defenders to invest the said sum, or any part of it, on a second or postponed security, but instructed them to invest it as a first charge on good heritable security; 3d, That the defenders, in disregard of these instructions, lent £400 of the said sum to two brothers of the defender Thomas J. Smillie on a bond and disposition in security of subjects in

No. 5.

Oct. 29, 1886.
Oastler v.
Dill, Smillie,
& Wilson, &c.

Braehead Street, Rutherglen Road, Glasgow, then recently acquired by them at the price of £1350; 4th, That the said subjects were charged with a feu-duty of £15 and an heritable debt of £1000, which exhausted their value, and the said sum of £400, with interest thereon to the amount of £80, has been lost to the pursuer: Find in law that the defenders are bound to indemnify the pursuer for the loss thus sustained by her: Therefore sustain the appeal: Recall the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute appealed against: Ordain the defenders jointly and severally to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £480 sterling, with the legal interest thereof from the date of citation to this action till paid, the pursuer being bound thereupon to deliver to the defenders at their expense an assignation to the said heritable debt," &c.

WILLIAM BLACK, S.S.C.—W. & F. C. MACIVOR, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 6.

Oct. 29, 1886.
Muirhead.

JAMES MUIRHEAD (Clerk to the Police Commissioners of Hillhead), Petitioner.—C. J. Guthrie.

Burgh—Municipal election—Appointment of returning officer—Police Burgh—Nobile officium.

1ST DIVISION.
C.

THE Provost and one of the two junior Magistrates of the police burgh of Hillhead fell to go out of office at the same date, both being candidates for re-election. The other junior Magistrate had died. By the 22d clause of the Ballot Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. cap. 33), it was provided that,—“All municipal elections shall be conducted in the same manner in all respects in which elections of councillors in the royal burghs, contained in schedule C to the Act 3 and 4 William IV., cap. 76, intituled, are directed to be conducted.” In ordinary circumstances the Provost would under the statute have been returning officer at the election, and in the event of his being one of the retiring commissioners the duty would have devolved upon one or other of the junior Magistrates.

In these circumstances the Clerk to the Commissioners presented a petition stating that it had become necessary to apply to the Court, in the exercise of its nobile officium, to appoint a returning officer, and suggesting that one of the other commissioners who did not retire at that date should be appointed.

THE COURT named one of the Sheriff-substitutes of Lanarkshire (Balfour), whom failing, the senior Sheriff-Clerk-Depute of the County, to act as returning officer, superseded extract (the election falling to be held two days later), and authorised the expenses to be paid out of the burgh funds.

MORTON, NEILSON, & SMART, W.S., Agents.

No. 7.

Oct. 30, 1886.
Urquhart v.
M'Kenzie.

DONALD URQUHART, Pursuer (Respondent).—Rhind—A. S. Paterson.
ALEXANDER M'KENZIE, Defender (Reclaimer).—Jameson—M' Lennan.

Reparation—Slander—Wrongous apprehension—Malice and want of probable cause—Relevancy.—In an action of damages for alleged wrongous apprehension, the pursuer averred that he had passed the night in a hotel, and had left in the morning to attend a market in the neighbourhood without paying his bill; that he had not returned to do so, but that when seated in the train in the afternoon on his way home he had beckoned to the innkeeper (the defender), whom he saw on the platform, and was told by him that the amount of the bill was 3s. 6d.; that he then produced a £1 note, and without parting with it received from the innkeeper the 16s. 6d. of change, and that while they were discussing the proper amount due the train left the station, the pursuer taking both sums with him; that the defender forthwith telegraphed, or caused the constable on duty to telegraph, to the police authorities at next station to have the pursuer arrested on a charge of theft; that the pursuer was apprehended at the next station, which was his destination, and that on the following day the defender falsely, maliciously, recklessly, and without probable cause, informed, or caused to be informed, the procurator-fiscal that the pursuer had stolen 16s. 6d., and that he did this for the purpose of inducing him to prosecute the pursuer as being guilty of said crime. It was not stated that the pursuer was known to the defender, or that the latter even knew what he was or where he lived. The Court allowed the pursuer an issue (disa. Lord Rutherford Clark, who held that there was no relevant case).

No. 7.

Oct. 30, 1886.
Urquhart v.
M'Kenzie.

IN an action of damages for wrongous apprehension on a charge of ^{to Division.} theft, at the instance of Donald Urquhart, a farmer at Lamington, near ^{Lord Lee.} Tain, against Alexander M'Kenzie, a hotel-keeper at Bonarbridge, ^{M.} Sutherlandshire, the pursuer averred,—(Cond. 2) "On or about 1st December 1885, the pursuer had occasion to attend a market at Ardgay, near Bonarbridge, and he stayed the night at the defender's hotel there. The market was continued on the following day, and the pursuer rose early that morning to attend it. The pursuer met the defender at the market, and offered to pay his bill, but the defender refused to accept payment, saying that he could not tell the amount. It was the pursuer's intention to return to the hotel, and pay the bill before leaving in the evening, but being pressed for time, and in a hurry to catch the train, and having become suddenly unwell, he was unable to do so. He entered the train at Ardgay Station intending to remit the amount to the defender whenever he got home." (Cond. 3) "When the train was on the point of starting from Ardgay Station, the pursuer caught sight of the defender standing on the platform, and beckoned him to come up so that he might settle with him. The defender said the amount of the bill was 3s. 6d., and after the pursuer had searched for in his pocket and produced a £1 note, handed him 16s. 6d. as change. The pursuer, however, fell to be credited by the defender with the sum of 1s. 6d., which was the change of a florin after deducting the price of a gill of whisky, and which the defender had been unable to give to the pursuer in the morning when the whisky was ordered. The pursuer told the defender this, but the train started before the matter was settled, and the pursuer called out to the defender that he would send the proper amount to him when he got home." (Cond. 4) "On the arrival of the train at Tain, the pursuer was apprehended by the policeman (Malcolm M'Donald, then in Tain, now sergeant of police at Invergordon), conveyed by him to one of the station apartments, and there searched for the money given by the defender as before stated. This was done on the instructions of the defender, who it is believed and averred telegraphed, or caused the constable on duty to telegraph, from Ardgay to the police authorities at Tain to have the pursuer arrested on a charge of theft. The pursuer's apprehension was made in the presence of a great number of people, many of whom were returning from the said market, including many of his acquaintances and friends with whom he had business relations. The defender, on the following day, or on one of the days of the said month of December, falsely, maliciously, recklessly, and without just or probable cause, informed, or caused to be informed, the then procurator-fiscal at Tain, that the pursuer had stolen the 16s. 6d. above referred to, and this he did for the purpose of inducing the said procurator-fiscal to prosecute the pursuer as being guilty of said crime." (Cond. 5) " . . . The said charge was false, and it was made and the other proceedings taken by the defender maliciously, recklessly, and without any just or probable cause. . . . "

No. 7.

Oct. 30, 1886.
Urquhart v.
M'Kenzie.

The defender stated in answer that the pursuer, who was quite unknown to him, had had ample time and opportunity to pay his bill, both in the morning and in the interval between the close of the market and the departure of the train. He further denied the pursuer's account of what had taken place at the station, and stated that it was only after some search that he had discovered the pursuer seated in the train, and had demanded payment of the bill. "The pursuer produced a £1 bank-note, and asked defender to supply him with the difference between that amount and the sum of 3s. 6d. due to the defender. The defender counted out 16s. 6d. of silver and handed it to the pursuer, who on receiving it placed both it and the £1 note in his pocket, and refused to pay the defender anything. The defender was again demanding his money when the train started, and defender had to leave the carriage without payment. It is denied that there was any sum remaining to be settled between the parties over and above the said 3s. 6d., and also denied that the pursuer referred to any such sum in the defender's hearing, or said that he would send the money when he got home." The defender further denied that he had made any charge of theft against, or given any instructions for the apprehension of the pursuer, and stated that he had merely consulted a police-officer at Ardgay as to the best means of discovering the pursuer's name and address. He further averred,—“Any slight annoyance or inconvenience which the pursuer may have experienced from being interrogated by the police-officer at Tain was entirely due to his own carelessness and negligence in not paying his hotel bill in the regular way, and in not furnishing the defender with his name and address. Further, his action in returning his £1 note to his pocket, after receiving 16s. 6d. of change from the defender, amply justified the defender in taking immediate steps to trace him out, and to demand an explanation.”

The defender pleaded;—(1) No relevant case. (2) The defender not having charged the pursuer with theft, or caused him to be apprehended, is not liable in damages. (3) The defender having acted in good faith and with probable cause, and separatim, the pursuer being himself to blame for the proceedings complained of, the defender should be assoilzied, with expenses.

The Lord Ordinary (Lee) approved of the following issue for the trial of the case:—“Whether, on or about 1st December 1885, the defender maliciously, and without probable cause, caused the pursuer to be apprehended on a charge of theft, and searched by a police-officer at Tain, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? Damages laid at £500.”

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—There was no issuable matter averred which could be sent to a jury.¹ Looking to the pursuer's own statement, the defender could not have done otherwise than he did. There was probable cause for the course alleged to have been taken by the defender. Probable cause in a case of this kind meant a ground for reasonable suspicion. The defender could only have had one motive, viz., to secure payment of his bill; no illegitimate motive—such as would imply malice—was averred, or could be inferred from the pursuer's statement.²

The respondent having replied,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think neither party comes well out of the admitted facts in this case, and certainly the pursuer does not, because, upon his own shewing, he went away without paying his bill, and more than that he had with him the 16s. 6d. of change which had been handed to him at the door of the carriage by the innkeeper. It is very likely that he did not mean to go away without paying his bill. But it remained unpaid, and accordingly the innkeeper sent word to the next station to have the matter inquired into. I think the whole circumstances under which the action of the defender was taken are matter for proof. The statement of the pursuer does not, perhaps, make it appear likely that he will be able to prove that the defender acted without probable cause, but, nevertheless, I think there is no course open to us but to approve of the issue as adjusted and to send the case to trial.

¹ Craig v. Peebles, Feb. 16, 1876, 3 R. 441.

² Lightbody v. Gordon, June 15, 1882, 9 R. 934; Hassan v. Paterson, June 26, 1885, 12 R. 1164.

No. 7.

Oct. 30, 1886.
Urquhart v.
M'Kenzie.

LORD YOUNG.—I am unable to arrive at any other conclusion. This is not the first case of the kind in which I have thought that the pursuer had not set forth a very likely case, but where, according to experience, I have found it impossible to refuse an opportunity of having the question tried. Looking to the way in which the pursuer's statements have been met by the defender, the question we have to consider is, whether, assuming that the pursuer can establish the case he avers, he would be entitled to damages. His case stripped of superfluities is, that the defender caused him to be apprehended on a charge of theft at Tain Railway Station, and that, acting maliciously and without probable cause, the defender further informed the procurator-fiscal there the next day that he had stolen the 16s. 6d. That appears to me to be a perfectly relevant case for trial, although it may not turn out to be true.

The defender's denial of the truth of the pursuer's story is most explicit, and we cannot leave it out of view. That raises a simple issue of fact, but then the defender pleads further that, even assuming he did act as the pursuer says he did, there was, on the pursuer's shewing, probable cause for his action. Such alternative pleading, I think, generally has an unfavourable effect on the case of the party using it. I entirely appreciate the view, that if it appear on the pursuer's own statement that the defender must have acted without malice and with probable cause, then the case ought to be thrown out, but I cannot say more here than that the pursuer's case appears to be unpromising. He did not pay his bill, but, as the train was starting, he saw the defender, who handed him the change for £1, deducting the amount of the bill, being 3s. 6d.; the pursuer thus carried off both the £1 and the 16s. 6d.; but I could not say that the pursuer is not entitled to satisfy the jury, if he can, that the defender had no probable cause for the course he is said to have taken in giving the pursuer in charge and informing the procurator-fiscal. I think it likely that the case will assume such a complexion that a jury will hold that there was probable cause, but I do not think it according to practice to throw it out in such circumstances at this stage.

LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am sorry to differ from your Lordships. The circumstances are certainly peculiar, and probably unique, in this respect that the defence of probable cause is founded on the pursuer's averments, but nevertheless I am of opinion that the pursuer has not stated any relevant case. We are concerned with his averments only, and as the charge in question was made to the public authorities only, it is clear that it will not afford ground for an action of damages, unless it was made maliciously and without probable cause. If the pursuer had stated that the charge had been made with probable cause, then he would not have stated a relevant case, and although he has not used these words, I think it is quite plain from the statements he does make upon record

No. 7.

Oct. 30, 1886.
Urquhart v.
M'Kenzie.

that the defender had probable cause for acting as he did. It is not said by the pursuer that he and the defender were in any way acquainted with one another; so far as the record goes, they must be taken to have been complete strangers. The pursuer had lived in the defender's hotel, and had left in the morning after breakfast without paying. He did not return in the course of the day, and it appears from the averments that while the pursuer was seated in the train preparing to start upon his journey the defender appeared on the platform, and the pursuer beckoned to him to come to him. The result of the interview which followed, according to the pursuer's version, was that the pursuer was told that the amount of his bill was 3s. 6d., and that on being so informed he produced a £1 note and the defender handed him 16s. 6d. as change. Then there was a dispute as to the true amount, and while that dispute was going on the train moved off, and the pursuer called out that he would send the defender "the proper amount" when he got home. He did not say where his home was. He does not say there was any difficulty in his returning the 16s. 6d. before the departure of the train, and I cannot conceive that there could have been any difficulty in his doing this, however fast the train was moving. But the pursuer chose to retain both sums—simply saying that he would send the proper amount of the bill when he got home. The defender, from whom the sum of 16s. 6d. had thus been carried off by a person with whom it is not said that he was acquainted, and who had left no address, could not but have his suspicions raised as to the honesty of the pursuer, and for these suspicions he had probable cause. I cannot conceive that it could have been otherwise. It may be true that the pursuer was not dishonest, but that he had laid himself open to the strongest suspicion of dishonesty, such as thoroughly to justify the feeling on the defender's part that he might have committed a theft, is not open to doubt. Looking to this record, I cannot see that the defender had not, upon the pursuer's own shewing, the strongest probable cause for taking the steps he is alleged to have taken and giving the pursuer in charge.

We are not concerned here with the defender's statement in answer. But looking only to the averments which the pursuer has put upon record, I cannot see how we can send this case to trial. It seems to me that the case is just as clear as if the pursuer had put upon record the statement that the defender made a charge of theft against him with probable cause, which would not have been a relevant charge.

THE COURT adhered.

J. D. MACAULAY, S.S.C.—WILSON & MACKAY, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 8. WILLIAM MACKINNON (Millar's Judicial Factor), Pursuer (Respondent).—Asher—Low.

Nov. 2, 1886.
Millar's Factor
v. Millar's
Trustees.

JOHN KNOX AND OTHERS (Millar's Trustees), Defenders (Reclaimers).—D.-F. Mackintosh—C. S. Dickson.

Trust—Liability of trustees—Personal liability of trustees for an imprudent investment.—Circumstances in which family trustees, with the fullest powers of investment on such securities, heritable or personal, as they should think proper, were made liable for the loss of a sum lent to a member of the family on insufficient security.

The trustees of Mr John Millar, draper in Glasgow, who died in 1863, held his estate, consisting, inter alia, of £4400 of capital in his business and his business premises, for the purpose of paying his widow an annuity of £400 per annum, and of dividing the residue among his children. They had the fullest powers to invest the estate "on such securities, heritable or personal, as they should think proper." The eldest son, who subsequently carried on the business, in 1874 bought the premises for £25,000, and applied to the trustees, after paying £13,000 of the price, for a loan of £12,000 to meet the balance, offering as security the premises themselves, on which he had already borrowed £17,000, and other subjects belonging to him. All these subjects were already burdened. The margin of value of the whole subjects, including the business premises,—taking as the gross value in each case the prices paid for them within a year of the loan,—was £12,150. He also offered the security of a policy on his life for £2160, the surrender value of which was less than £500, and his share, viz., one-seventh, of the sum (£10,000) held by the trustees for security of the widow's annuity. In addition he offered the personal security of his father-in-law, engaged in business in Glasgow as a "club draper," who was proprietor of certain subjects in which large quantities of shale were believed to exist. Both he and the offerer were then (1874) in good credit. The offer was accepted, but no communication was made to the other beneficiaries, several of whom were of age. One of them shortly afterwards, on hearing of the loan, protested for himself and the other beneficiaries, but no notice was taken of his letter. In 1884, the debtor and his father-in-law having both become bankrupt, and the prior bondholders having entered into possession, an action was raised by the beneficiaries against the trustees for repayment of the loss sustained by the estate through the transaction.

Held that the trustees were personally liable as having invested on unsubstantial and insufficient security, contrary to the law and practice of trust administration.

JOHN MILLAR, draper in Glasgow, died in November 1863, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement with a codicil by which he directed his trustees to pay his widow an annuity of £400, and to divide the rest of the estate among his children. Mr Millar was twice married. Of the first marriage one son, William, survived him. Of the second marriage there were, at the date of the transactions to be narrated, six children living. His second wife also survived him.

The trust-deed contained this clause:—"Declaring that, as I have full trust and confidence in the integrity and ability of my said trustees, and feel satisfied that they will act in the execution of this trust as shall appear to them most for the benefit thereof, they shall not be liable for omissions, errors or neglect of management, nor singuli in solidum, but each shall be liable for his own actual intromissions only; and I authorise them to appoint one of themselves, or any other person, to be a factor under them, with the usual commission, declaring that they shall not be liable in any way for such factor further than that he is habit and repute responsible at the time of his appointment; and for the better enabling my said trustees to carry the foresaid purposes into effect, I hereby authorise and empower them, when they shall consider it necessary or expedient, to dispose of my whole estate, heritable and moveable, either by public roup or private sale, and to lend out the proceeds and other funds of the trust, or such parts thereof as may not be otherwise required, on such securities, heritable or personal, as they shall think proper."

The trust-estate consisted mainly of Mr Millar's share of the business, in which William was by this time a partner, and the premises in which the business was carried on. The first balance made after Mr Millar's death shewed his share of capital to be £4400. The trustees arranged with William that he should carry on the business, leaving his father's capital with him. William assumed his stepmother as a partner for a period of ten years, taking a lease of the premises at £400. Mrs Millar's share of the profits was one-half, and during the ten years of her partnership that share amounted to £14,000.

No. 8.

Nov. 2, 1886.
Millar's Factor
v. Millar's
Trustees.

2d DIVISION.
 Lord M'Laren.
 M.

No. 8.
—
Nov. 2, 1886.
Millar's Factor
v. Millar's
Trustees.

In March 1874 negotiations began as to a new lease of the business premises. Mrs Millar and her children, of whom two had attained majority, insisted that the trustees should sell the property, No. 20 High Street. They were influenced in this wish by two considerations, the favourable state of the property market at the time, and the circumstance that the rent payable by William Millar (£400) was inadequate. The trustees, being advised by counsel that it was their duty to comply with the reasonable desire of the beneficiaries, obtained a valuation of the property, wherein the property was valued at £19,000. The beneficiaries considered that this valuation was too low, and at a joint meeting of the trustees and beneficiaries it was agreed that the property should be offered for sale at the price of £25,000. In May 1874 William offered this sum, "settlement to take place in May 1874." The offer was accepted, but no immediate settlement was made.

On 31st October 1874 a letter from William to Mr Black, the trustees' agent (he was also William's own agent), was read at a meeting of trustees asking them for a loan of £12,000, and informing them that he had already borrowed £17,000 over the premises sold to him in May. The security which he offered for this advance he thus stated:—

"Property, 30 High Street, valued by Mr Graham,	£6000	0	0
Bond,	4000	0	0
Reversion,			£2,000 0 0
Shops and back lands, 34, 36, 40, 42
High Street,	£15,600	0	0
Bond,	11,000	0	0
Reversion,			4,600 0 0
Property, 20 High Street,	£25,000	0	0
Bond,	17,000	0	0
Reversion,			8,000 0 0
Life policy,			2,160 0 0
One-seventh part of £10,000 (the amount held by the trustees for security of the widow's annuity),			1,428 11 5
			£18,188 11 5

and, besides the above, the personal security of myself and my father-in-law, Andrew Walker, Esq. of Hartwood, West Calder."

The property valued at £6000 had been bought by Mr William Millar at Whitsunday 1873 for £5500, and bonded by him for £4000, leaving a margin of £1,500 0 0

The property valued at £15,600 had been bought by him at Whitsunday 1874 for £13,650, and bonded for £11,000, leaving a margin of 2,650 0 0

The property valued at £25,000 was bonded for £17,000, leaving a margin of 8,000 0 0

£12,150 0 0

These same properties had already been valued in April 1873 and March and June 1874 respectively by Mr Graham, valuator, at £6000, £15,600, and £25,000, values which would leave for the proposed loan of £12,000 a margin of £14,600.

The proposal was accepted by the trustees on 2d November 1874, and Mr Millar accordingly having paid £13,000 of the price granted a bond in favour of the trustees for £12,000, being the balance, with the real and personal securities above mentioned.

In December of the same year Mr M'Michael, property valuator, made a new valuation of the properties, which resulted in bringing out values of £7000, £16,550, and £25,000, shewing a margin for this loan of £16,550, reporting further that he was of opinion that the properties "would greatly increase in value."

No. 8.

Nov. 2, 1886.
Millar's Factor
v. Millar's
Trustees.

The surrender value of the policy of insurance was considerably less than £500.

In the meantime, however, on 27th November 1874, Mr A. G. Millar, the eldest son of the second family, had addressed a letter to the trustees in these terms:—"It is as well to make known to you in this form that I and the rest of our family strongly object to £12,000 of our father's estate being lent to my brother William on his property in the High Street, and on the personal security of his father-in-law, Mr Walker. There are already four bonds over it, although they are not over the same parts of the property. . . . I protest for myself and the rest of the family against this investment. The property is thus burdened altogether for £44,000, and it is plain to anybody that there is not a shilling of margin in the security. You will please therefore to understand that the investment is made not only against our wishes, but against our objections, and that we will look to the trustees for the £12,000 if it should be lost in whole or in part by the insufficiency of the security."

The trustees made no answer to this letter, and the only reference to it in their minutes was an entry of 6th January 1875, viz., "There was read to the trustees a letter addressed to them by Mr A. G. Millar, dated 27th November last."

Again, on 13th January 1880, Mr A. G. Millar wrote to the trustees in these terms:—"Fully more than five years ago I wrote a letter to you on behalf of the other members of the family and myself, of which a copy is enclosed. It called attention to the risk of lending a large sum of money to Mr Millar on security which was plainly insufficient. During the long period that has since elapsed no endeavour has been made to realise the investment, or any part of it. The depression of trade and in the value of property renders it still more insecure, and I beg again to call the attention of the trustees to it, and to renew the protest then made. I think it advisable that the trustees, for their own sake as well as for the trust, should make some arrangement for the reduction of this debt. As soon as a meeting is called, and a decision arrived at, I shall be glad to hear the result." This letter was considered at a meeting of the trustees held upon the same day (13th January), and the minute recorded that the trustees instructed their agent "to reply that they had carefully considered the security before they gave the loan, and were satisfied with it, that the interest had always been regularly paid, and that they saw no reason for disturbing it at present."

In 1884 Mr William Millar became insolvent. He had previously assumed a son into partnership. The estimated dividend on the company estate was 8s. 8d., and 2d. on his individual estate. The trustees had taken no obligation from the new firm. Mr Walker also became insolvent, his estate paying about 5s. 9d. per pound. The prior bondholders took possession of the heritable subjects, and it appeared that there was little or no prospect of any balance remaining after satisfying their claims.

On 28th February 1885 Mr Mackinnon was appointed judicial factor on the trust-estate, two of the trustees having resigned, and the sole remaining trustee being in bad health, and unable to attend to business.

Mr Mackinnon, on 24th July 1885, raised an action against John Knox and others, being the survivors of the trustees and the representative of one deceased, concluding for declarator that they were bound to repay the

No. 8.

Nov. 2, 1886.
 Millar's Factor
 v. Millar's
 Trustees.

sum of £10,000, or such other sum as should be found to be lost to the estate in consequence of this loan, and for payment of that sum.

The pursuer averred,—“The pursuer is advised that the defenders are bound to make good to the trust-estate the said sum of £10,000. The securities upon which the trustees lent the said sum of £12,000 were of such a nature that the trustees were guilty of breach of trust in investing the said trust-funds upon them. The said investments were manifestly insecure and liable to result in loss, and the borrowers could not have obtained loans in the open market upon such securities as were taken by the trustees. It was illegal and ultra vires of the trustees to invest the said sums upon said securities. Further, the said sum of £12,000 was lent to Mr William Millar for his accommodation, and not with a view to the interests of the trust-estate. The said trustees were also guilty of neglect and violation of their duty, in that they took no steps to realise the said sum of £12,000, although the value of house property in Glasgow had fallen long before the insolvency of Mr William Millar and Mr Walker, and although the beneficiaries under the trust pressed them to realise the said sum, on the ground that the security was plainly insufficient. The defenders deny their liability to make good the loss sustained by the trust-estate, and the present action has been rendered necessary. The pursuer offered to transfer the said securities to the defenders upon payment of the sums lent, but the offer was declined.”

The defenders answered,—“The trust-deed is referred to. Admitted that the defenders deny liability. The correspondence between the parties is referred to. Quoad ultra denied. Explained that in the whole matters alleged the said trustees acted with the advice of skilled valuers and with all reasonable and proper care and prudence in the interest of the trust-estate, and that the present position of the loans is due entirely to causes for which neither the said trustees nor the defenders are responsible.”

The pursuer pleaded;—The trust-estate having sustained loss by the illegal and improper actings of the defenders John Knox and Gavin Miller, and of the deceased Robert M'Cowan, the said two first-named defenders, and the defender Robert W. M'Cowan, as representing the said deceased Robert M'Cowan, are jointly and severally liable in reparation.

The defenders pleaded;—(5) The sums in question not having been illegally and unwarrantably invested upon insufficient security, the defenders should be assoilzied. (6) The whole actings of the trustees in the matters alleged having been legal and proper, and within their powers, and warranted by the trust-deed, they should be assoilzied. (8) The trustees being by the trust-deed entitled to lend on such heritable or personal security as they should think proper, and having in the bona fide and proper discharge of their duty agreed to give the loans in question, they should be assoilzied.

A proof was allowed. It appeared that in 1874 the balance at Mr William Millar's credit in the firm's books was £7992. The average turn-over of the business, from 1872 to 1880, was £87,300, the highest year being that ending 31st January 1874 when it was £102,463, and the lowest 1879 when it was £65,463. He was generally reputed in Glasgow to be worth £12,000 to £20,000. As regarded Mr Walker's position the following evidence was given. Mr Bruce, agent for the Clydesdale Bank, deponed,—“Mr Andrew Walker was a customer of the bank. He kept an account at my branch. He was a draper at the corner of Candleriggs and Trongate. He occupied a single flat up a stair. His business was a club trade business,—that is, he supplied parties with goods which they paid by weekly instalments. I would not say that his business was small, and I would not say it was large; it was an ordinary business. In 1872 his turnover at the bank was £2060, and the average balance at his credit about £200. In 1873 his turnover was £3363, and the average balance at his credit about £300. In 1874 his turnover was £1406, and the average balance at his credit £300. (Q.) What sort of overdraft would you have given him? (A.) He never asked one, but judging from the account, he could not have asked more than £100 or £200." On the other hand, Mr Runcy, of the Union Bank, deponed that on Mr Walker being offered to them as a cautioner for £5500,—“We got a report as to Mr Andrew Walker's sufficiency. The report is entered in our books, and is to the effect that he was possessed of large means, and was quite sufficient for all his engagements. I cannot give the date of that report. It was got at the time we accepted his guarantee. It was before June 1884.” Cross.—“I believed the report was received from the Clydesdale Bank in the ordinary way. Our bank asked a report from the Clydesdale Bank.” Mr Knox, one of the defenders, deponed,—“I had known Mr Walker, Mr William Millar's father-in-law, a good many years. He was reputed in 1874 to be worth between £30,000 and £40,000, and some people said more. I believed him to be worth that. I knew he had a large property called Hartwood, and a place in Linlithgowshire called Murrayfield. I had no doubt that he was good for a loan of £12,000.” Hartwood had been bought in 1856 for £13,000. Mr Walker was proprietor of three-fourths of it, and it was subsequently believed to contain shale, and to have largely increased in value. In the circular issued to creditors on Mr Walker's bankruptcy it was valued at £18,000. It was reported to the trustees by their agent that Mr Walker was worth £30,000 or £40,000.

Mr A. G. Millar and Mr Knox were examined as to the remonstrances addressed to the trustees by the former.*

No. 8.

Nov. 2, 1886.
Millar's Factor
v. Millar's
Trustees.

* Mr A. G. Millar deponed,—“I was aware that the purchase of the property was not carried through by the Whitsunday term. I ascertained afterwards, at the November term, that the transaction had been settled. I wished to know at that time what the trustees had done with the £25,000, and I went to Mr M'Cowan's office to see the books. Although Mr M'Cowan had been assumed as a trustee he still continued to act as factor. I had no knowledge at that time as to what had been done with the price. I saw the books in Mr M'Cowan's office, and observed an entry of £12,000 as lent to my brother William over the property in High Street. I had no knowledge of the loan prior to that. Mr M'Cowan was not a lawyer, merely an accountant. I could not get any information in Mr M'Cowan's office as to what security had been given for the £12,000. I accordingly went to the office of Mr Black, the agent of the trust, and asked him, but he said he had no authority to give me any information. He did not give me any information. I afterwards met Mr Gavin Miller and asked him, and he would not give me any information either. He refused to give me any information. I then went to my agent, Mr Clark, and accompanied him to the office of Sasines, where he examined the records. We found the bond for £12,000 on the record, shewing the properties which were held in security. The conduct of the trustees did not appear to me satisfactory when I saw how the £12,000 stood, and in consequence my agent drafted a letter for me to address to the trustees. The letter was written on behalf of myself and the other members of the family. I obtained their concurrence to the letter when I sent it. From the examination of the records which I made along with the agent, I thought the loan of £12,000 was a very precarious investment for the trustees to make. I do not recollect receiving any answer, either written or verbal, to the letter which was sent to the trustees at that time. During the next few years I was not in the way of meeting Mr Knox much, but I frequently met Mr Gavin Miller. I often complained to him about the position of this security. I used to tell him that I thought it very

No. 8.

Nov. 2, 1886.
 Millar's Factor
 v. Millar's
 Trustees.

On 19th May 1886 the Lord Ordinary (M'Laren) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the sum of £12,000* was lent by the trustees of the deceased John Millar to his son William Millar on unsubstantial and insufficient security, contrary to the law and practice of trust administration: Therefore decerns against the defenders for payment of the said sum on receiving from the judicial factor an assignation to the securities libelled."† foolish to keep this investment of £12,000, more particularly when it had been laid aside as an investment for my mother's annuity."

Mr Knox deponed,—“It was not suggested by anyone prior to the granting of the loan that there was any doubt about it. (Q.) Was Mr A. G. Millar's letter of 27th November 1875 the first suggestion of doubt on that subject? (A.) I have no recollection of that letter at all. I do not know by whom that letter would be received. If it was addressed to the trustees it would go in ordinary course to Mr Black. The factor on the estate at that time was Mr M'Cowan. Mr M'Cowan is dead.” Cross.—“Mr M'Michael's report of December 1874 was got by the trustees, and engrossed by their orders in the minute-book. (Q.) Can you say why Mr M'Michael was employed to value all these properties in December 1874? (A.) It would be to satisfy ourselves that we were justified in giving the loan. (Q.) Why had you occasion to have doubts at that time as to the sufficiency of the loan? (A.) I do not know that we had any doubts, but we might wish to make ourselves doubly sure. (Q.) Seeing the sequence of these events, have you any doubt that you knew of the letter of November 1874 from the family, and that you instructed Mr M'Michael to value the properties in consequence? (A.) It is very possible that may be. The letter of 27th November 1874 states the objection of the family to the £12,000 loan to Mr William Millar. (Q.) Can you explain why the trustees, seeing there was that objection on the part of the family, did not call up this objectionable loan? (A.) The reason was that the trustees did not consider it objectionable. They knew very well there was a strong feeling in the family, and I think the feeling in the trustees' mind was that the family wished to call up the loan in order to injure William.”

* It was admitted in the Inner-House that his Lordship had erred in giving decree for this amount, not having taken into account the dividends received from Mr Millar's and Mr Walker's estates.

† “NOTE.— . . . The offer of Mr William Millar, which is dated 7th May 1874, bears that the settlement is to take place that month. But it does not appear that the trustees, after accepting the offer, took any steps towards enforcing this condition, and the settlement was allowed to lie over until Martinmas.

“This is not a favourable circumstance for the case of the trustees. The unexplained default in payment, where the sale was for an immediate settlement, ought to have suggested to the trustees that Mr William Millar was not in circumstances to fulfil an obligation for such a sum, and that he needed time to obtain the money by borrowing. When Martinmas came it turned out that Mr Millar had arranged to borrow as much as he could get in the open market on the security of this property, namely, £17,000. In a letter, dated 31st October 1874, addressed to Mr George Black as agent of the trustees, Mr William Millar proposed to borrow from the trustees not the difference between that sum, £17,000, and the price, £25,000 (which would be only £8000), but the sum of £12,000, offering as security the margin of value of his purchase from them, and the margins of his other High Street properties, which were already bonded, apparently, for as much as could be obtained in the open market. This proposal ought to have alarmed the trustees very much.

“And here I pause to observe, that Mr George Black, the gentleman to whom this strange, and, I should say, alarming proposal was addressed, was also Mr William Millar's agent, the person who assisted him in his purchases, and arranged the first loans for him. Very likely the letter addressed to Mr Black as agent for the trustees was written by himself in his capacity of agent for Mr Millar; and it is in evidence, in answer to a question put by myself, that the

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—It was said that this loan was an imprudent transaction, and was besides that corrupt as being to a favoured debtor. But to infer personal liability upon trustees, the conclusion which the pursuer here desired to reach, the transaction must be imprudent in the sense that no prudent man would entertain it, and the alleged corruption—i.e., the charge that the trustees had lent to William

No. 8.

Nov. 2, 1886.
 Millar's Factor
 v. Millar's
 Trustees.

trustees were advised by Mr Black that they were in safety to accept the loan. This is another illustration of the consequences of the odious practice (on which I have so often had occasion to comment) of the same agent acting for trustees who trust to him for advice, and also for a private party having an adverse interest.

"No neutral person conversant with the law could or would have advised these trustees to accept Mr Millar's offer. It was accepted, however, unconditionally, without even the stipulation invariably inserted by companies who lend on second class securities, that the debt should be reduced by periodical instalments.

"In 1884 Mr William Millar became insolvent, and there is at present no prospect of the recovery of the £12,000 lent to him from the trust-estate, and the loss to the trust is estimated at £10,000. I have stated the more important facts of the case, and I must now state the conclusion at which I have arrived, which is, that the defenders are liable to replace the funds lost to the estate, they receiving from the trustees an assignation to the securities in case these may eventually produce a reversion.

"It is a very unpleasant duty on the part of the Judge the enforcing personal liability against the holders of offices of trust, but I do not see how this result can be avoided in the present case, unless trustees are to be made absolutely irresponsible for their actions.

"The question of the reasonableness of the loan must be carefully distinguished from that of the sale. The beneficiaries demanded a sale, and were willing that their elder brother should be the purchaser, though it is plain that they used no influence with the trustees on his behalf, and were quite willing that the property should be put up to auction. I think that the trustees acted properly in accepting Mr William Millar's offer of £25,000, but, having done so, they should have kept him to his bargain. If Mr Millar had dealt openly with them, and had said, 'I have no money to complete the purchase; my capital is all locked up in other property, and I ask you to lend me the reversion of the price over what I can borrow in the market,' the case would have been very different. The trustees might then have consulted their constituents, and with their approval might have lent the balance of the price, or postponed the payment of the price, stipulating for periodical instalments and a security title. In the worst case they would have got back their own property unencumbered on repaying the £17,000 to the heritable creditor from whom they received it.

"I do not say that this is a kind of transaction which trustees ought to enter into on their own responsibility, but it would have been a fair family arrangement, and the trustees might have asked an indemnity from such of the beneficiaries as were able to give it.

"But the actual case is that Mr William Millar gets the property at the price of £25,000, borrows £17,000 upon it, whereof he only pays £13,000 to the trustees, and remains their debtor for £12,000, giving them in exchange a conveyance to the reversion, and other securities of the like unsubstantial character. Why did the trustees not insist on receiving, at least, the entire proceeds of the £17,000 loan? I asked that question of the trustees themselves, and of counsel. No explanation was or could be given. The truth is that the £12,000 lent by the trustees, wholly on margins, was an accommodation to Mr Millar, and not an investment of trust-funds in the ordinary course of business. When the true character of the transaction is discovered, if I have rightly judged it, there can be little doubt as to the legal result.

"Trustees are not entitled to accommodate their friends, or the members of the trustor's family, with the funds entrusted to their care. In such a case

No. 8. Millar rather than to another—had no place unless the transaction was

Nov. 2, 1886.
 Millar's Factor
 v. Millar's
 Trustees.

imprudent in that sense. If the transaction was sound, it mattered not that the trustees had preferred him to other borrowers that might have been found in the open market. Now, was the loan imprudent? What were its elements? First, there was heritable security, which left a margin of £4500 on M^r Michael's valuation, and of £2600 on Graham's. The trustees had just got a sum of £25,000 for the property No. 20 High Street, and were entitled to take that as its value. That price was obtained in a rising market, and could, they were entitled to believe, be obtained again. The next element was William's personal credit. He was the sole partner in a business which was going on profitably, from which his stepmother retired with a profit of £14,000, the turnover in which had come to be £100,000 annually, having increased from £9000 in 1847 to £45,000 in 1863. William in 1874 was worth at least £12,000. Then there was the personal security of Walker, who was believed by the trusteer himself to be worth £40,000, and whose credit was good. The dividends on the estates of William Millar and Walker amounted to 14s. 6d. per pound. Then there was the policy on William's life, and the share which he would himself take of the sum lent to him, making the loan so much the less. A loan so secured could not be said to be such as any prudent man would reject at once. Now, if the security was good, the motive alleged against the trustees, viz., that they gave the loan to oblige one of the family, was praiseworthy. It was right and proper that trustees administering such a trust should do something to help the son of their old friend, if they did not exceed their powers. No one would question the propriety of it if they had carried the whole family with them. It was said they had been warned by the other beneficiaries, and had paid no heed to the warning, and that that put them in bad faith, and induced a belief that they were favouring the debtor corruptly at the expense of the trust. But they believed the objection to be dictated by malice in family matters, with which they desired to have no concern. What possible reason had the trustees to favour William? There were reasons why the trustees, in the interests of this trust, should lend to him. There was £4000 of trust money already in his hands. It would be disastrous to the trust to let him be put out of the shop where he had the means of making money, and let him be sold up. It was desirable to keep his credit and business up. It was said that the bias of the trustees had been indicated in their desire to sell to him for £19,000. But the true reading might be—let it be so assumed—that they believed that clauses of indemnity have no application. There is such a clause in this trust-deed, and also a power to lend on real and personal security. The trustees had in addition to the property the personal guarantee of a gentleman of the name of Walker, who was said to be the owner of mineral property of fabulous value. Under other circumstances the fact of collateral security being given would be an element of more or less importance. But it does not, in my judgment, alter the complexion of the present case. Because, in accepting Mr Millar's offer, the trustees were not, as I conceive, trying to get the best security for a sum to be invested, but were simply lending the trust money to accommodate Mr Millar, taking such security as he could offer.

"To test this, let me ask the question, why did not the trustees, or Mr Black on their behalf, say to Mr Millar,—'No, we will lend you the £17,000 on a first bond, and you may go into the market and raise the £12,000 on what you offer, as "unexceptionable security"?' The answer is, they knew that Mr Millar could not have got the £12,000 from any source but the trust, and they would not have lent him the money out of their individual funds on the security offered. . . ."

to be the true value. If it were, and William were willing to pay £25,000, it was desirable to facilitate a transaction by which the trust gained £6000. [LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—That is quite true, if you made sure that your price would be paid, but if the security you took for payment was bad your trust has no advantage.]

No. 8.

Nov. 2, 1886.
*Millar's Factor
 v. Millar's
 Trustees.*

As to the powers of the trustees.—The deed gave them the amplest powers. They were fettered only by their duties, not by any want of power. Personal security was always assumed to mean the security of a personal bond,¹ although it had only once been so decided.² The same understanding prevailed in England.³ The cases quoted on the other side were cases where truly there had been no investment at all, but an advance of money to a person against whom it was intended by the trust-deed to protect the beneficiary.

Argued for the pursuer;—The whole course of the trust management shewed that the trustees sided with William against the trust; they acted on his behalf and as his agents. The first indication of that was that they desired to sell to him for £19,000, when they knew that they could get £25,000, which they eventually did get, after having been forced by the younger children to raise their price. Then, according to Mr A. G. Millar's evidence, they refused to give any information as to this loan, and took no notice at all of his letter of remonstrance. [LORD YOUNG.—As regards what you say about the sale, the market was in an inflated condition. Now, were the trustees not entitled to give effect to an honest belief that it was in such a condition, and give the property to the son of their old friend at what they thought was its real value?] No. The duty of a trustee was to do the best for the trust; to make the most of it for the trust. Whatever trustees' powers might be in the way of selling by private bargain, or facilitating family arrangements, the interest of the trust must always be in their view, and when other beneficiaries were pressing them to realise to the best value all difficulty as to their proper course disappeared. There could be no question as to their duty. After receiving A. G. Millar's letter they made no effort to reduce the loan. William would at that date have been able to pay them, if not the whole, at least part. They must have known how bad William's personal security was. They knew that he bought the property for £25,000, and bonded it for £17,000 and then for £12,000. His father-in-law, Walker, the club draper, was said to be in good repute because he had a property where there might be shale to the value of £25,000. The security was such as no body of prudent trustees would look at for a moment, even if it were within their powers.

But it was not within their powers. The meaning of the clause in the deed was to give them power to invest on other than heritable security if a temporary occasion required it, or if they could get no other. They must always take the best security they could get, and here it was not said there was any scarcity of heritable security. Such an investment as this, if taken at all, should only have been taken at a higher rate of interest. Such an authority as this deed gave had been held not to protect an advance in the nature of an accommodation for family reasons,⁴ and trustees would not be protected in accommodating one who was "not a

¹ Seton v. Dawson, Dec. 18, 1841, 4 D. 310, Lord Moncreiff, at p. 328, 14 Scot. Jur. 115.

² Per Lord Fraser, Ordinary, in Lamb v. Cochran and Others, March 23, 1883, 20 S. L. R. 575.

³ Pickard v. Anderson, 1872, L. R., 13 Eq. 608.

⁴ Langston v. Olivant, April 21, 1807, G. Cooper's Reps., p. 33.

No. 8.

Nov. 2, 1886.
 Millar's Factor
 v. Millar's
 Trustees.

favourable but a favoured debtor."¹ There was some authority for maintaining that power to invest on personal security meant on the security of personal property.²

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—We have considered the question raised in this case very carefully, because it is one of great importance, not only to the law, but also to the parties concerned. The action has for its object to make certain family trustees responsible for a loan which is said to have been made on insufficient security to one member of the family. The Lord Ordinary has explained very fully the grounds on which he has come to the conclusion that they are responsible, and I find myself compelled, after having gone very carefully into the facts and circumstances of the case, to come to the same conclusion. My opinion is that these trustees lent the money in question "on unsubstantial and insufficient security, contrary to the law and practice of trust administration." The security was, in my opinion, not one on which the trustees were entitled, in a fair exercise of their powers of administration, to invest the trust-funds.

The history of the matter is short enough. The trustees held the estate belonging to the late John Millar, a merchant in Glasgow, who left a widow and children of two families. One of the children, William, was a son of the first marriage, who carried on a large drapery business in Glasgow, in which he had invested a large amount, and which was undoubtedly a very flourishing concern at the date of this transaction. William Millar himself was reputed to be worth £15,000, and the turn-over in his business was certainly very large. Part of the premises in which he carried on his business was held by him on lease from the trustees, and in 1874 the question arose whether that lease should be continued. The beneficiaries other than William opposed this, and pressed for a sale, on the ground that the property market in Glasgow was then in a highly favourable state for sellers. The trustees were averse to the sale, for William Millar had a large interest to prevent the premises going into other hands. They took the opinion of counsel, and were advised that they must sell, but they set about this sale, as I think, not very willingly. They had had a valuation of £19,000, and they subsequently got a valuation of £25,000. I myself should have thought that the latter was rather an exaggerated value, but a valuation to that amount was obtained.

The next step of the trustees was to enter into negotiations for a sale by private bargain. They had power to do so, and they were quite entitled to take into account that William Millar had a peculiar interest in the property. William offered £25,000, and that was accepted, after communication with the beneficiaries, who consented to William becoming the purchaser on the express condition that the price should be settled in the ensuing May.

Up to that time there was no ground for any adverse criticism of what the trustees did. But there was one condition they were bound to have in view. They were bound to be reasonably satisfied that William Millar was able to pay this price. Now, I fear that from the beginning it was plain that William was not able, in any solid or satisfactory sense, to pay it. William Millar, after his offer had been accepted, but before the disposition was executed, had set about obtaining a loan over the property he had thus purchased. He obtained from another source a loan of £17,000, and he then addressed a letter to the trustees, on 31st October 1874, in these terms:—"In reference to the recent purchase of property at 20 High Street from my late father's trustees for £25,000, I have arranged for a loan of £17,000; and as my father's trustees will have a good deal of money to lend, I beg leave to make application through you to them for the loan of £12,000 sterling, tendering to them the following unexceptionable heritable and personal security—all to be arranged at Martinmas term." Then follows a list of securities, all of which consist of properties already burdened to a considerable extent. There are also a life policy and a certain share of a sum of £10,000.

¹ Per Lord Mackenzie in Ross v. Allan's Trustees, Nov. 13, 1850, 13 D. 44, 23 Scot. Jur. 1.

² Cf. M'Laren on Wills and Succession, ii. 327.

No. 8.

Nov. 2, 1886.
*Millar's Factor
 v. Millar's
 Trustees.*

That appeal was made on 31st October, and on 2d November the trustees agreed to grant the loan. They did not communicate with the beneficiaries on this subject, although they had taken them along with them in the matter of the sale.

They took the loan then as proposed with the collateral personal security of a Mr Walker, who was in business in Glasgow. The investments have turned out, after a lapse of ten years, wholly insufficient. The question for our decision is, whether the trustees were entitled so to deal with the trust-property, and the price of it?

I am very clearly of opinion, with the Lord Ordinary, that there was no justification whatever for the trustees so dealing with the money of the trust. There was nothing to be gained by the trust-estate by taking these postponed securities and lending the money on them, and the personal security of two Glasgow traders. There was no difficulty in lending the money otherwise, and the only excuse for making this investment was that William Millar was unable otherwise to implement his purchase at the price of £25,000. I think then that no other conclusion was possible. If that transaction had been shewn to be necessary for the trust-estate, if the trustees had had to take second-class securities, because there were no others available, or if it had been shewn to be for the advantage of the trust-estate otherwise to make this investment, I should have been glad to have given effect to every possible presumption so as to free these gratuitous trustees. But I see no ground for either of these contentions, and indeed neither of them has been maintained.

I do not think it necessary to go further into the case, for the Lord Ordinary has clearly explained the grounds on which he has proceeded, and I agree with his Lordship. I think it was very unfortunate that the beneficiaries were kept in the dark as to what was going on between the acceptance of William's offer and this transaction. It is plain that when the beneficiaries came to know of it they were very indignant, and intimated a strong dissent. In these circumstances, I cannot avoid the conclusion at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived.

LORD YOUNG, LORD CRAIGHILL, and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

THE COURT delayed pronouncing an interlocutor to allow the parties to adjust the amount of the deductions which admittedly fell to be made from the sum decerned for by the Lord Ordinary.

DONALD MACKENZIE, W.S.—C. & A. S. DOUGLAS, W.S.—Agents.

No. 9.

THE ALLIANCE HERITABLE SECURITY COMPANY, LIMITED, AND JAMES POLLARD (Liquidator thereof), Petitioners.—Alison.

THE HERITABLE PROPERTY TRUST, LIMITED, Respondents.

Nov. 2, 1886.
Alliance Heritable Security Co. Limited.

Company—Winding-up—Application to Court—Where name of company struck off register by Registrar of Joint Stock Companies.

1ST DIVISION.
B.

ON 16th October 1886 the Alliance Heritable Security Company, Limited, a creditor of the Heritable Property Trust, Limited, presented a petition for the winding-up of the latter, stating that it had suspended business for more than a year, and that it was unable to pay its debts.

When the case was called on 2d November, counsel for the petitioners stated that, three days after the petition had been presented, the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies had struck "the Heritable Property Trust, Limited," off the register, and that notice of this had been published in the Gazette of 19th October; that (under sec. 7 of the Companies Act, 1880) the effect of this would be to dissolve the company as at that date, unless a winding-up order were granted on the present petition, which would draw back to 16th October. The company could not be restored to the register except on an application to the Court by the company or by one of its members. Sequestration being incompetent,¹ the petitioners, as creditors, had no remedy but a winding-up order.

THE COURT granted the petition, and appointed a liquidator.

T. F. WEIR, S.S.C., Agent.

No. 10. SOCIETY OF WRITERS TO HER MAJESTY'S SIGNET, Petitioners (Appellants).
—D.-F. Mackintosh—Murray.

Nov. 3, 1886.
Society of Writers to the Signet v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE, Respondents.—Lord-Adv. Macdonald
—Sol.-Gen. Robertson—A. J. Young.

Revenue—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885 (48 and 49 Vict. cap. 51), sec. 11—Duty leviable on property belonging to corporate bodies—Exemptions—Library belonging to law society.—The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885, imposed in respect of all real and personal property vested in any body corporate or unincorporate a duty at the rate of £5 per centum upon the annual value, income, or profits, after deducting therefrom "all necessary outgoings, including the receiver's remuneration, and costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred in the management of such property," but exempted from duty "property which, or the income or profits whereof, shall be legally appropriated and applied for any purpose connected with any religious persuasion, or for any charitable purpose, or for the promotion of education, literature, science, or the fine arts."

Held that a building belonging to and occupied as a library by the Society of Writers to the Signet did not fall within the exemption.

Held that the income of the Society of Writers to the Signet was exempt from duty to the extent of £105 per annum, appropriated by contract to the perpetual endowment of a chair of conveyancing in a university.

Held further, that the exemption under the same section of "property acquired by or with funds voluntarily contributed to any body, corporate or unincorporate, within a period of thirty years immediately preceding," was solely applicable to property acquired by funds gratuitously given, and did not cover property acquired by monies paid by those entering the Society as a necessary condition of their obtaining admission.

Held that deductions fell to be made from the annual value and income, before assessment, of (1) land-tax, and the owner's proportion of rates; (2) premium of insurance on the subjects assessed; (3) reasonable remuneration to the treasure for drawing the income belonging to the Society; (4) an allowance for No. 10. repairs.

¹ Standard, &c. Co. v. Dunblane, &c. Co., Dec. 12, 1884, 12 R. 328.

THE SOCIETY OF WRITERS TO HER MAJESTY'S SIGNET were assessed by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, under sec. 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885 (48 and 49 Vict. c. 51),* for the year ending 5th April 1886 for the sum of £55, 4s. 6d., being 5 per cent upon the sum of £1104, 8s. 10d. The Commissioners stated that this sum had been arrived at in the following manner:—

Nov. 8, 1886.
Society of Writers to the Signet v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue.
Exchequer
Cause.
1st Division.
B.

"Gross annual value of real estate,	.	.	.	£250	0	0
Dividends,	.	.	.	909	19	10
						<hr/>
						£1159 19 10
Less—
Insurance on building,	.	.	.	£9	11	0
Repairs—10 per cent,	.	.	.	25	0	0
One-fifth treasurer's salary,	.	.	.	21	0	0
				<hr/>
				55 11 0
				<hr/>
Amount assessable,	.	.	.	£1104	8	10"
						<hr/>

The Society presented a petition and appeal against this assessment upon the grounds

1. That the heritable property, which consisted of the buildings occupied as the Society's library, fell within the exemption in subsec. 3 of section 11.

2. That the funds of the Society had entirely accrued within the last thirty years by voluntary payments of entry-money by new members, and fell within the exemption in subsec. 6.

3. That the income of the Society to the extent of £105 paid under contract with the Town-council of Edinburgh as an endowment to the Professor of Conveyancing fell within the exemption in subsec. 3.

4. That the Society were entitled to deduction from the annual value of the whole insurance paid by them on books as well as buildings; and

5. Also to deduction of land-tax, poor and school rates, burgh rates, water rates, property-tax on annual value of buildings.

6. That deduction should also be allowed for the salary of the treasurer

* 48 and 49 Vict. c. 51, sec. 11.—"Whereas certain property, by reason of the same belonging to or being vested in bodies corporate or unincorporate, escapes liability to probate, legacy, or succession-duties, and it is expedient to impose a duty thereon by way of compensation to the revenue: Be it therefore enacted that there shall be levied and paid to Her Majesty in respect of all real and personal property which shall have belonged to or been vested in any body corporate or unincorporate, during the yearly period ending on the 5th day of April 1885, or during any subsequent yearly period ending on the same day in any year, a duty at the rate of £5 per centum upon the annual value, income, or profits of such property accrued to such body corporate or unincorporate, in the same yearly period, after deducting therefrom all necessary outgoings, including the receiver's remuneration, and costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred in the management of such property."

Subject to exemption from such duty in favour of property of the descriptions following (that is to say) . . . (3) "Property which, or the income or profits whereof, shall be legally appropriated and applied for any purpose connected with any religious persuasion, or for any charitable purpose, or for the promotion of education, literature, science, or the fine arts."

(6) "Property acquired by or with funds voluntarily contributed to any body, corporate or unincorporate, within a period of thirty years immediately preceding."

No. 10. of the Society £105, and of the salaries of librarians and servants in the library.

Nov. 3, 1886.

Society of Writers to the Signet v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

7. Deduction was also claimed for £117 as the cost of repairs.

The Commissioners, in their answers, stated:—"Of the deductions claimed to be made from the annual value of the real property, the Commissioners allowed £9, 11s., the actual amount of the premium paid on the buildings assessed, and £25, or ten per cent, as a reasonable allowance in name of structural repairs, the sum claimed by the petitioners under this head (£117, 19s. 1d.) admittedly including furnishings and other particulars not connected with the maintenance of the structure. Rates and taxes were disallowed. They are not necessary outgoings. The other items claimed, but not allowed, were not considered to be expenses connected with the management of the structure. As regards deductions claimed in respect of the income derived from invested funds, the treasurer's salary was restricted to one-fifth of the total amount, in view of the limited services required in the management of the structure and in the collection of the dividends. The remaining salaries and wages were wholly disallowed. They are not costs and charges relating to the management of the structure, or payment for which there has been any legal appropriation."

Argued for the petitioners;—The property which was the subject of the assessment clearly fell within the exception of the 3d subsection. It existed for the promotion of education, and for that purpose only, and had been "legally appropriated" thereto. "Legally" simply meant "lawfully." A library was always an instrument tending to the advancement of literature and science. This exemption covered the building and all the deductions which were claimed. The personal property fell under the same rule, because the librarian and other servants were paid out of it. If the Society had possessed a charter there could be little doubt that their whole income would have been exempt from this taxation. The Society was what was known as a customary corporation,¹—it had existed for a very long time, and it was clear that the surviving members would not be entitled to divide the funds.²

Assuming that the above contention was wrong, the personal property fell under the exemption of the 6th subsection. It had been "voluntarily contributed" within the previous thirty years from the fees paid by the entrants or apprentices to the Society, and the Society was bound to its entrants to devote the funds provided by them to the purposes of a library. The word "voluntarily" in this connection implied nothing more than that each contributor was free from any obligation in making his contribution. It did not necessarily mean "gratuitously."

In any case the sum paid to the Professor of Conveyancing fell under this rule. The Society were bound by contract with the town-council to pay the sum in question, not only to the present holder of the chair, but to his successors.

The 11th section provided that "necessary outgoings" were to be deducted in making the assessment. That phrase was borrowed from the Succession-Duty Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. cap. 51), sec. 22. It had been construed in two English cases,³ and in the present instance it covered the whole salaries of the officials connected with the library. These were costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred in the management of the property. At least, the appellants were entitled to a deduction of their whole rates and taxes, and not of landlord's taxes only, which were all that it was now proposed to allow, and to a larger deduction in the matter of the treasurer's salary than had been allowed. The "receiver's remuneration" was specially excepted under the Act.

¹ Solicitors v. Writers to the Signet, Feb. 25, 1800, M. College of Justice, Append. I., No. I., affd. 4 Pat. Apps. 326.

² Muir v. Rodger, &c., Nov. 18, 1881, 9 R. 149; Mitchell v. Burness, June 19, 1878, 5 R. 954; Incorporation of Wrights, &c. of Leith, June 4, 1856, 18 D. 981, 28 Scot. Jur. 417.

³ In re Elwes, Nov. 25, 1858, 3 H. and N. 719; In re Earl Cowley, May 25, 1866, L. R., 1 Exch. 288.

No. 10.
—
Nov. 3, 1886.
Society of
Writers to the Signet v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

The respondents argued;—The property in question here was primarily for the benefit of the Society, consisting in a large measure of law books connected with the practice of the legal profession. It was not "legally appropriated" for the promotion of education, &c., in terms of the 3d subsection. The term "legally appropriated" implied that the appropriation must be binding, and could not be taken away, and that the property must be mainly, if not exclusively, devoted to the promotion of education, &c.¹ That was not the case here, and the assessment complained of was right.

It might be that the payment of 100 guineas to the Professor of Conveyancing fell to be exempted. It was in a different situation from the other payments.

Looking to the 6th subsection, the term "voluntarily contributed" implied a gratuitous gift, which the payments made by entrants to the Society were not. They were the price of admission to the Society.

"Necessary outgoings" under the leading enactment included nothing beyond the land-tax, the insurance on the buildings, landlord's rates, necessary repairs, and a commission to the treasurer for managing the funds of the Society.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question raised by this petition and appeal involves the construction of the 11th section of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act of 1885. The leading object of that section is to levy a duty upon property held by collective bodies, whether corporate or unincorporate, which escapes altogether from the succession-duties under the previous Acts. In the case of these bodies succession does not occur, and therefore the opportunity does not arise for the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to charge any duty of the nature of succession-duty against them. It was to remedy that evil, and to prevent these bodies escaping altogether from contributing their proper share, as we may call it, of those duties leviable under the Succession-Duties Acts, that this section was enacted; and the way in which the Legislature directs that these bodies shall be subjected to a duty which shall correspond in a fair and equitable view to what individuals are subjected to under the Succession-Duties Acts is this,—that they shall pay an annual duty at the rate of 5 per cent upon the annual value, income, or profits of their property, accrued to such body in the same yearly period. Whether that is a fair and equivalent duty, as compared with the liability under the Succession-Duty Act, of course we have no reason to inquire, but that is what is substituted for the succession-duty in the case of bodies of this description.

But there are certain exemptions appended to this clause, and the first question for consideration is whether the Society of Writers to the Signet can take the benefit of any of these exemptions. They claim exemption under the third head, which is an exemption of "property which, or the income or profits

¹ The Governors of the Russell Institution v. The Vestrymen of St Giles-in-the-Fields and St George, Bloomsbury, 1853, 18 Eng. Jur. 597.

No. 10.

Nov. 3, 1886.
Society of
Writers to the Signet v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

whereof, shall be legally appropriated and applied for any purpose connected with any religious persuasion, or for any charitable purpose, or for the promotion of education, literature, science, or the fine arts." Of course, it is under the third and last branch of that clause that the exemption is claimed. It is said that the property which is here sought to be subjected to duty has been legally appropriated and applied for the promotion of education, literature, or science. Leaving out of view in the meantime the meaning of the words "legally appropriated," the question arises whether the property or the income of the property with which we are dealing is applied for the promotion "of education, literature, science, or the fine arts." There may be cases in which property, or the income of property, may conduce indirectly to the promotion of education, literature, science, or the fine arts, and yet which will certainly not fall within this exempting clause. Almost every institution which is created for the purpose of benefiting its members by the creation of a library would in this view fall under that clause of exemption. It would be enough to shew that indirectly the property does promote—does go to the promotion to a certain extent, or in a certain way, of education, literature, or science. But I apprehend that the meaning of this clause of exemption is that the property or income shall be, if not exclusively, yet certainly in the main, and as its chief object, devoted to the promotion of education, literature, science, or the fine arts.

Can that be said to be the case in regard to the Society of Writers to the Signet and their library? People become members of the Society of Writers to the Signet, not for the purpose of studying literature, or the fine arts, or science, nor yet for the purpose of being educated. They become Writers to the Signet for the purpose of making pecuniary gain by a profession, and that is the object of every member of this Society; and everything that the Society has done in its collective capacity in the way of creating a library and other things of that kind is incidental and accessory to that one great object of making professional gain. These institutions, the library, and all the other institutions connected with this Society, are brought into existence because they will help, one way or another, to the attainment of the end for which every member enters that Society, viz., by the exercise of his profession to make pecuniary gain. In these circumstances it appears to me quite impossible to say, that in any substantial sense this money is applied for the purpose of promoting either education, literature, science, or the fine arts. It is applied for the purpose of giving facilities to the members of the Society to exercise their profession, which seems to me to be a totally different object.

But still further it may be questioned on very sound grounds, whether, even if the money was so applied, it is legally appropriated to that purpose—that is to say, whether it is appropriated in such a way as to be legally binding upon the parties so appropriating it, for that is undoubtedly the meaning of the words "legally appropriated" here. I do not question that the Writers to the Signet may be a customary corporation. I think it is pretty well established that they are so, but I do not think that makes much difference in the matter, because if it should be in the interests of the profession, apart altogether from any other consideration, that this money should be applied to a different purpose from the maintenance of the library, either in whole or in part, I doubt very much whether this corporation would be disabled from so applying it, and therefore diverting it from that purpose to which it is alleged to be, within the meaning of the statute, legally appropriated. For these two reasons, therefore, I am of opinion that this exemption cannot be claimed—first, because the money is not applied for the purposes alleged; and secondly, because it is not legally appropriated to such purposes within the true meaning of the statute. No. 10.

Nov. 3, 1886.
Society of
Writers to the Signet v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

Another exemption is claimed under the sixth head of exemptions as for "property acquired by or with funds voluntarily contributed to any body, corporate or unincorporate, within a period of thirty years immediately preceding." Now, the money which is said to be voluntarily contributed under this clause of exemption is the money paid by gentlemen entering the Society of Writers to the Signet, as a necessary condition of their obtaining admission. A considerable part of that money is paid, as we know, by apprentices upon signing their indentures, and the rest of it is paid upon their admission as full members of the Society qualified to exercise their profession. Now, can these be said to be funds voluntarily contributed? In one sense, all money paid willingly, without compulsion, is voluntarily contributed; but that certainly cannot be the meaning of this section. When a man pays his debts, if he is an honourable man, he pays them quite willingly, and not as matter of obligation only, but as matter of honour. At all events, he does so quite voluntarily; and everything that is paid under a contract is paid voluntarily, unless some dispute arises about the meaning or effect of the contract. But surely that is not the meaning of the word "voluntarily" in this clause of exemption. There is another meaning of the word which seems much more appropriate, and that is, money gifted—voluntarily contributed—in the sense of being gratuitously given. Which, then, of these meanings are we to take in the present case? I think the meaning of the statute undoubtedly is that, if money be given, presented to the Society in any form—without consideration—by anybody, any property purchased with that money, if it be given within a certain period, shall be exempt from liability. But the monies which are here paid by apprentices and entrants to the Society of Writers to the Signet are not given in that sense. They are given as the price of admission to the privileges of the Society. They are given therefore under a contract, and nothing else. When an apprentice pays his fees upon signing his indenture, he enters into a contract not merely with his master in the indenture, but with the Society. The Society thereby undertakes, upon receipt of that money, to allow him to go on to serve his apprenticeship, and thereafter to be taken upon trials, and admitted as a member of the Society if found duly qualified. That is a contract with the Society; and the obligation of the contract on the one hand is to pay money, and on the other hand to receive, and to admit. In these circumstances, I cannot hold that there is anything voluntary in the case. It is just as involuntary in one sense of the word, as the payment of any money which one is obliged to pay. What would be said with respect to the last sum contributed, the sum paid for full admission into the privileges of this Society? The entrant cannot be admitted without paying that money; but he has got a vested interest in the Society already, by what he has paid when he signed his indenture, and if he does not choose to go on to pay the rest of it, he forfeits that which he has already paid. Is there anything voluntary in the act of the second payment? It seems to me to be about as compulsory as it very well can be, because it is made compulsory upon him either to pay that additional sum or to forfeit what he has already paid. Therefore it appears to me that neither of these classes of exemption applies to the property belonging to this Society in general.

But there is one part of the property appropriated, and legally appropriated,

No. 10.

Nov. 3, 1886.
Society of
Writers to the Signet v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

to a particular purpose, which I think stands in a different position, and that is the endowment of the chair of conveyancing. I think enough evidence has been given to satisfy the Court, and to satisfy those who represent the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, that this chair is endowed by the Society of Writers to the Signet in such a way that they are bound to keep it up by the agreement with the town-council as then representing the University; for the institution of the chair, as I understand, goes back as far as 1820, or between 1820 and 1830, while the town-council were administrators of University affairs. That seems to me to fall very clearly within the third clause of exemption, as being money legally appropriated and applied for the purpose of education, and therefore I am of opinion that the exemption does apply so far as regards the 100 guineas a-year that is paid as the salary of the Professor of Conveyancing.

With regard to the question of outgoings, I do not think any serious difficulty remains after the discussion we have heard. It is plain enough that the account given in by the petitioners must be very largely modified. They claim in the first place the land-tax, and that is admitted. But they further claim a sum of £36, 5s. 1d. of insurance, and it turns out that the greater part of that consists of insurance of the books and fittings contained in the library, and not of the buildings proper, and I think the result of the argument comes to this, that insurance is to be allowed to the amount of £9, 11s., being that portion of the policies of insurance which is applicable to the buildings.

As regards the salary of the treasurer, which the Society propose to deduct entirely as one of the outgoings, I agree with the argument of the Lord Advocate that that is to be considered merely in the nature of the receiver's remuneration, as it is called in the statute, for the words are "deducting therefrom all necessary outgoings, including the receiver's remuneration." Now, all that the treasurer of this Society has to do as a receiver is to draw the rents, if any, of the heritable property,—of which, I suppose, there are none,—and to receive payment of interests and dividends on the investments of personal estate; and certainly I should say that the allowance proposed for that purpose, somewhere about twenty guineas, as fixed by the Commissioners, is a very fair proportion of the treasurer's salary to be deducted upon that ground. With regard to the rates, all I think it necessary to say is, that they must be landlord's rates which are deducted, and with that direction I suppose the parties can have no difficulty at all in settling what the amount of these should be. The only other question is as to the amount to be deducted for repairs; and there, again, the parties can come pretty much to one, and I think that £25 is a fair amount to be deducted on that head.

These seem to me to be all the points that are raised by this appeal, at least so far as they are now in dispute.

LORD MURE.—I am entirely of the same opinion as that expressed by your Lordship, and I have little to add to what your Lordship has stated.

The question is, what assessment is to be levied from corporations or from "bodies unincorporate" of this description, under the provisions of the statute which subjects them to certain assessments in lieu of succession-duty, from which, up to the date of that statute, they had been exempted. And the first point to be considered is, what are the necessary outgoings of which the statute authorises deduction to be made from the property on which the 5 per cent is appointed to be levied in lieu of the succession-duty assessment. Now, the sums here claimed as necessary outgoings are very large, but I am of opinion that the items your Lordship has mentioned are all that the petitioners can claim as necessary—viz., insurance on the buildings, landlord's rates, 10 per cent for repairs, and one-fifth of the sum which is stated in the appendix as the treasurer's salary. For the treasurer may fairly, I think, be held to come under the word "receiver" in that part of the statute which describes the receiver's remuneration as a necessary outgoing.

No. 10.

Nov. 8, 1886.
Society of
Writers to the Signet v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

Upon the larger and more difficult question of legal appropriation, I am very clearly of opinion that the salary of the Professor of Conveyancing falls within the words "legally appropriated and applied for the promotion of education." But I agree with your Lordship as regards those other items of considerable amount which are entered in the list—viz., librarian's salary, hall-keeper, book-carriers, &c.—that these do not come within the exemption of being legally appropriated for purposes of education, literature, or anything of that kind. I think the words "legally appropriated" should be construed as meaning "mainly," if not "exclusively," appropriated in dealing with the question whether the purposes to which the money is said to be applied are such as come within the exemption of the statute.

On the question of voluntary contribution, I cannot see how it can be predicated of contributions made by entrants or apprentices, which they are obliged to pay as a condition of their admission to the Society, that they are voluntary contributions in the sense of the words of the statute. As your Lordship has explained, there are certain contract obligations entered into between the entrants and the Society, but nothing in the sense of voluntary contributions which the entrants may or may not make upon their admission.

LORD SHAND.—There can be no doubt that the Society of Writers to the Signet is one of those bodies which have been made liable to assessment for duty under this statute. It appears to me, from what has fallen in the course of the arguments and what we know of the Society, that there is little doubt it is a corporation by custom although not by charter. But whether incorporate or unincorporate, it is, within the language of the statute, "a body corporate or unincorporate," having property which is subject to assessment, and the first question which is raised and has to be decided is, as your Lordship has pointed out, the question whether the property of the Society, of considerable amount and value, is exempted from duty under either of the two branches of the exempting clause which have been quoted in the case. The first of these is to the effect that property or income of property legally appropriated and applied for any purpose connected with the promotion of education, literature, science, or the fine arts, shall be exempt. I entirely agree with your Lordship that in this case that exemption cannot take effect. The Society is possessed of property, and is annually receiving income from that property, as well as from entrants and persons about to become Writers to the Signet, but the purpose for which that property is held is, I think, a purely professional one. The object of this Society is the maintenance of a permanent body of professional men, with recognised privileges,—privileges which are of importance, and which were perhaps some years ago more extensive than they are now,—and the object which any one joining the Society has in view is not education, or the promotion of education, literature, or science, but that he shall become a member of the Society, in order to the practice of his profession as a Writer to the Signet. That being

No. 10.

Nov. 3, 1886.
Society of
Writers to the Signet v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

so, I agree with your Lordship in thinking that the possession and use of the library, of which so much has been said, is merely an accessory or means of promoting the main object, and is not the main object for which this body exists; and therefore I think this clause of exemption will not apply. The Lord Advocate quoted a case¹ in which the words of the statute were not, as we have here, "legally appropriated and applied" for any purpose, but "instituted exclusively" for any purpose. The absence of the word "exclusively" might very properly and reasonably justify the argument, that if it could be shewn that substantially the purpose for which this Society existed and held its property and effects was for the promotion of education, literature, or science, then it should have the benefit of the exemption. But I do not think that even substantially that is the purpose for which the Society exists, and therefore I am of opinion that under that clause the petitioners can take no benefit.

I agree with your Lordship also in the opinion you have expressed as to the meaning of the words "voluntarily contributed." In the one sense of the word "voluntarily," of course anyone who enters into a fresh contract of his free will is voluntarily undertaking something to which he was not bound previously. That perhaps will not apply strictly to the case of a man paying a debt, for if he does not pay that voluntarily he may be made to pay it, but certainly in the case of anyone entering into a new contract it may in one sense be said that it is a voluntary act on his part; but if the argument which has been maintained here were to take effect it would apply to every sum which the Society during the last thirty years has received under a contract voluntarily entered into by someone else. Apprentices voluntarily agree to pay so much money, but in return for certain advantages. If the Society had a hall to let, and someone voluntarily agrees to give them a rent for that hall, the return there given is a return for value received. The Society has money to invest. Another party voluntarily agrees to give so much money in return for the use of that capital. In each of these cases you simply have a fresh contract,—voluntarily entered into, no doubt,—but in each of these cases you have a return given for advantages which the Society on the other hand confers. I am very clearly of opinion that the words "voluntarily contributed" here cannot cover cases of that kind, but are intended to cover and will cover only proper donation, and seeing there is nothing of donation in the payment of money by the Society's apprentices, I am clearly of opinion that the exemption will not apply.

In reference to the payment to the Professor of Conveyancing, I think there can be no doubt. It is not necessary in this case to define, and I refrain from defining, what I should say is necessarily implied in the words "legally appropriated." It is enough in this case that as regards the incumbent of the chair of conveyancing the Society has appointed a sum of 100 guineas per annum for the maintenance of that chair, and is paying that year after year; and that being so, that sum was certainly legally appropriated and applied for the promotion of education.

As to the deductions under the head of outgoings and the like, I have nothing to add to what your Lordship has said.

LORD ADAM.—I concur.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that the real and personal property of the petitioners mentioned in the appeal, the gross annual value of which amounts to £1159, 19s. 10d. No. 10.

¹ Governors of Russell Institution, 18 Eng. Jur. 597.

sterling, is liable to the duty on property of bodies corporate and unincorporate under the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, Nov. 3, 1886.
1885: Find that the annual value of the real property for the Society of year ending 5th April 1885 is £250, and that the income or Writers to the profits of the personal property for the same year is £909, 19s. Signet v. Commissioners of 10d.: Find that the annual payment of £105 granted by the peti- Inland Retioners under contract for the perpetual endowment of the Chair venue.
of Conveyancing in the University of Edinburgh is to be allowed as legally appropriated and applied for the promotion of education:
Find that there should be included in the necessary outgoings to be deducted, in reference to the annual value of the real property, the sum of £13, 18s. 7d., being the land-tax and the owner's proportion of the rates chargeable in respect of such real property:
Find that the sum of £21 proposed by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to be deducted as receiver's remuneration is reasonable: Find that the deduction for insurance and repairs is to be limited to such part of the sums claimed as is applicable to the real property, and accordingly that the sum to be deducted for insurance is £9, 11s., and that the sum of £25, being ten per cent on the annual value of the real property, is a reasonable allowance for repairs: Find in accordance with the foregoing findings,"
&c.

MACKENZIE, INNER, & LOGAN, W.S.—SOLICITOR OF INLAND REVENUE—Agents.

GEORGE F. G. FENTON LIVINGSTONE, Petitioner.—Mackay—H. Johnston. No. 11.
JOHN N. E. FENTON LIVINGSTONE, Respondent.—D.-F. Mackintosh—Low.

Nov. 5, 1886.
Livingstone v.
Livingstone.

Alimentary provision—Diligence—Excess over suitable aliment.—A testator directed his trustees to pay certain proportions of the residue of his estate to his grandchildren on their attaining twenty-five years of age, but, in the event of any beneficiary so conducting himself as not to merit the approbation of the trustees, they were empowered to restrict the provision in his favour to a liferent alienary, and it was provided "that it shall not be in the power of the party or parties whose shares have been so restricted to a liferent to sell, assign, dispone, or convey away his or their said liferent, but the same shall be applied for his or their alimentary use alienary, nor shall it be in the power of his or their creditors to attach the said liferent by arrestment, poinding, or other legal diligence, all of which are hereby excluded." Held that the alimentary provision was only protected from the diligence of creditors to the extent of a reasonable provision, regard being had to the station and circumstances of the beneficiary, and that quoad excessum it was open to diligence.

Aliment—Amount—Reasonable provision.—The beneficiary under a testamentary trust enjoyed the income of £26,000, which amounted to about £875 per annum, as an alimentary provision from which the diligence of creditors was excluded. He was twenty-six years of age, unmarried, and was subject to no incapacity, mental or physical. He was the second son of a landed proprietor, and, in the event of his surviving his mother, would succeed to an estate. He had no other source of income than the alimentary provision above mentioned. Held that, in the circumstances, £500 per annum would be a suitable provision for the beneficiary, and that the balance of the income was open to the diligence of his creditors.

By the fifth purpose of his trust-disposition and settlement, dated 13th January 1868, the late William Waddell, of Easter Moffat, W.S., directed his trustees to convert the residue of his estate into money, and to invest the same in their names as trustees, and to hold the same for behoof of 1ST DIVISION.

B.

No. 11. his three younger grandchildren, viz., John, George, and Charles Fenton Livingstone (the last of whom died in minority without issue), or the survivor or survivors of them, equally, share and share alike, payable upon their respectively attaining twenty-five years of age.

Nov. 5, 1886.
Livingstone v.
Livingstone.

This bequest was subject to the following declaration:—"And I do hereby declare that in case any of my said three grandsons shall marry or otherwise conduct themselves so as not to merit the approbation of my said trustees, or a majority of them accepting and surviving at the time, the provisions hereby made in favour of my said grandchildren so marrying or acting shall only belong to them in liferent for their liferent use allenarly, and to their issue or heirs in fee; but it is hereby declared that a regular minute must be entered in the sederunt-book of the trustees, expressing their disapprobation of the conduct of any of my said grandchildren, to restrict them to a liferent as aforesaid, and the capital or fee of the provision or share of such of my said grandsons as shall be so restricted to a liferent shall continue to be held by my said trustees during the lifetime of the party so restricted to a liferent, the interest or annual proceeds (less the expense of management) being only payable to the party or parties so restricted to a liferent; and it shall not be in the power of the party or parties whose shares have been so restricted to a liferent to sell, assign, dispone, or convey away his or their said liferent, but the same shall be applied for his or their alimentary use allenarly, nor shall it be in the power of his or their creditors to attach the said liferent by arrestment, poinding, or other legal diligence, all of which are hereby excluded; and I declare that until the provisions herein contained in favour of my said three grandsons are paid and made over to them they shall not acquire any vested interest therein."

On 21st September 1885 Mr Waddell's trustees, at a meeting specially convened, on the narrative of the above power, resolved to record their disapprobation of George Fenton Livingstone's conduct, and to restrict the provisions in his favour under the trust-disposition and settlement to a liferent. This they accordingly did by a minute then executed, under which it was declared that the said provisions should only belong to George in liferent for his liferent use allenarly, and to his issue in fee.

George attained the age of twenty-five years on 1st October 1885.

His share of his grandfather's estate amounted to about £26,000, the income of which, after deduction of expenses, &c., was on an average £875. He had no other means of subsistence than the income of this fund, and belonged to no profession.

On 7th January 1886 John F. Livingstone raised an action against his brother George for payment to him of two sums of £500 and £5000 respectively, alleged to have been advanced by the pursuer to his brother, but not for alimentary purposes.

Arrestments on the dependence of this action were laid on on 7th January 1886 in the hands of the trustees, whereby it was sought to attach the income payable to George by the trustees.

On 30th June 1886 George presented a petition to the Court for recall of these arrestments. The facts stated above were not in dispute.

The petitioner stated "that the said arrestments are inept to attach the income of funds held in trust, and declared by the truster to be an alimentary provision for the liferenter, and not attachable by his creditors by arrestment, poinding, or other legal diligence."

The respondent stated;—"The petitioner attained the age of twenty-five on 1st October 1885; he is unmarried, and is subject to no incapacity, physical or mental. In these circumstances, the respondent submits that the said alimentary liferent (the interest of £26,000) is exorbitant and excessive, and that the arrestments should not be recalled, in so far as the said liferent exceeds a reasonable aliment." No. 11.

It was further stated that in the event of the petitioner surviving his mother he would succeed to the landed estate of Easter Moffat. Nov. 5, 1886. Livingstone v. Livingstone.

Argued for the petitioner;—(1) The clause under which this annuity was declared to be strictly alimentary was very stringent, and if it were possible to do so at all, there was no doubt that here the testator had set apart this estate from the diligence of the petitioner's creditors. It was doubtless laid down by Bell in his Commentaries¹ that an alimentary provision could only be protected "so far as it exceeds not a moderate aliment," but there was no authority for that dictum. The point had never been expressly decided, and there was no principle on which a granter's power of dealing with his own property could be so limited.² No doubt the interposition of trustees or of some third party to hold the fund was necessary, but, if that were supplied, the testator's intention ought to rule. There was a distinction between a fund declared to be merely alimentary, and one which was protected by a declaration that it should not be assignable, arrestable, &c., as here. An alimentary fund might be arrestable at the instance of an alimentary creditor, but the debts here were not of that class. The only case in which an alimentary fund had been restricted in the way here suggested was Blackwood v. Boyd,³ but there the testator had tried to exclude the universitas of his estate from diligence, which went much further than the present case; and further, there was no trust interposed there. In bankruptcy alimentary provisions were not attached.⁴ Again, this debt was incurred at a date prior to the time at which the petitioner had right to the annuity, and in such a case it had been decided that creditors could not touch it.⁵ (2) If it was open to the Court to consider the question of amount, there was no ground for saying that the amount was exorbitant.⁶

Argued for the respondent;—It was laid down by all the institutional writers that an alimentary provision was only protected to the extent of a suitable maintenance, taking the station and circumstances of the annuitant into consideration.⁷ The principle on which the rule rested was that where the purpose of the testator was purely to aliment that purpose was fulfilled by giving the annuitant a sum suitable to his condition in life. The rule had been recognised in a long course of decisions, in all of which the Court ordered inquiry into the circumstances of the annuitant,⁸ and though there was only one case in which the aliment was restricted (Blackwood v. Boyd), the fact of inquiry being instituted proved ¹ Bell's Com., 5th edit. i. 128, 7th edit. i. 124; cf. also Ersk. iii. 6, 7.

² Hunter v. Hunter's Trustees, March 10, 1848, 10 D. 922, 20 Scot. Jur. 326.

³ Blackwood v. Boyd, 1677, M. 10,390.

⁴ Goudy on Bankruptcy, 319; Bankruptcy Act, 1856, sec. 102, 176.

⁵ Monypenny v. Earl of Buchan, July 11, 1835, 13 S. 1112, 7 Scot. Jur. 505; Harvey v. Calder, June 13, 1840, 2 D. 1095, 12 Scot. Jur. 520.

⁶ Lewis v. Anstruther, June 11, 1852, 14 D. 857, 24 Scot. Jur. 514, and Dec. 17, 1852, 15 D. 260, 25 Scot. Jur. 172.

⁷ Stair, iii. 1, 37; Erskine and Bell, ut supra.

⁸ Adamson v. Kirkcaldy, 1622, M. 10,365; West Nisbet v. Morrison, M. 10,368; Monypenny v. Earl of Buchan (see Lord Corehouse's interlocutor, p. 1113); Harvey v. Calder, see note 5; Lewis v. Anstruther, see note 6; Bell v. Innes, May 26, 1855, 17 D. 778, 27 Scot. Jur. 403; Drew v. Drew, Nov. 17, 1870, 9 Macph. 163 (Lord Justice-Clerk's opinion, p. 166), 43 Scot. Jur. 62.

No. 11. that the Court recognised their power of restriction if they deemed it advisable. (2) To a person in the position of the petitioner an income of £875 was excessive. £500 a-year would be ample aliment for a bachelor.

Nov. 5, 1886.
Livingstone v.
Livingstone.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a petition for recall of arrestments on the ground that the fund which has been arrested is alimentary, and is not subject to the diligence of creditors.

The petitioner had an interest under the will of his maternal grandfather, Mr Waddell, which amounted to a capital sum of about £26,000. Under that will, however, the trustees had power given to them, if any of the beneficiaries should so conduct themselves as not to satisfy the trustees, to express and record their disapprobation in a minute, and to restrict the right of the beneficiary to a liferent alienably, and thereafter it was not to be in the power of the liferenter “to sell, assign, dispone, or convey away his or their said liferent, but the same shall be applied for his or their alimentary use alienably, nor shall it be in the power of his or their creditors to attach the said liferent by arrestment, poinding, or other legal diligence, all of which are hereby excluded.”

Now, no doubt this clause is a very sufficient protection, in the ordinary way, of a liferent—it makes the fund strictly alimentary; but the respondent, the arresting creditor, says that the amount of the liferent “is exorbitant and excessive, and that the arrestments should not be recalled in so far as the said liferent exceeds a reasonable aliment.” To this the petitioner replies that there is no law for restricting a liferent of this kind, and that it cannot be reduced so as to let in the diligence of creditors to a certain extent; and further, that in any event the liferent here is not in excess of a reasonable sum, considering the petitioner's station in life.

Now, this raises a very general question, and if we could deal with it as an open question in the law of Scotland, it would require very careful attention. But it seems to me established that a liferent alimentary may be restricted so as to leave the liferenter an adequate amount, and allow the rest to be attached, notwithstanding any declaration in the deed by which it is conferred.

This doctrine is laid down by Lord Stair in very distinct terms in treating of arrestments, where he says (iii. 1, 37),—“It is also a competent exception that the thing arrested is a proper aliment, expressly constituted, and not exceeding the measure of aliment.” It is thus made very distinct that according to the view of that eminent institutional writer it is a good answer to the plea that diligence is excluded from an alimentary fund, that the measure of aliment is in excess of what is necessary for the station of life in which the liferenter is placed. Two old cases are alluded to by Lord Stair in this passage. The first is the case of Adamson v. Kirkcaldy (M. 10,365). In that case a multiple poinding was raised for the purpose of determining a competition arising on arrestments, a creditor having arrested an alimentary liferent of a bond for £400 for a debt due by the husband of the person enjoying the alimentary liferent. The wife alleged that she should be preferred on the ground that the bond was given for the aliment of her and her bairns, and the Lords, “considering the meanness of the sum, the quality of the woman, and the number of her seven bairns, found the sum mean enough for their aliment, and that no part of it could be subject to her husband's debt.” There we have an adjudication so old as 1622 on the question whether the amount secured to the liferenter was or was not more than enough for the aliment of the woman and her children. No doubt the Court held that it was not more than enough, but they could just as well have decided that it was more than enough. In short, they adjudged on the very question which we now have before us.

No. 11.

Nov. 5, 1886.
Livingstone v.
Livingstone.

The other case mentioned by Lord Stair in his reports is Blackwood v. Boyd (1677, M. 10,390). There the Court decided the other way, and let in diligence to a certain extent, and restricted the amount of the aliment. The arrester there answered,—“That albeit aliments so expressly constituted by persons who are noways obliged, when only sufficient for entertainment of the party according to their quality, have been sustained against that party's other debts, but for aliment; yet here the liferent reserved is in favour of the disponent's apparent heir, and of his whole estate, which were of dangerous consequence to allow, especially seeing the estate doth far exceed a sober aliment in three or four thousand merks yearly; and if in anything it was restricted, the pursuer's debt being very small, it would have effect. The Lords repelled the defence in respect of the reply.” The result was thus, that the apparent heir, who had an alimentary provision of a considerable amount, was found to be open to diligence in so far as the aliment was in excess of a reasonable sum. That case is directly in point, and it is assumed in subsequent decisions that if an alimentary income exceeds a reasonable provision, considering the recipient's station in life, it can be restricted by the Court.

Though in recent times cases do not seem to have occurred in which the Court has restricted an alimentary fund in this way, yet it seems always to have been taken into account whether the amount was excessive or not. One very remarkable case was before the Court which affected the amount of aliment to be allowed to Lord Buchan, viz, the case of Harvey v. Calder, 2 D. 1095. There one question was whether £1800 a-year was more than sufficient aliment for a peer, and it was held that it was not, but if the Court had been of a different opinion they would undoubtedly have restricted the sum.

In that state of the law the question comes to be, whether the amount of the income here is more than sufficient for the aliment of a person in the station and circumstances of the petitioner. I understand that all your Lordships are of opinion that it is excessive, and therefore that while the petitioner is entitled to protection to the extent of £500 a-year the rest of the fund is open to diligence.

LORD MURR.—I have no difficulty in concurring in the statement just made of the law applicable to this point. I think that the older cases are quite distinct to the effect that an alimentary fund can be restricted by the Court when it is in excess of the annuitant's requirements, and in all the opinions in the later cases the same rule is plainly admitted. I further agree that the amount of the annuity here is excessive, and concur in thinking that £500 a-year would be a suitable aliment for the petitioner.

LORD SHAND.—I concur. I am not satisfied that the precise point here to be decided has ever before been the subject of direct decision, or that there is any decision going directly to shew that the Court has ever restricted the amount of an alimentary fund, and held the balance to be open to diligence, the only case referred to by your Lordship being attended with various specialities. How-

No. 11. ever that may be, we have the authority of Lord Stair and a stream of authorities where the question has arisen, and in all of these cases, without exception, the Court has entertained the inquiry as to whether the amount of the annuity was excessive or not. If the argument of the petitioner here had been sound the Court would in all these cases have refused inquiry, but the fact is that in all inquiry was made, and that is to my mind conclusive of the view that in the opinion of lawyers the Court had power to restrict an alimentary annuity if they thought fit. This rule seems to me to rest on principle, for so far as a fund is directed to be paid to an annuitant which is in excess of a reasonable aliment, it is difficult to distinguish the excess from any other sum which is altogether in the power of the annuitant. Here we have a trust, and it may very well be that it would have been sufficient if the testator had said that there should be forfeiture of the excess of the aliment if the beneficiary contracted debt, &c., and that the surplus should fall into residue. Or, again, he might have provided that if diligence was used against the fund it should have been in the power of the trustees themselves to restrict the annuity, and that the annuitant should forfeit the excess on the trustees executing a minute to that effect. No such provision has, however, been made; there is no clause of forfeiture, and the annuitant has a right to a considerable sum, £400 or £500 a-year in excess of what we consider a reasonable aliment, and I do not see how that excess can be distinguished from his general funds. In coming to this decision I think we are only giving effect to a stream of decisions in that direction.

Nov. 5, 1886.
Livingstone v.
Livingstone.

LORD ADAM.—I concur with your Lordship in the chair, and do not wish to give any opinion on any matter beyond the case with which we are now dealing.

THE COURT recalled the arrestments to the extent of £500 per annum, and quoad ultra refused the prayer of the petition.

A. P. PUEVES, W.S.—JOHN BELL, W.S.—Agents.

No. 12. ELGIN COUNTY ROAD TRUSTEES, Pursuers (Respondents).—
D.-F. Mackintosh—Low.
Nov. 10, 1886. THE REVEREND JOHN BRODIE INNES, Defender (Reclaimer).—Balfour—
Elgin County C. J. Guthrie.
Road Trustees
v. Innes.

Road—Road trustees—Title to sue—Barbed wires.—A proprietor of lands bordering a public road is not entitled to erect a barbed wire fence along the road, where such fencing is dangerous to persons or bestial using the road, and road trustees have a good title to sue an action against the proprietor for the purpose of having him ordained to remove the fence.

1ST DIVISION. THE ELGIN COUNTY ROAD TRUSTEES, acting under the Elgin and Nairn Roads and Bridges Act, 1863, brought this action against the Reverend J. Brodie Innes, of Milton Brodie, in the county of Elgin, concluding for declarator "that the erection of fences composed wholly or partly of barbed or pointed wire extending along the side of a public road is illegal, and" for removal accordingly of "the barbed or pointed wires from a fence lately erected by him on his property on the side of the public road leading from Forres by Kinloss to Burghead, in the county of Elgin, extending said fence from a point near the east end of the wood of Blackstab, on the north side of said road, eastwards; and" for interdict against his "placing, or causing to be placed, any fences composed, in whole or in part, of such barbed or pointed wire alongside the public roads or highways in the county of Elgin under the management of the pursuers." No. 12.

Lord M'Laren.
M.

The pursuers stated that at a certain place on the north side of the public road leading from Forres to Burghead the defender had recently placed a fence composed, in whole or in part, of four barbed wires. "Said fence separates the public road from the defender's property aforesaid, and the same is on the level of the road, and in no way separated therefrom. With reference to defender's answer, it is explained that the fence now consists of five outer and two inner wires, but originally all the wires were on the side of the posts next the road. It is denied that the two barbed wires at the top, which have been shifted from the outside since the present proceedings were threatened, are accessible only to persons or animals within the defender's own lands, and explained that these wires are only separated from the two outside plain wires running parallel with them by split posts of only $2\frac{1}{2}$ inches in diameter, which are placed at a distance of nearly 14 feet from each other, and that consequently these two plain wires cannot resist anything coming in contact with them from also coming in contact with the two inner barbed wires; also explained that each barbed wire has four barbs or points, except the second wire from the top, which has two points. Denied that the intervening space of ground betwixt the fence and the road is the property of the defender. Also denied that the wire-netting is any protection from the barbs or points." They further stated that the barbed wire was highly dangerous and injurious to the lieges using the road, as well to travellers as to horses or bestial. "While said fence exists it is impossible to use the road for the ordinary purposes of traffic with safety, and the said fence constitutes an obstruction of the said road. The pursuers accordingly called on the defender to remove the said barbed wires, but this he refuses to do, whereby the present action has become necessary."

Nov. 10, 1886.
Elgin County
Road Trustees
v. Innes.

The defender stated,—“Explained that the fence stands entirely on the defender's ground. At no part of the road in question is there a less distance than 23 feet between fence and fence, and at no part of the road is it possible for persons or animals keeping to the road to come in contact with the fence. Between the fence and the road there is an intervening space or verge of about 3 feet which belongs to the defender. The present fence was erected to replace a fence which stood nearer the road. . . . Explained further, under reference to the said plan, that the fence consists of five outer and two inner wires, the former being on the outside and the latter on the inside of the posts. Of the five outer wires, the two nearest the top are plain, the two below are barbed, and the lowest is plain. The two outer barbed wires are partially covered by wire netting, as shewn in the plan produced. The two inner wires are both barbed, but they are accessible only to persons or animals within the defender's fields.”

The defender pleaded (1) that the pursuers had no title to sue, and (2) that their averments were irrelevant, and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons.

On 30th January 1886 the Lord Ordinary (M'Laren) before answer remitted to C. R. Manners, C.E., Inverness, “to inquire and report as to the alleged objections to the wire fencing libelled, reserving consideration of the pursuers' motion for a proof, in the event of it appearing from the report that the case involved matters of fact or of professional opinion which ought to be investigated by a proof or trial.”

Mr Manners reported as follows:—“This fence forms part of the enclosure fence of a young plantation upon the estate of Milton Brodie, is erected on the north side of the public road leading from Forres, by

No. 12. Kinloss, to Burghead, and is about five miles distant from each of these two places. . . . Between the fence in dispute, and at the east end thereof, and the fence at the south side of the road, the width is 25 feet,

Nov. 10, 1886.
Elgin County
Road Trustees
v. Innes.

but from the east end of the fence in dispute, the fence continuing eastward (which is of plain wires) curves outward, so that at about 10 yards beyond the east end of the fence in dispute the width between the fences is only 23 feet 6 inches. . . . The general width of the gravelled roadway is 17 feet or thereby, and at each side of the gravelled roadway there is a grass border or verge. This border or verge on the north side of the road, and alongside of the fence in dispute, is practically level with the roadway, and in fact forms a grass path of about 4 feet wide at the side thereof; and whether this intervening space or verge between the gravelled roadway and the fence, or any part of it, belongs to the defender or not, there is nothing to prevent cattle, sheep, or other animals, or persons from walking along this verge or from coming in contact with the fence. The total length of the fence in dispute, and as measured along the roadside, is 109 lineal yards or thereby. It was lately erected by the defender, practically on the same line as, and to take the place of, an ordinary plain wire fence, which was, I understand, first erected about twenty-three years since. The posts of this fence are of wood, half round in section, and measuring about 5 inches by $2\frac{1}{2}$ inches, the sawn or split side being next the plantation. They are placed at rather irregular distances apart, but may be taken to average some 14 feet to 15 feet. The strainers are of wrought iron. The wires are seven in number, five of which are on the outer or road side of the posts, and two on the inner or plantation side; of the outer wires the two upper and the bottom ones are plain and the two intermediate ones are barbed, each barb having four prongs or points. The two wires on the inner side of the fence are both barbed, the upper one having four and the lower one two prongs or points. The barbs having four points are about 6 inches apart on the wires, and those with two points are about 4 inches apart. On the outer or road side of the fence, and between the bottom plain wire at or near the ground level, and the upper barbed wire, and tied to them, there is wire-netting, the mesh or holes of which measure about $1\frac{1}{2}$ inches across . . . The fence is practically on the road-level, and is not erected on any mound or elevated ground. The upper plain wires on the outer or road side of the fence to some extent form a protection against the barbs of the inner wires, but in consequence of the posts being so far apart, and their thickness (which separates the outer and inner wires) being only 2 inches, this protection is not so great as would be the case were the posts placed at the usual distances of from 6 to 7 feet, and should any horse or other heavy body lean or press against the outer wires (except near the posts) the barbs would, I have no doubt, take effect. At the east end of the fence there is a length of 12 feet between two strainers, along which there are no plain wires or other protection against the barbs. With regard to the two outer barbed wires, I am of opinion that the wire-netting forms little or no protection against the barbs, and should cattle, sheep, or other animals be pressed against or come in contact with the fence they would in all probability be injured. If this fence had been near a town or village, I am further of opinion that these two outer barbed wires would have been dangerous, inasmuch as the dresses of females, or even the coats of men walking along the grass verge or border of the road might be blown against the barbs and torn by them; in the position of this fence, however, at a considerable distance from any town or village the risk of such damage or injury is greatly reduced."

The Lord Ordinary (M'Laren), on 11th March 1886, pronounced the interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary finds that the facts are sufficiently No. 12.

ascertained by the said report, and that no order for proof is necessary: Nov. 10, 1886.
Finds, in terms of said report, that in consequence of the unusual distance Elgin County of the posts of the fence in question, there is reasonable ground for apprehension of injury to passengers and animals from the barbed wires, and Road Trustees in respect the defender declines to avail himself of the suggestion of the v. Innes.
Lord Ordinary that additional posts should be placed between the existing posts, decerns and ordains the defender to remove the barbed or pointed wires from the said fence: Finds it unnecessary to dispose of the conclusions for declarator and interdict, and decerns: Finds the pursuers entitled to expenses," &c.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The pursuers had no title to sue. It must be taken that the fence was entirely in the defender's ground, and in such circumstances statutory authority to interfere with it was necessary. Such statutory authority was given by the 94th section of the Turnpike Roads Act, 1832 (1 and 2 Will. IV. cap. 43), providing for the erection by the trustees of parapet walls, fences, &c. in certain circumstances, and by the 102d section of the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878. If any such power as was claimed in this action had been contemplated, it would have been found in these Acts.

(2) On the merits, the wires complained of, so far as on the inside of the posts, were in suo, and could not be objected to. As regarded the outer wires, it must be taken that they were on the defender's own land. Accordingly, if the pursuers were to succeed it must be on the analogy of the case of houses, walls, or other buildings above seven feet high and suchlike, which were dealt with in section 91 of the Turnpike Act 1832. But these cases depended not on the law of obstruction but on that of neighbourhood. The presence of a coal-pit unfenced, and thus tending to accident, might certainly give rise to an action of damages, so might the barbs in the present case; but that was a very different thing from an action to have them removed, particularly where they were on the defender's own soil. The defender was prepared to increase the number of the posts, but would not undertake to do more. After all the fence was no worse than a thick blackthorn hedge which might be trimmed under sections 88 and 89 of the Turnpike Act, 1832. There was no legislation dealing with the present question, therefore a proprietor must be left to himself, subject to claims of damages at common law. Further, the facts stated by the reporter were not admitted, and the case ought to be sent to proof.

The pursuers' argument sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Judges.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The first question which is raised in this case is an objection to the title to sue. The pursuers are the Elgin County Road Trustees, incorporated under the Elgin and Nairn Roads and Bridges Act, 1863, under which these gentlemen are vested with the administration and management of all the highways in the county. Assuming that the fence here complained of is a source of danger to persons travelling along the road, and also to cattle, horses, and sheep, I think there is no doubt that the pursuers have a good title to raise an action for the purpose of putting down the fence, not by reason of any express power granted in their Act of Parliament, but upon the general rule of law that trustees always have a good title to defend the subject of their trust, and as the subject here is a public road I think they have a good title at common law to put down everything which may interfere with the convenient and safe use of that road. I am therefore for repelling that objection.

As regards the merits of the question, these are of a somewhat novel character,

No. 12.
Nov. 10, 1886.
Elgin County
Road Trustees
v. Innes.

because barbed wire fences have only come recently into use, and are undoubtedly of new construction, and dangerous to those who try to climb over them. But the question is whether they are a source of danger, not to an intruder, but to persons lawfully travelling along this road, including in that term horses, cattle, and sheep. If the barbed wire fence were of the ordinary construction, I think there cannot be much doubt that it would be a very dangerous erection on the side of a public road. It would be quite otherwise if the road ran through a cutting, and a fence of the kind I have mentioned were erected on the top of the cutting, or if the fence were placed at the foot of an embankment, the road running on the top of it, or if the fence were masked, so that the source of danger was removed. But all these conditions have no application in the present case, for here the barbed fence is on the level of the road, and is not masked, for I attach no importance to the contention that it is erected on the defender's own land. Everything outside the fence, I do not say is dedicated to the use of the public, because I think the defender would be entitled to use his own property, so far as consistent with the maintenance of the road by the trustees; but the fence being on the road, and placed there by the defender as dividing his property from the road, so long as it remains there, everything outside it is abandoned by him for the time being. It must be dealt with, therefore, on the same footing as if it were on the very line of the boundary between the road proper and the property of the defender. Placed in such a position, I am very clearly of opinion that the fence is dangerous, and if there were nothing more in the case, I should be inclined to agree with the Lord Ordinary, and to order its removal.

But there is a specialty in the case as regards the two barbed wires which run near the top of the posts on the inside of them next the plantation. On the outside of the posts on the side next the road there are two plain wires which, if kept tight, would probably prevent accidents from the two upper barbed wires which I have mentioned. But in the present condition of the fence, the plain wires will not act, because they yield to pressure, so that any one leaning against them would bend them, so as to bring himself in contact with the barbed wires on the other side. But this result might be avoided by adding to the number of posts. At present these are from fourteen to fifteen feet distant from one another, and it is thus impossible to make the wires so tight that an object pressing against them would not run the risk of coming in contact with the barbed wires on the other side. If the defender does not offer to erect these additional posts, and so to put the plain wires into a state of perfect tension, and maintain them so, I am of opinion that these two upper barbed wires, although placed on the inside of the posts, must, nevertheless, be removed.

With regard to the other two barbed wires, they are undoubtedly in such a position that any person leaning up against the fence, or any animal scratching itself against it, would be seriously injured. I cannot listen to the argument that there is at the lower part of the fence, several inches from the ground, a screen of wire netting. It is contended that by this screen the length of the barbs is reduced, but they are not thereby rendered innocuous, nor is the fence thereby put into such a condition that it will do no injury to cattle leaning against it or the like. In all the circumstances I think these barbed wires must also be removed, and in arriving at these conclusions I am proceeding on the facts admitted on record, and on these additional facts which are placed before us by the reporter. I do not attach weight to the deductions which he draws from these facts, but I find that the circumstances are sufficiently set forth in the record and report to enable me to decide the points which have been raised.

A demand for proof has been made, and I do not say that under certain circumstances, had the facts been less clear, I should not have acceded to it, but I do not see that there is any necessity for proof, and I think the defender is in a somewhat unfavourable position in asking for it, because if he was dissatisfied with the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor making the remit, he ought to have objected to it at the time. He ought then to have reclaimed, which he had an opportunity of doing under the 2d section of the Act of Sederunt of 10th March 1870, which extended the provisions of the 28th section of the Court of Session Act of 1868, "so far as these import an appointment of proof, or a refusal or postponement of the same." The Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 30th January was clearly within these last words, and the 28th section of the Act provided, in direct terms, that such an interlocutor should be final, unless a reclaiming note was presented against it within six days. The defender ought then to have insisted on his right. At the same time I do not think we should be shut out from appointing a proof to be held now. That is matter for the discretion of the Court, but it seems to me that the facts are sufficiently before us to enable us to come to a conclusion.

No. 12.
Nov. 10, 1886.
Elgin County
Road Trustees
v. Innes.

LORD MURK.—We have been asked to allow a proof in this case as regards certain questions both of fact and of opinion. On that point I had at first some difficulty, because I was under the impression that the interlocutor remitting the case to a reporter could not have been reclaimed against at the time. I am, however, now satisfied, having regard to the provisions of the statute and the Act of Sederunt, that it might have been reclaimed against, and, as this was not done, it is, I think, now too late to go back upon it. Because when a remit of this description has been made, even where there is no consent, and a party does not object, but allows it to be carried out, it has, I conceive, been long settled that he loses his opportunity of insisting on a proof prout de jure. It is not now, therefore, in my opinion, open to the reclamer to insist upon a proof.

But it is still open to the Court to order a further report upon the facts, and as to the effect of the network upon the wire, and I am individually of opinion that the view which has been expressed by the reporter upon this is not free from question. I am disposed to think that the network may afford a sufficient protection from the barbed wires, and I should have desired to have some more detailed information upon that matter.

As regards the upper wires, I think the remedy which is proposed by your Lordship, of having additional posts, is sufficient, and that what you have now proposed in that respect should be carried out.

LORD SHAND.—I entirely concur in the opinion of your Lordship in the chair, and in all the observations which you have made. I think the facts have been fully and quite accurately ascertained by the mode of inquiry which has been adopted by the Lord Ordinary. The reporter has visited the ground; he has examined the fence and the position of the wires and the nature of the barbs to which exception has been taken; and the Court is now quite able to form an opinion upon these facts. I do not understand that the reclamer disputes any one of the facts stated by the reporter—he only disputes the inferences from them; and, so far as relates to these inferences, I lay the report aside, and arrive

No. 12.

Nov. 10, 1886.
Elgin County
Road Trustees
v. Innes.

at a result for myself from the facts. In regard to what has been said as to the propriety of the remit, so far as I am concerned, I have no doubt of it, and if the interlocutor ordering the remit had been reclaimed against, I should have been of opinion that the Lord Ordinary had adopted a common-sense method of dealing with the case, and the best way of reaching the facts. I should have much deprecated that the parties should have gone to proof at large upon the question what is the particular form and construction of the fence.

As to the title to sue, I have no difficulty. The verge on the road side of the fence may be on the defender's property, but it seems to me that the fence has been so placed that we must hold that the ground between it and the public road has been dedicated, if not permanently, at least temporarily, to the public use. It is clear that the road trustees, who are the guardians of the road, and in that capacity find a fence which is a danger to persons or to cattle and sheep using the side of the road or leaning against the fence, have an interest to sue for its removal. The ground of action in this case being the existence of such a danger, I have no doubt the pursuers have a good title to sue.

On the merits of the case, I agree with your Lordship upon both points. In the ordinary case a fence is kept up for the purpose of defending the land beyond it from intruders. But the present fence is not merely defensive; it is also offensive. One purpose which the barbs serve is to protect the fence itself, by being a source of danger to passers-by. I am of opinion that no one is entitled to place what is dangerous to the public or to cattle and sheep on the side of the public road, either for the purpose of defending his lands or his fence. Looking to the length of the space between each post—from fourteen to fifteen feet—any person leaning against the defender's fence would find himself injured by the two barbed wires which are on the inside. I therefore think that the outside plain wires must be kept firmly stretched so as to prevent the risk of damage from the inside wires, and that this must be done by adding to the number of posts by which the wires are supported.

I am equally clear in regard to the barbed wires which are not on the top, but on the outside, of the fence, pointing towards the road, and which about outside the wire-netting which is said to be a protection against them. If there were no wire-netting I do not see that anything could be said in defence of these wires. But the wire-netting is said to mask the barbs, and perhaps it is true that it diminishes the extent to which the barbs will do injury. On the other hand, I am not altogether sure that the masking may not make matters worse, as it acts as a blind to the real danger, and may mislead. Upon the facts as ascertained, I think the only condition on which the defender can be permitted to retain his fence is that he shall place these two wires on the inside, where they would be protected by the posts, which, I have already said, must be added to, with the outside wires attached to them.

I think we should allow the defender an opportunity, first, of putting up additional posts, to which the outside wires are attached, and second, of putting the two outside barbed wires on the inside if he so thinks fit. Failing the implementation of these two conditions, I think we should adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD ADAM.—The placing of additional posts is not the only remedy which must be applied, as the Lord Ordinary seems to think. I think further that the two barbed wires on the outside of the fence must be taken away from their present place. If they are put on the inside and guarded as the upper ones are, No. 12.

this would probably be quite satisfactory.

The defender having agreed by minute to erect the additional posts, and to remove the outside barbed wires to the inside of the fence, the Court, on 18th November following, pronounced an interlocutor dismissing the action, and finding the pursuers entitled to expenses.

Nov. 10, 1886.
Elgin County
Road Trustees
v. Innes.

TODD, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—MACKENZIE, INNES, & LOGAN, W.S.—Agents.

ACCOUNTANT OF COURT, Reporter.—Moncreiff.

No. 13.

THOMAS BENNET CLARK (Crumpton's Curator Bonis), Compearer.—
G. W. Burnet.

Nov. 12, 1886.
Accountant
of Court v.
Crumpton's
Curator Bonis.

Judicial Factor—Curator Bonis—Trust—Investment—Trusts Amendment Act, 1884 (47 and 48 Vict. c. 63).—A curator bonis, being a trustee in the meaning of the Trusts Amendment Act, 1884, is entitled to invest the funds in his hands as curator in the purchase of the stocks and in the loans authorised as trust investments by that Act, notwithstanding that the registration of his name as holder of these stocks cannot by the practice of the Bank of England, where a large number of these stocks are transferable, be qualified by any entry to shew the character in which he holds them, the Bank of England declining to take cognisance of trusts.

Trust—Investments—Trusts Amendment Act, 1884 (47 and 48 Vict. c. 63), sec. 3.—Observations on the expression “approved by the Court of Session” with reference to the investments authorised as trust investments by the Trusts Act, 1884.

Observed (per Lord Adam) that stocks approved of in a particular application for approval were not thereby pronounced to be eligible in all cases or in any other case than that before the Court.

THOMAS BENNET CLARK, C.A., Edinburgh, was in 1884 appointed curator bonis on the estate of William Thomas Crumpton, then a lunatic, and incapable of managing his own affairs. In his accounts for the period from June 1884 to September 1885 the curator took credit for two sums invested by him, viz., a sum of £699, 2s. 6d. invested in the purchase of £700 Inscribed 4 Per Cent Stock of the Government of Queensland, and a sum of £800 invested in the purchase of £800 Inscribed 4 Per Cent Stock of the Government of New Zealand. The curator inserted this note in his account:—“These two investments have been made under the powers granted to curators and others by the Trusts (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1884. By the decision of the Court in the case of Orr (Maclean's Trustee) on 20th December 1884 (12 R. 529), these and other colonial stocks were duly approved by the Court.”

The Accountant reported the investments for the consideration and judgment of the Court, not feeling himself entitled to pass them without obtaining authority to do so. He explained the difficulties and objections to the investments as follows:—“1. In the Colonies, as well as in England, trusts are not recognised, and consequently a purchase of Colonial Government Stock must be registered either in the personal name of the ward or in the personal name of the factor or curator; and the first of these forms is not available where a transfer has to be accepted, as neither a lunatic nor a minor ward can sign a transfer. In the event, however, of registration in the ward's name, the stock cannot be realised during the life of a lunatic ward, nor in case of a minor, until he reaches majority, for Colonial officials will not recognise the title of a judicial curator or factor appointed by the Court of Session. 2. The alternative is to take transfer and effect registration in the factor's per-

1st DIVISION.
Lord Trayner.
B.

No. 13.

Nov. 12, 1886.
Accountant
of Court v.
Crumpton's
Curator Bonis.

sonal name. This is the form that has been adopted in this case, and the vouchers for the investments made consist of two receipts apparently granted by the sellers in favour of 'Thomas Bennet Clark,' for the prices paid in each case. And 3. of certificate by the chief accountant of the Bank of England (where the stocks were transferable, the bank acting as agents for the Colonial Governments), dated 27th April 1886, that said sums of £800 New Zealand Consolidated 4 Per Cent Stock, and £700 Queensland 4 Per Cent Stock were, at the close of the previous day, standing in the name of the factor, Thomas Bennet Clark. On the above-mentioned receipts the curator has written the following declaration:—'I hereby declare that the stock in this certificate is held by me as curator bonis for William Thomas Crumpton. (Signed) THOMAS BENNET CLARK.' The stocks having been registered in the personal name of the curator, they will be entirely under his control, and can be realised by him at any time without authority of the Court, and without the knowledge of the Accountant until the next period of audit, when new certificate from the Bank of England would be required. 4. As the certificate by the Bank of England bears no reference to the ward or his estate, a factor would have it in his power to make several investments of similar amount in the same stocks for different factories, and to produce in each case a certificate by the bank, although, in fact, there had been but one investment. There would be no means of identifying the stock as belonging to one factory and another. Farther, it is for the consideration of the Court how these investments in the personal name of the curator will stand. 1. In the event of the bankruptcy of the curator. The question arises here, what is the legal effect of the declaration of trust written on the receipts? That 'declaration' is only on the receipts, which, it is understood, are of no value, except as acknowledgments of the prices paid. The Bank of England would give no effect to the declaration, and would not look farther than to the identity of the party in whose name registration has been made. They would not acknowledge the right of the ward, or of anyone representing the ward. The stocks and dividends, therefore, could only be realised either by the curator himself, though bankrupt, or by the trustee for his creditors, and possibly the latter might challenge the legal validity of the declaration of trust, and claim the amount as part of the bankrupt's estate. In any view, there would be much complication and expense in recovering for the ward or his estate. In the ordinary transactions in the factories under the Accountant's supervision, he has invariably declined to recognise declarations of trust, in respect that they do not carry to a ward, or to the factor acting for him, a completed title to the securities to which they apply. 2. In the event of the death of a curator. Should that occur during the life of the ward, the latter could not, in any direct form, make good his right. The stocks would have to be given up by the curator's executor as part of his estate, and be included in the probate taken out in England by the executors, and possibly executors might decline to take probate to the stocks, in respect that they did not belong to the executry. Should this occur, how could the ward recover? In any view, expensive procedure would be required at the risk of the ward. The Accountant considers that the investments referred to are eligible in themselves, apart from the special objections now reported."

Lord Trayner, to whom the Accountant's report was submitted, by interlocutor, dated 25th May 1886, appointed the report to be printed and boxed to the Judges of the First Division. His Lordship stated in a note that he did so because the questions raised were very important, and the Accountant desired to have them authoritatively settled.

The curator appeared, and argued ;—The objections of the Accountant applied to consols, a class of investment that was certainly permitted. There was no hard and fast rule in the matter, and the Court had recognised that curators' powers must be made elastic enough to suit the changes in the market.¹ The Court had approved of an investment where the curator's name stood on the register without qualification.² The investments here proposed had been sanctioned by Lord Adam in Orr's case,³ and by the terms of the Trusts Act of 1884 a curator bonis was in pari casu with a trustee.

No. 13.

Nov. 12, 1886.
Accountant
of Court v.
Crumpton's
Curator Bonis.

The Accountant's argument appears from his report already given.

After the argument the Lord President said that this was an important matter, and that the Court before disposing of it would consult the other Judges, so that the judgment might form a rule of practice.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—Mr Thomas Bennet Clark, who was appointed curator bonis to William Thomas Crumpton, has in the administration of the curatorial estate made two investments, one of £800 of New Zealand Consolidated Stock, and the other of £699 of stock of the Government of Queensland. When Mr Clark's accounts were presented to the Accountant of Court containing the statement of these investments, it occurred to the Accountant that a question of considerable importance was raised which he ought to report to the Court. Accordingly he did report to the Junior Lord Ordinary, before whom such reports come. He also considered the question to be important, and reported to us; for the same reason we have had a consultation with the rest of the Court, and we are now to state the result.

The curator says that these two investments have been made "under the powers granted to curators and others by the Trusts (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1884," and he refers to the case of Orr, decided by my brother Lord Adam in the Outer-House (12 R. 529). Now, the Trusts Act of 1884 has in its second section this definition of the word "trust." "'Trust' shall mean and include any trust constituted by any deed or other writing, or by private or local Act of Parliament, or by resolution of any corporation or public or ecclesiastical body, and the appointment of any tutor, curator, or judicial factor by deed, decree, or otherwise." "Trustee" is defined as including "tutor, curator, and judicial factor"; and, again, the section proceeds, "'judicial factor' shall mean any person judicially appointed factor upon a trust-estate, or upon the estate of a person incapable of managing his own affairs, factor loco tutoris, factor loco absentis, and curator bonis."

This is a case of a curator bonis, and therefore it appears to me that within the meaning of that Act the curator here is a trustee, and the estate under his management is a trust. That being so, the question is, whether under the third section of the Act he is authorised to make the investments he has made.

That section provides that trustees may invest their funds on certain stocks there mentioned, or in loans on the security of certain stocks. The present investments fall, I think, under the 7th head of the stocks that may be purchased, viz., "East India Stock, stocks or other public funds of the government of any colony of the United Kingdom approved by the Court of Session, and also bonds or documents of debt of any such government approved as aforesaid,

¹ Grainger's Curator, Feb. 23, 1876, 3 R. 479.

² Accountant of Court v. Geddes, June 29, 1858, 20 D. 1174.

³ Orr (Maclean's Trustee), Jan. 9, 1885 (decided Dec. 12, 1884), 12 R. 529.

No. 13. provided such stocks, bonds, or others are not payable to the bearer." The investments before us are public funds of the government of a colony of the United Kingdom, and, if they are approved by the Court of Session, they may be lawfully taken as investments for trust-funds.

Nov. 12, 1886.
Accountant
of Court v.
Crumpton's
Curator Bonis.

Now, the Accountant does not say that these are bad investments, nor is it anywhere stated that they are not good as security for the money that is invested. We may take it then that they have been "approved by the Court of Session." But the Accountant has suggested a number of difficulties which apply not only to these investments, but also to a large class of stocks which undoubtedly otherwise form most eligible investments for trust-funds. These difficulties all arise from one source, viz., that the Bank of England will not receive a trustee as holder of stock, but will only recognise individuals, and will not add any condition or qualification of the right of the parties whose names stand in their books as holders of stocks.

If we were to give effect to this objection the result would be that in trusts under the Act of 1884 the Court would not be able to authorise investments in Bank of England Stock or in any public funds of the United Kingdom. In short, consols would be forbidden as an investment. That is a result quite contrary to the provisions of the Act of 1884. I quite agree with Lord Adam's judgment in Orr's case, but, independently altogether of that judgment, we could not disapprove of investments such as the present without going in the face of the Act of 1884. I do not think it is necessary therefore to go into the details of these objections. They would be of great force if we were at liberty to do otherwise than follow out the directions of the statute. As it is, I think we must sustain these investments.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I think it is sufficient for the disposal of this case to say that if we were to sustain the Accountant's objections the result would be to deprive estates under judicial management of an enormous number of eligible investments. That result might be highly prejudicial to them, for factors would then be restricted to other investments which may be open to more or less serious objection.

I need only add that I think it will be quite proper for the Accountant to continue his practice of earmarking the certificates of the factories under his supervision.

LORD ADAM.—I concur. I only wish to add that I did not intend to decide, and did not decide, in the case of Maclean that the stocks then approved of were eligible in all cases or in any other case than the one then before me. It is obvious that these stocks may vary from time to time as eligible investments. All I applied my mind to was the question of whether they were eligible in the particular circumstances of the case. I make that observation because I understand that the practice following upon that decision has been inconsistent with this interpretation of it.

Moncreiff.—The Accountant would desire to know whether application is to be made for approval in each case as it arises, or if he is to consider that a particular investment once approved of by the Court is an eligible investment?

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Accountant has up to this time decided whether investments are eligible. Nothing that we decide in this case will interfere with his judgment on that matter. No. 13.

LORD MURE.—The Accountant will sanction investments approved of by the Court so long as they continue eligible.

Nov. 12, 1886.
Accountant
of Court v.
Crumpton's
Curator Bonis.

THE COURT remitted to the Accountant to sustain the investments reported by him for the consideration of the Court.

MILLAR, ROBSON, & INNES, S.S.C.—MACKENZIE, INNES, & LOGAN, W.S.—Agents.

EARL OF GLASGOW, Petitioner (Reclaimer).—Rankine—Dundas.
COUNTESS OF GLASGOW AND OTHERS, Compearers (Respondents).—
Murray—W. C. Smith.

No. 14.

Nov. 12, 1886.
Earl of Glas-

Entail—Disentail—Valuing of debts and provisions—Deductions from rental^{1st Division.}
before ascertaining provisions—Rutherford Act, 1848 (11 and 12 Vict. cap. 36), sec. 6.—The 6th section of the Rutherford Act, 1848, enacts that where an heir of entail applies for authority to disentail he shall produce to the Court an affidavit setting forth the particulars of all debts or provisions affecting or that may be made to affect the fee of the estate or the heirs of entail, "and it shall be lawful for the Court to order such provision as may appear just to be made for such debts or provisions, or for the protection of the parties in right of the same, before granting the authority sought for in such application, or as the condition of granting the same."

In a petition for disentail held in estimating the amount of security to be made prior to disentail, in respect of certain Aberdeen Act provisions, by the petitioner in favour of his wife and children, that (1) the rental of the year of disentail must be taken in place of the rental of the year of the granter's death, but that (2) deductions ought not to be made therefrom in respect of terminable rent charges, or in respect of a subsisting annuity in favour of the widow of a former proprietor; and (3) that in computing the amount of security to be granted for the annuity to the petitioner's wife no account should be taken of the children's provisions, nor any account of the widow's annuity in computing the security to be made for the children's provisions, and that security must be granted for the children's provisions to the maximum amount chargeable, although at the date of the disentail there were only two in existence.

THE EARL OF GLASGOW, as heir of entail in possession of the entailed ^{1st Division.} lands of Kelburne and others in Ayr and Bute, under a deed of entail, Lord Ordinary dated prior to 1st August 1848, presented a petition for disentail of these on the Bills lands under the Rutherford Act, 1848, and succeeding Acts, calling the (Shand).
three next heirs of entail, who all lodged consents to the disentail. B.

No answers were lodged to the petition, and the instrument of disentail having been produced, the Lord Ordinary (Trayner) remitted to Mr John Galletly, S.S.C., in the usual course, to inquire whether the procedure had been regular.

A schedule and affidavit was produced to the reporter, in terms of section 12, subsection 5, of the Entail Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1875, from which it appeared that the only unsecured debts or provisions of the nature referred to in that section were (1) an obligation by the petitioner in his antenuptial marriage-contract to grant in favour of his wife, Lady Glasgow, a bond of annuity, binding himself and the succeeding heirs of entail to pay to her an annuity of £3000; and (2) an obligation in the contract of marriage, and a bond of provision following upon it, to pay to the children of the marriage who should be alive at his death, and should not succeed to the estate, if one child, one year's free yearly rent of the estates; if two children, two years' free yearly rent; and if three

No. 14.

Nov. 12, 1886.
Earl of Glasgow.

or more children, three years' free yearly rent or value, all in terms of the Aberdeen Act (5 Geo. IV. cap. 87), secs. 1 and 4.

Mr Galletly reported that drafts of two deeds had been submitted, one in favour of the Countess, who was now fifty years of age, and the other in favour of trustees for the petitioner's two children,—both being daughters, and not entitled to succeed to the entailed estate,—the one Lady Gertrude J. G. Boyle or Cochrane, wife of the Honourable Thomas Cochrane, and the other Lady Muriel Boyle, who was unmarried, and in her fourteenth year. The petitioner was in his sixty-first year.

There were also certain terminable rent charges affecting the estate, amounting to £877, 5s. 3d.

The rental of the estate was stated at £8953, 12s. 5d.

He further reported that the following two questions had arisen on which the Lord Ordinary's judgment was desired:—“(1) Whether the whole annual payment on account of the rent charges should not be deducted in fixing the amount of the annuity and children's provisions, or whether it is properly dealt with in the rental produced, or, if not, how it should otherwise be dealt with? and (2) whether the annuity to the Countess, or interest on the actuarial value of the annuity, should not also be taken into account in fixing the amount of the children's provisions?”*

It appeared that there was an annuity also affecting the estates in favour of the Dowager-Countess of Glasgow (now eighty-six years of age), £1500 of which was allocated upon the estates now being disentailed. The petitioner did not propose to deduct this.

After counsel had been heard for the petitioner and for his two daughters, who appeared, the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Shand), on 21st August 1886, pronounced an interlocutor finding, in terms of Mr Galletly's report, that the procedure had been regular and proper; approving of the instrument of disentail, and granting warrant for its being recorded; ordaining the petitioner to execute the two deeds, one a bond of annuity in favour of Lady Glasgow for £2984, 11s. 9d., and the other a bond and disposition in security over the fee and rents of the estate in favour of trustees for the two children for £26,860, 17s. 3d., “said bond of annuity and disposition in security, and said bond and disposition in security, containing declarations in gremio that the said annuity and provisions shall, on the death of the petitioner, be restrictable, in terms of the provisions of the Aberdeen Act, and decerns: Remits to Mr Galletly to revise and adjust the drafts of the said bonds, and to see the same executed and recorded as aforesaid, and to certify that that has been done: Supersedes extract of this interlocutor until the said bond of annuity and disposition in security, and bond and disposition in security, have been so recorded, and a certificate to that effect by Mr Galletly has been lodged in process.”†

* The 6th section of the Rutherford Act (11 and 12 Vict. cap. 36) bears,—
“Be it enacted that where any heir of entail . . . shall apply to the Court of Session under this Act . . . he shall make and produce in such application an affidavit setting forth that there are no entailers' debts or other debts, and no provisions to husbands, widows, or children affecting or that may be made to affect the fee of the said entailed estate or the heirs of entail, or if there are such debts or provisions, setting forth the particulars of the same, . . . and it shall be lawful for the Court to order such provision as may appear just to be made for such debts or provisions, or for the protection of the parties in right of the same, before granting the authority sought for in such application, or as the condition of granting the same . . .”

† “NOTE.—The question raised by the reporter arises under the 6th section of the Entail Amendment Act, 11 and 12 Victoria, chapter 36, which provides

The petitioner reclaimed.

When the case was called the Court remarked that Lady Glasgow was

No. 14.

Nov. 12, 1886.
Earl of Glasgow.

that in cases of disentail and the like 'it shall be lawful for the Court to order such provision as may appear just to be made' for debts or provisions which affect, or may be made to affect, the fee of the estate or the heirs of entail, or for the protection of the parties in right of the same. In the present case it is necessary, in authorising the disentail of the estates held by the petitioner, that provision be made to secure the annuity to which the present Countess of Glasgow is entitled under the obligation contained in her antenuptial contract of marriage with the petitioner, and also to secure the provisions in favour of the younger children of the marriage, of whom there are two in life, viz., Lady Gertrude J. G. Boyle or Cochrane, who is of full age, and Lady Muriel Boyle, in minority, under the obligation in favour of younger children in the petitioner's contract of marriage and the relative bond of provision mentioned by the reporter. The annuity and provision must be secured by bonds and dispositions in security so as directly to affect the fee of the estate; and the question which arises between the parties is as to the amounts for which the deeds in favour of the Countess of Glasgow and the younger children respectively are to be granted. The annuity and provisions have been granted under the powers contained under sections 1 and 4 of the Aberdeen Act, under the former of which the widow is entitled only to one-third of the free yearly rent or free yearly value of the estates after the deductions mentioned in the Act; while under the latter the children are entitled at the utmost, in the case of three children, to three years of the free yearly rents or free yearly value of the estate, also after making the deductions specified in the statute. In both cases the rental to which the statute refers in fixing the measure of the widow's and children's provisions is that of the year in which the heir of entail may die and his successors take up the estate. In the case of a disentail such as is now to be carried out, it becomes impossible literally to take the rule of the Aberdeen statute. The property goes into other hands, and may be sold and subdivided into many parcels, and it would be unreasonable to suppose that the rental in the hands of purchasers or successors fifteen or twenty years hence should, after a disentail, form the measure of the provisions to the widow and children of the heir disentailing. There is, I think, no alternative but to take the rental of the year of the disentail as the rule.

"The petitioner further contends, however, that the burdens which affect the estate in the year of the disentail ought also to be taken into view in fixing the deductions from the rental; and his counsel has maintained that in the case of the annuity secured to the Countess of Glasgow there should be deducted—first, the interest on the children's provisions, and second, the amount which the petitioner has this year to pay in respect of rent charges under the improvement statutes, and certain bonds of annual rent enumerated in the statement produced, amounting in all to £877, 5s. 3d. The Countess of Glasgow was not represented by counsel; but the Court is charged with the protection of her interests under the section of the Entail Amendment Act already referred to.

"Again it was maintained that in like manner, in fixing the amounts to be secured for the children's provisions, there ought to be deducted from the rental—first, the amount of the annuity to the Countess of Glasgow, and second, the amount of the annual rent charges and annual rents just referred to. The counsel for the younger children maintained that none of these deductions ought to be made.

"In disposing of this question it is not necessary—and I do not think it would be competent—for me even to attempt to settle the ultimate rights of parties. All that can now be done or that ought now to be done is to order "such provision as may appear to be just" for ultimately meeting the obligations in favour of the Countess of Glasgow and the younger children above referred to. If, however, I had to decide the question I should certainly hold that the proposed deductions from the rental, which would seriously cut into the annuity and provisions, ought not to be allowed. It is true that the dis-

No. 14.
—
Nov. 12, 1886.
Earl of Glasgow.

not represented by counsel. They accordingly appointed a curator ad litem to her, and the same counsel who appeared for the children were instructed on her ladyship's behalf.

Argued for the petitioner;—The Aberdeen Act did not contemplate the case of a disentail. In computing the security to be made for these Aberdeen Act provisions it was therefore conceded that the rental of the year of disentail must be taken instead of that of the year of the granter's death as the basis of computation. It followed that the burdens subsisting as at the date of disentail ought to be deducted in estimating the free rental. The following deductions should therefore be made, (1) the amount of rent charges at present burdening the estate; (2) an annuity of £1500 in which the Dowager-Countess was infest, and which the Lord Ordinary alluded to in his note as not insisted on in the Bill-Chamber; entail renders it necessary to take the rental of the year of disentail as the measure of liability to start with. It does not, however, by any means follow that the burdens of that year must also be taken as deductions. There is a necessity to take the rental. There is no such necessity to take the year of disentail with reference to the burdens; and it appears to me that it would be most unreasonable that the heir of entail disentailing the estate should be thereby entitled not only to the advantage of acquiring the estate in fee-simple, but also to accelerate the date at which the deductions from the rental should be made to the serious prejudice of the creditors, the widow and younger children of the heir of entail. If it were so a disentail would have the remarkable effect of reducing the amount of certain debts on the estate. In the present case I observe the petitioner shrinks from carrying his argument to its full extent, for he does not propose to deduct the annuity now affecting the estates or the heirs of entail, in favour of the Dowager-Countess of Glasgow, amounting to upwards of £3000 [£1500 of this only was allocated on the estates now being disentailed]; while, if his argument be sound, he would be entitled to deduct that sum or a considerable portion of it, although it is understood the annuitant is upwards of eighty-six years of age. It appears to me that as a condition of authorising this disentail provision ought to be made to secure over the estate the utmost amount which the widow or children may yet have as a claim against the estates.

"In that view, first, as regards the present Countess of Glasgow, if she outlive her children there may be no deduction on account of their provisions; and if her husband, the petitioner, now sixty-one years of age, should live to the age of eighty-one or eighty-two, the whole rent charges and annual rents now existing would be paid off. I am therefore of opinion that in making provision for the Countess's annuity neither interest on the children's provisions, nor rent charges, or annual rents, ought to be taken into view; and this being so, the amount for which provision must be made in the bond and disposition in security in her favour must be £2984, 11s. 9d., being one-third of the rental of £8953, 12s. 5d., after deducting interest on the debts secured on the fee of the estate.

"In like manner as regards the children, if their mother predeceased them the annuity could of course form no deduction from the rental, and the same observations already made as to the rent charges and annual rents applies in their case also. The provisions must, therefore, be made by a bond and disposition in security in their favour for the sum of £26,860, 17s. 3d., being three years of the said rental of £8953, 12s. 5d.

"In taking this course as regards the possibility of the Countess of Glasgow predeceasing the petitioner, I understand that I am proceeding on the view to which Lord Kinnear, after full consideration, gave effect in the case of Falconer Stewart of Binny, for authority to record instrument of disentail, reported in the S. L. R., vol. xx. p. 867.

"The deeds to be now granted will contain provisions or conditions in gremio that the said bonds of annuity and provisions shall on the death of the petitioner be restrictable in terms of the provisions of the Aberdeen Act."

(3) in computing the amount to be secured in respect of Lady Glasgow's annuity, the interest on the children's provisions; and (4) in computing the security to be made for these provisions, the amount of Lady Glasgow's annuity should be deducted.¹

No. 14.
Nov. 12, 1886.
Earl of Glasgow.

At all events the matter was in the discretion of the Court, who would not throw any undue burden on the estate, while protecting the interests of the wife and children, and it would be fair, as regarded the rent charges, to deduct interest on the capitalised sum with which the petitioner might, under the Entail Act of 1882 (sec. 6, subsec. 4), have charged the fee of the estate, though he had not chosen to do so. And as regarded the widow's annuity and the children's provisions, a remit should be made to an actuary to estimate the amount of security which in the whole circumstances would probably be sufficient. It would be unjust to burden the estate with an amount of security which could not be really required. For instance, the probability of further issue of the petitioner's marriage was exceedingly remote; and again, Lord Shand had ordained security to be made for a variety of contingencies, all of which could not possibly occur, as for example, Lady Glasgow could not both survive and predecease her issue. The case of Falconer Stewart,² cited by the respondents, was distinguishable, because there the disentailing proprietor and his wife were much younger.

Argued for Lady Glasgow and the children;—Though it was necessary to take the rental of the year of disentail instead of that of the grantor's death as the basis of computation, it was not necessary, and would not be just, to deduct the burdens then subsisting in a question of this sort. The Court was not here deciding the ultimate rights of parties. It was a question of security, and the Court should order "such provision as may appear just to be made" (section 6 of Rutherford Act). The power of disentailing was a privilege, but ought not to be exercised to the effect of giving the disentailer advantage over his creditors. The principle laid down by Lord Shand was sound,—viz., that as a condition of authorising the disentail provision ought to be made to secure over the estate the utmost amount which the widow or children may yet have as a claim against the estates.³ This was a statutory question, and the interest of Lord Glasgow's creditors ought not to be taken into account.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In disposing of the matters decided by Lord Shand's interlocutor we must be guided by the 6th section of the Entail Amendment Act (11 and 12 Victoria, cap. 36), which provides that where an heir of entail proceeds to disentail an estate under the immediately preceding sections, provision shall be made for ascertaining whether there are any entailers' debts, or other debts affecting the estate, or provisions for husbands, wives, or children affecting or that may be made to affect the fee of the entailed estate, or the heirs of entail; and if there be any such provisions, then the enactment is, that it shall be lawful for the Court to order such provision as shall be just to be made for such debts or provisions, or for the protection of the parties in right

¹ Brodie v. Brodies, Dec. 6, 1867, 6 Macph. 92, 40 Scot. Jur. 56; Baroness Gray, July 14, 1870, 8 Macph. 990, 42 Scot. Jur. 600; Lord Lovat v. Fraser, June 30, 1885, 12 R. 1179.

² July 7, 1883, 20 S. L. R. 867.

³ Irving v. Irving, Feb. 22, 1871, 9 Macph. 539, 43 Scot. Jur. 306; Duke of Roxburghe v. Russell, June 28, 1881, 8 R. 862; Christie v. Christia, Dec. 10, 1878, 6 R. 301 (Lord Shand at p. 309); Boyd v. Boyd, July 5, 1851, 13 D. 1302; Macdonald v. Lockhart, Dec. 19, 1835, 14 S. 785, 8 Scot. Jur. 110.

N^o. 14. of the same, before granting the authority asked for in such application, or as a condition of granting the same.

Nov. 19, 1886.
Earl of Glasgow.

These are very general words, and they must be read so as to give full effect to the apparent object of this section of the statute, that there shall be a security created for provisions which shall do full justice to the beneficiaries. As Lord Shand has expressed it in the note to his interlocutor under review, it is a condition of authorising the disentail that provision be made to secure over the estate the utmost amount to which the widow or children may, at the death of the husband and father, have a direct claim as against the estates.

Now, the provisions over the estate in the present case, which require to be secured, are, in the first place, an annuity to the present Countess of Glasgow, and, in the second place, a bond of provision in favour of younger children, or of children who do not succeed to the entailed estate, and the provision for them is one year's rent if there is one child, two years' rent if there are two children, and three years' rent if there are three or more children.

The first thing to be ascertained, of course, is what is the rental of the estate; and in dealing with provisions and burdens such as those before us, the ordinary rule is that the rent of the estate is to be taken as at the death of the granter of the provision, the heir of entail who was in possession. But in a case like the present it is quite obvious that that rule cannot be followed. The granter of the provision is still alive, and is the heir in possession disentailing the estate in virtue of the powers of this statute. Some other period must therefore be taken at which the rental of the estate is to be ascertained, and in accordance with our practice the Lord Ordinary has taken the date of the disentail,—I mean the date of the order disentailing,—and to that no objection is made by anybody.

But it is quite obvious that in considering what deductions are to be made from that year's rent, the same rule cannot apply, because the burdens which affect the estate at present are obviously burdens which may not, and probably will not, as regards some of them, affect the rents of the estate, when these provisions come to be paid off. There is, for example, the annuity to the Dowager-Countess, who is a very old lady, and in all human probability will not survive until these provisions become payable on the death of the present Earl of Glasgow. In like manner it may be very doubtful whether the rent charges which at present affect the estate, and which are not of a permanent character, but only for a term of years, may not have ceased to be payable before the death of Lord Glasgow. And again the question arises whether we are to assume in the case of Lady Glasgow's annuity, that her two present children will then be surviving, or whether there may not be three then existing instead of two, and whether, therefore, in ascertaining the rent of the estate at that time, the provisions in favour of the children will require to be taken into account before fixing Lady Glasgow's annuity, and correspondingly whether it is to be taken for granted that Lady Glasgow will survive her husband, and that in fixing the children's provisions Lady Glasgow's annuity will have to be taken into account and form a deduction.

Now, as regards all of these things, I think we must carry out the principle that there may be a sum to be paid which will consist of the prescribed amount of the rent of the estate at the death of Lord Glasgow unaffected by any one of these annual payments at the time that Lord Glasgow's provisions come into operation. It is not only very possible, but very probable, that the Dowager and in some degree probable, that those rent charges will have ceased to affect Nov. 12, 1846.

Lady Glasgow's annuity will have come to an end. It is also very possible, No. 14.
 the estate and the rents of it; and it may be—and I say nothing about the Earl of Glasprobability as regards them—that when Lady Glasgow's annuity comes to be Gow.
 fixed, there will be no children of the marriage surviving, in which case the children's provisions could not be taken into account in fixing the amount of her annuity. In like manner, as regards the provisions of the children, we must take into account the same considerations as regards the Dowager's annuity and the rent charges. We must also take into account that when their provisions come to be fixed there may be no burdens affecting the estate in the shape of an annuity to their mother, the present Countess. I therefore come to the conclusion with the Lord Ordinary that we must take all these into account and refuse to give any deduction for the present, either for the Dowager's annuity or for the rent charges, or other provisions made by the present heir of entail in possession.

There is no doubt that there is some inconvenience, and perhaps apparent hardship, in placing upon the estate so large an amount of burden as this necessarily entails. This may lead to some embarrassment in settling the price of the estate as between the seller and the purchaser in the event of the disentailing heir selling the estate. But such difficulties may be overcome by the seller and purchaser settling on the footing of an actuarial value of the burdens left on the estate in accordance with our judgment. But be that as it may, I am clearly of opinion that a burden must be laid on the fee of the estate in terms of the 6th section of the statute, which shall be sufficient to meet every claim arising at the death of the disentailing heir in the most unfavourable view for his successors.

For these reasons I am entirely of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that the sums mentioned in his interlocutor must be the sums to be inserted in the bonds to be granted—of course with a declaration in both bonds that the annuity and provisions shall be restrictable upon the death of the petitioner, in terms of the Aberdeen Act.

LORD MURE—I quite agree with your Lordship. In the circumstances of this case I see no other course that can well be taken but that which the Lord Ordinary has adopted.

The date of fixing the amount of provisions and deductions in ordinary cases under the Aberdeen Act is the date of the death of the heir in possession, and it is quite easy then to ascertain the rental according to which the provisions are to be calculated, and what the facts are which require to be taken into consideration in fixing these deductions. In the case of a disentail the date of the death of the heir must still, I think, be taken as the period for fixing the deductions, because that is in compliance with the express provision of the Aberdeen Act. But as regards the rental a different rule requires to be applied.
 Because, as the Lord Ordinary has pointed out, the effect of the disentail may lead to the removal of the estate from the heir altogether, and place it in the hands of other persons, and in that case it cannot be expected that the rental in the hands of purchasers fifteen or twenty years after the disentail should “form the measure of the provisions to the widow and children of the heir disentailing.” His Lordship has accordingly held that the rental of the year of the disentail must be

No. 14. taken as the rule, and in that I concur, and indeed I do not understand that there is any serious dispute about that.

Nov. 12, 1886.
Earl of Glasgow.

But the question remains, what are the deductions which fall to be made in the view that the annuitants and children may not be in life at the date of the death of the petitioner, and that certain rent charges now in existence may then have ceased? On that subject I need say no more than that I agree in the views and contingencies so fully explained by your Lordship and the Lord Ordinary. I think the view adopted by the Lord Ordinary, and given effect to in his interlocutor, that the "bond of annuity and disposition in security and said bond and disposition in security shall contain declarations in gremio that the said annuity and provisions shall, on the death of the petitioner, be restrictable, in terms of the Aberdeen Act," is quite safe and satisfactory, and is the only course that can with propriety be adopted at present.

LORD SHAND.—I have had the benefit of the renewed argument which took place at your Lordships' bar, and I retain the opinion to which I gave effect in the Bill-Chamber, and have nothing to add to the reasons which I there gave in the note to the interlocutor which has been submitted to the review of your Lordships.

LORD ADAM.—This is a petition for authority to record an instrument of disentail of the estate of Kelburne, and the 6th section of the Entail Act of 1848 says that, in authorising such instrument of disentail to be recorded, we are to make such provisions as may be just for all debts or provisions affecting the estate, or for the protection of the parties in right of the same. That is the duty laid upon us. Now, I agree that it would not be just to make provision for anything less than the maximum amount of provisions to which these parties, the possible widow and children, may become entitled. I think, if an heir of entail for his own purposes wishes to disentail an estate, it is only just that the provisions existing at the time of the disentail in favour of his widow and children should be secured over the estate, so that they shall suffer no prejudice by the disentail. Now, in this case, the maximum to which the widow may become entitled depends upon the number of children, and upon whether there are any, and, if so, how many, surviving at his death. If there are no children surviving, the maximum will of course be larger than if there were children, and I think it would be manifestly unjust to provide for the widow upon any other terms than those which would arise were the children to predecease him. No one can say whether that will be so or not, and therefore I think it would be unjust to fix her annuity on any other footing.

In regard to the children, I think the case is exactly the same. The children may survive, and there may be no widow, the result of which would be that their provisions would be increased, and so it would not be just to them either to proceed on any other footing than that that may be the case.

Then, again, the case becomes more involved by the fact that there are at present rent charges over the estate, at least of a temporary character, which might affect the amounts of both the widow's annuity and the children's provisions. But here, again, these are charges that may never require to be taken into account at all.

So that it all comes to this, that, if the widow predeceases, of course no sum is necessary for her at all, and, on the other hand, if the children predecease, then, of course, no sum is necessary for them either. No one can say how all this will turn out, and therefore I am of opinion that we must provide for each of these contingencies, and allow for the maximum. There may be apparent hardship in this, but it seems to me that the hardship is more apparent than real, because the heir of entail would arrange terms of sale with a purchaser, not on the footing that the whole sums which are now to be secured will ultimately become a charge on the estate, but by an actuarial calculation as to what the probable sum is that will come to be charged on the estate, and thus allow a settlement to take place at once, instead of postponing it till the petitioner's death.

Upon the whole matter I concur with your Lordship and the Lord Ordinary.

THE COURT adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

J. & F. ANDERSON, W.S.—TODD, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—HOPE, MANN, & KIRK, W.S.—Agents.

No. 14.

Nov. 12, 1886.

Earl of Glasgow.

ROBERT RICHARDSON AND ANOTHER (Horsbrugh's Trustees), Pursuers (Respondents).—Gloag—Murray.

No. 15.

Nov. 12, 1886.

Horsbrugh's
Trustees v.
Welch.

RALPH DALYELL WELCH, Defender (Reclaiming).—M^r Kechnie—Kennedy.
Warrandice—Trust—Personal liability of trustee.—A person infest as trustee in certain heritable subjects, after consenting to certain bonds being granted over them by his author, which were duly recorded, granted a bond and disposition in security for a new loan which he acknowledged to have received, and bound himself to repay "as trustee." In security of the personal obligation he disposed the subjects "as trustee," and the bond further contained this clause—"I grant warrandice."

In an action by the last bondholder upon the clause of warrandice against the representative of the trustee, held that the trustee was personally bound in warrandice from fact and deed, and was liable for loss arising from the prior bonds to which he was a consenter.

Question, whether he was not personally liable in absolute warrandice.

ON 23d December 1872 the late Mr Charles Welch, afterwards Welch 1st Division.
Tennant, granted a bond and disposition in security for £375 over the Lord Trayner.
lands of Hallfields belonging to him, in favour of a Mr Brody who, in B.
February 1876, assigned it to Mr Robert Richardson and another, the marriage-contract trustees of Mr and Mrs William Horsbrugh.

The bond in question proceeded upon the narrative that, under a bond of relief and disposition, dated 30th December 1858, William Wright of Hallfields and others had disposed to Mr Welch, for the purposes therein mentioned, the lands and others therein described, in which the latter was afterwards duly infest, and empowered him to borrow such sum or sums of money from time to time as might be necessary to enable him to execute the purposes of that deed, and to grant bonds for money so borrowed, "binding the said William Wright and others, their heirs and successors, and the estate thereby conveyed." The bond proceeded,—“Whereas it is necessary, in order to enable me to execute the purposes of said deed, that I should borrow the sum after-noted: Therefore I, as trustee foresaid, grant me to have instantly borrowed and received from Robert John Brody . . . the sum of £375 sterling, which sum I, as trustee foresaid, bind myself and my successors to repay . . . at Whitsunday 1874 . . . and the interest of the said principal sum at the rate of £5 per centum per annum . . . And in security of the personal obligation before written, I, as trustee foresaid, and empowered as aforesaid, dispose to and in favour of the said Robert John Brody,” the lands of Hallfields as there described. The bond farther contained this clause,—“I grant warrandice.”

No. 15.

Nov. 12, 1886.
Horsbrugh's
Trustees v.
Welch.

Two prior bonds for £5000 and £1300 over Hallfields had been granted by Mr Wright in 1870, to which Mr Welch had been a consenting party. The creditors in the first bond having entered into possession of the subjects, Horsbrugh's trustees sued the executor and general donee of Mr Welch for the amount contained in their bond, and interest thereon from Whitsunday 1884. They sought to enforce this personal liability on various grounds, all of which were dealt with by the Lord Ordinary, but it is only necessary here to refer to the single ground on which the Inner-House proceeded.

The pursuers founded upon the warrandice clause in the bond above quoted, and maintained that in respect of it Mr Welch's representative was personally liable for the amount of the bond.

The Lord Ordinary (Trayner), on 29th March 1886, found that the defender was liable to the pursuers in the sums sued for, quoad ultra continued the case, and granted leave to reclaim.*

* "NOTE.— . . . 7th and last of the grounds on which the pursuers ask decree. The bond now held by the pursuers contains the clause,—‘I grant warrandice,’ and in respect of that clause the pursuers maintain that the defender as Mr Welch's representative is personally liable for the amount of the bond, the property over which it was granted having been carried off by a prior bondholder. The facts upon this part of the case stand thus: On 14th May 1870, Mr Wright borrowed £5000 on the security of Hallfields, and in the bond and disposition in security granted for that loan the dispositive clause runs thus:—‘And in security of the several personal obligations before written, I, the said William Wright, with consent of Charles Welch, writer in Cupar, and I, the said Charles Welch, for all my right and interest in the premises, and we both dispoise to and in favour of,’ &c. Mr Welch is no party to the personal obligations in that bond, or to the clause of warrandice, or to anything but the disposition, and that in the terms I have quoted. That bond was duly recorded, and (although not admitted by the pursuers) I hold it sufficiently proved, supported by all the probabilities of the case, that the pursuers were aware, when they took the assignation to the bond they hold, that the £5000 bond was a burden on the estate of Hallfields, preferable to theirs. I do not doubt that the pursuers, or their agents, saw the search of incumbrances over Hallfields, which disclosed the existence of the £5000 bond. The question thus arises—What is the effect of the warrandice granted by Mr Welch? The form of the clause, as used in the bond in question, is statutory, and has a statutory meaning (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 101, sec. 119). ‘The clause of warrandice shall be held to import absolute warrandice as regards the lands and the title-deeds thereof, and warrandice from fact and deed as regards the rents.’ On the mere words of the clause, therefore, as interpreted by statute, Mr Welch is bound in absolute warrandice as regards the lands. There is no doubt that the lands have been taken possession of by the holders of the £5000 bond, who are drawing the rents; and there is another bond for £1300, granted by Mr Wright on 18th July 1870, over Hallfields, to which Mr Welch was a consenter, in the same terms as he consented to the £5000 bond, which is still undischarged, and preferable to the pursuers' bond. It is not said by the defender that the estate of Hallfields will, when sold, yield a price sufficient to pay off all the heritable burdens, while the pursuers aver that it will not. At all events, in the meantime, the lands, so far as affording any security for principal, loan, or interest, have been carried off from the pursuers. In these circumstances, I am of opinion that there has been a breach of warrandice, for which the defender, as representative of Mr Charles Welch, is liable. He must either make good the lands as a security for the pursuers' £375, or pay the amount.

“It was urged by the defender, however, that, looking to the whole scope and tenor of the bond held by the pursuers,—that as it plainly was granted by Mr Welch as a trustee and for trust purposes, the clause of warrandice should be read and construed as if it had been expressed thus:—‘I, as trustee foresaid,

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The warrandice clause only warranted the title, and did not cover the subjects conveyed. It did not imply an obligation to purge prior incumbrances. There was that distinction between the present case and a case of sale. This was illustrated by the civil law. In the contract of sale under the civil law there was an obligation to purge prior incumbrances, but in the contracts of pignus and hypotheca there was no such obligation. If this was so under the civil law, it was presumably so also in the law of Scotland.¹ But assuming this was not so, it was only “as trustee” that Mr Welch bound himself in the warrandice clause; and these qualifying words must be imported into it. The clause did not stand alone, and the rest of the deed, the clause imposing the personal obligation, and the dispositive clause, must be looked to in construing it. A trustee’s warrandice was not absolute, but only from fact and deed.

No. 15.
Nov. 12, 1886.
Horsburgh’s
Trustees v.
Welch.

The respondents argued;—No distinction could be drawn between the effect of a clause of warrandice in an absolute disposition and in a bond and disposition in security.² It was said that the words “as trustee” must be read into the warrandice clause, with the result that the trust-estate only was bound in absolute warrandice, and that, so far as Mr Welch was personally concerned, the warrandice was only from fact and deed. Assuming this was so, Mr Welch had been a consenting party to grant warrandice,’—and that a trustee’s warrandice was not absolute, but only from fact and deed. It is not free from doubt whether the pursuers are bound to read the clause otherwise than as really expressed, or whether any meaning can be applied to that clause other than the statutory meaning. But the pursuers argued, that if this concession was made to the defender, the result was not affected. It remains still the fact that it is the deed of Mr Welch under which the lands have been carried off. That he was merely a consenter in the terms above given, I do not regard as material, for his consent was, I should think, necessary to the carrying out of the £5000 transaction. At that date Mr Welch was infeft in the lands in security of a right of relief, and also for certain trust purposes. His consent was necessary to the £5000 bond, in order that it might rank preferably to any right he had, and it is improbable that the lender of the £5000 would have taken a security postponed to Mr Welch’s rights. But Mr Welch consented to the £5000 being ranked preferably to the trust purposes, and the bond now in question was granted in fulfilment of trust purposes; and accordingly it must be held that Mr Welch by his deed had done something to lessen the security of those who lent money to the trust on the trust-estate. Mr Welch might easily have protected himself by excepting from the warrandice granted to the pursuers all the then existing burdens. But how does it appear that the pursuers’ cedent or the pursuers would have accepted a security or lent their money on these terms? Taking it, as I do, that the pursuers knew of the existence of the £5000 bond, they were still entitled to rely on the warrandice to this effect, that if the prior bond carried off the estate, the personal liability involved in the warrandice would then arise, so that even then they had some security for the repayment of their loan. I am of opinion, therefore, that upon this ground the pursuers must prevail. They must, however, if required, assign their bond to the defender, so that he may obtain payment out of Hallfields, should it turn out that the proceeds of that estate are sufficient to meet the whole burdens upon it. As this has not been offered on record, I have meantime only pronounced a finding that the defender is liable to make payment of the sums sued for without pronouncing decree therefor. . . .”

¹ Leith Heritages Co. v. Edinburgh and Leith Glass Co., June 7, 1876, 3 R. 789; Campbell v. Gordon, Feb. 21, 1840, 2 D. 639, 12 Scot. Jur. 360, affd. 1 Bell’s Appa. 428.

² Macalister v. Macalister’s Trustees, Feb. 28, 1866, 4 Macph. 495, 38 Scot. Jur. 231.

No. 15. the two previous loans for £5000 and £1300 granted over the estate; and the warrandice clause having created a personal contract between him and the respondents, he was liable for the consequences of his own acts.¹ The only appearance of authority against this result was the case of Gordon v. Campbell,² which was a very special case. The law would not be stretched further than it was in that case.

Nov. 12, 1886.
Horsbrugh's
Trustees v.
Welch.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Lord Ordinary has found that “the defender is liable to the pursuers in the sums sued for.” These sums amount to £375, which was advanced by the pursuers upon a bond and disposition in security over the estate of Hallfields, with interest thereon. I think the Lord Ordinary has come to a sound conclusion, and I am prepared to adopt his Lordship’s ground of judgment. Supposing the clause of warrandice were to be read as if it had expressed in so many words, “I grant warrandice as trustee, and as trustee only,”—meaning thereby that the lands were warranted against fact and deed—I should still have thought that the defender was liable, because, as Mr Gloag has said, warrandice from fact and deed infers a protection against eviction by reason of the granter’s own act or omission, past or future. In consenting to the execution of the previous bonds for £5000 and £1300, Mr Welch created securities, the holders of which had it in their power to evict the holder of the subsequent bond and disposition in security. I do not think a bond and disposition by Wright would have been effectual without Welch’s consent, but even if that were doubtful, no creditor would have advanced the two sums I have named without Mr Welch’s consent being given to the transaction, and accordingly Mr Welch, by his act and deed, did co-operate with Mr Wright in effecting the securities.

So far I agree with the Lord Ordinary, and I do not think it necessary to consider the larger question, whether the clause of warrandice is binding on Mr Welch personally,—that is, whether he undertook the warrandice obligation qua trustee only, or whether he was personally liable to make good the security. I have strong doubts whether he would escape personal liability upon that ground. But I merely wish to guard myself against any possibility of being supposed to have decided anything which conflicts with the application of the doctrine I have repeatedly had occasion to enunciate in regard to the personal liability of trustees.

* LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND.—If the clause of warrandice in the present case had been expressly qualified by the words and “I as trustee foresaid grant warrandice,” I am not satisfied that it would necessarily have followed that there was no absolute warrandice on the part of Mr Welch. We know that in partnership questions trustees have been found personally liable although partners solely qua trustees; and in addition to the cases which occurred in connection with the Western and City of Glasgow Bank liquidations, there have been numerous cases in which it has been found that trustees undertaking obligations—prima facie in their trust capacity only—will thereby incur personal liability as, e.g., where trustees acting as such employ builders, contractors, or others to do work on the trust-estate. So, too, in cases of loan—unless when the obligation is expressly specially guarded, as in the case of Gordon v. Campbell (1 Bell's Appa. 428), a personal obligation will be created—and so also as regards obligations by acceptance of bills.

¹ Lumsden v. Buchanan, June 22, 1865, 3 Macph. (H. of L.) 89.

² June 13, 1842, 1 Bell’s Appa. 428.

No. 15.
Nov. 12, 1886.
Horsburgh's Trustees v. Welch.

But upon the other ground the limited warrandice which it is admitted was undertaken plainly implies warrandice from fact and deed, not only as regards future acts and deeds, but also as regards the past. I do not doubt that the previous transactions to which Mr Welch was a consenting party amounted practically to a creation of prior and preferable claims against the subject of the security. So that on this ground I think the pursuers are entitled to succeed in the present question.

LORD ADAM concurred.

THE COURT adhered, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed further with the cause. On 19th November following the Lord Ordinary gave decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons, but with a declaration that on payment of the sums decreed for the pursuers should grant the defender an assignation of the bond.

MACANDREW, WRIGHT, ELLIS, & BLYTH, W.S.—J. B. DOUGLAS & MITCHELL, W.S.—Agents.

WILLIAM HARVIE, Petitioner.—Ure.

No. 16.

WILLIAM ROSS AND THOMAS ROSS, Respondents.—C. J. Guthrie—A. S. D. Thomson.

Nov. 18, 1886.
Harvie v. W. and T. Ross.

Interdict—Procedure—Breach—Patent.—A, the holder of a patent, obtained interim interdict against B to prevent infringement. B did not object to the validity of the patent, but immediately thereafter assumed his son, C, as a partner with a view to manufacturing articles which A alleged were in infringement of his patent. A thereupon presented a petition and complaint against B and C for breach of interdict. B and C averred that the articles manufactured by them did not constitute an infringement, and further C challenged the validity of A's patent. Held (in conformity with Dudgeon v. Thomson and Donaldson, 3 R. 604 and 974, and 4 R. (H. L.) 88), (1) that it was competent to bring C into the process, though the interdict was not directed against him personally, and (2) that C was not entitled to a proof of his averments regarding the validity of the patent.

By deed of assignment, dated 26th December 1883, William Harvie acquired exclusive right to certain letters-patent dealing with improvements in apparatus and valves for regulating the supply of water to water-closets, &c.

1st DIVISION.
B.

The patent was originally the property of William Ross, brassfounder, Glasgow, but subsequently through successive assignations came into the possession of Harvie.

In April 1886, Harvie brought a suspension and interdict against William Ross to have him prevented from manufacturing certain articles which he alleged to be in infringement of his patent, and on 12th May interim interdict was granted by Lord Trayner, Ordinary, "in respect that the respondent has failed to find caution" (for profits) as appointed by a previous interlocutor.

On 18th October Harvie presented a petition and complaint against William Ross, and Thomas Ross, his son, in respect William Ross had continued to manufacture the articles alleged to be in infringement of the patent. The petition further stated;—"He (William Ross) has also, for

No. 16. the purpose of evading the interdict now standing against him, assumed as a partner his son Thomas Ross, who is now actively engaged in pushing the sale of the said valves in Glasgow and elsewhere. The said Thomas Ross is well aware of the said interdict, and of the fact that the valves sold by him and his father are made and sold in infringement of the complainer's patents, and in breach of the said interdict. The said Thomas Ross has thus been and is knowingly and wilfully aiding and abetting the said William Ross in breaking said interdict. The manufacture and sale of valves and apparatus by the said William Ross and Thomas Ross is still continued in breach of said interdict, and to the great prejudice of the petitioner."

Nov. 13, 1886.
Harvie v. W.
and T. Ross.

The petitioner prayed the Court to find that the two respondents had been guilty of contempt of Court and breach of interdict.

William and Thomas Ross lodged separate answers.

William Ross did not raise any question as to the validity of Harvie's patent, but alleged that the articles manufactured by his firm of William Ross & Sons did not constitute an infringement of the patent.

Thomas Ross admitted in articles 1 and 2 of his statement of facts that he was on 14th June 1886 taken into partnership with his father with a view to manufacturing the articles alleged to constitute an infringement of Harvie's patent, but denied that they constituted such an infringement. In articles 3 to 7 of his statement he went on to challenge the validity of Harvie's patent on several grounds, e.g., prior publication, prior use, &c.

He pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The valves and apparatus in question being manufactured by the firm of William Ross & Son, the petition ought to be dismissed so far as directed against this respondent. (3) No interdict ever having been obtained by the petitioner against this respondent, the petition and complaint ought to be refused so far as directed against him. (4) The petition and complaint ought to be refused in respect that the letters-patent founded on by the petitioner are invalid on certain specified grounds. (5) Assuming the letters-patent to be valid, the petition should be refused, because the respondent has not infringed the said letters-patent, or manufactured any articles which are interdicted under the said interim interdict.

Argued for the petitioner;—The proof to be allowed should be limited to proof as to whether the articles manufactured by William Ross & Son were in infringement of the patent, and Thomas Ross ought not to be allowed a proof of his averments against the validity of the patent. Such a plea afforded no answer to a petition for breach of interdict and contempt of Court. It was quite competent to try the question of infringement in a petition and complaint; there was nothing in the case of *Dudgeon v. Thomson*¹ to shew that the House of Lords thought that an objectionable or incompetent course. Further, it was competent to bring Thomas Ross into the process though no interdict had been granted against him. He admitted that he had been taken into partnership with his father simply to manufacture these articles, and that he was aware of the interdict having been granted against his father. That state of facts brought him directly under the rule which had been applied to the respondent Donaldson in the case of Dudgeon v. Thomson.

Argued for the respondents;—Proof ought at all events to be allowed to shew that the manufacture of these articles did not constitute an infringement. But further, as regarded the son, the petition ought to be dismissed; though he was admittedly in partnership with his father he was working for his own interest, and ought to be allowed to proceed until No. 16. personally interdicted. He ought further to be allowed to attack the validity of the patent as, if it turned out that he was right in thinking that the patent was bad, that would affect materially the view to be taken of his conduct. Nov. 13, 1886.

¹ Dudgeon v. Thomson and Donaldson, March 17, 1876, 3 R. 604, and July 5, 1876, 3 R. 974, July 10, 1877, 4 R. (H. L.) 88.

Harvie v. W.
and T. Ross.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am of opinion in this case that the complainer is entitled to a proof of his averments, and that William Ross is entitled to a proof of his, and that Thomas Ross is entitled to a proof of his averments in articles 1 and 2 of his answers, but not of those in the remaining articles.

The first question raised is as to the competency of trying this question in the form of a petition and complaint for breach of interdict, and I cannot say that I have any doubt on that point. The question is really, no doubt, whether the patent has been infringed, but also there is the question whether by so infringing the patent the respondents have committed a breach of interdict. The facts on which the decision of both these questions rests are the same, viz., whether the patent has been infringed, and there seems to me to be nothing in the decision in the case of Dudgeon v. Thomson to give ground for supposing that the House of Lords thought that there was any objection to trying such a question by way of a petition and complaint for breach of interdict.

The House of Lords no doubt thought in that case that we had gone wrong, because, after the interdict was granted and before the petition and complaint for breach of interdict was presented, the patentee had lodged a note of disclaimer and alteration, and the effect of that was to bar him from objecting to an infringement of the patent as it originally stood. There is, however, nothing of that kind here.

Then the position of Thomas Ross here, as being a party acting in combination with his father, and as his partner, seems to me to be exactly the same as the position of Donaldson in the case of Dudgeon v. Thomson, for there Donaldson was assumed as a partner in exactly the same way as Thomas Ross was assumed as a partner here. The case of Dudgeon on that point is therefore precisely in point, and it is quite competent to bring Thomas Ross into this process though the interdict was not directed against him personally.

As regards William Ross, he does not raise any question as to the validity of the patent, and he could not do so, as he himself was once owner of the patent and assigned it to someone else, who in turn assigned it to the complainer. The son, however, does raise a question as to the validity by articles 3-7 of his averments, and the next question is, is he entitled to a proof of those articles? I apprehend he is not. The father was interdicted. He was not in a position to raise any question of the validity of the patent, and he cannot do so now, but the complaint against the son is not only that there has been an infringement of the patent, but that he has committed a breach of interdict by aiding and abetting his father in infringing. Now, I do not think that Thomas can be heard when he challenges the validity of the patent as an answer to that complaint, and therefore I think we should remit to the Lord Ordinary to take such a proof as I have proposed.

LORD MURE.—I concur in thinking that a proof should be allowed to the limited extent proposed by your Lordship. I have looked into the observations of the Lord Chancellor in the case of Dudgeon, and I find there nothing to lead

No. 16. me to suppose that the House of Lords thought that such a process as the present was an improper one to try the question we have raised here. As regards
 Nov. 13, 1886. the question whether Thomas Ross can be brought into the process, I think the Harvie v. W. position of Donaldson in the case of Dudgeon is precisely in point. I therefore and T. Ross. concur in the course proposed by your Lordship.

LORD SHAND.—The simple question raised here is whether the respondent, having been interdicted from manufacturing a certain patented article, has in defiance of the order of the Court gone on manufacturing it. The sole issue that can be raised in that process is whether, assuming the patent to be valid, there has been an infringement of it. In a question with William Ross it is clear that is the only issue, but there is also the question as regards Thomas Ross, whether he is excluded from raising an objection to the validity of the patent. Now, he is not carrying out an independent manufacture of the article but he was assumed as a partner simply with a view to carrying out the manufacture of the articles which are alleged to constitute an infringement. If the complainer does not succeed in shewing that Thomas Ross knowingly assisted his father in infringing the patent then he will fail in his complaint, but if he does succeed then Thomas Ross cannot be entitled to shew as an answer to the complaint that the patent is invalid. But Thomas Ross has not even averred that he has been carrying on an independent manufacture, but admits that he is carrying on the business in conjunction with his father. If that is so, I cannot see how he can attack the patent on any of the usual grounds. The simple question therefore that must go to proof is, has there been an infringement of the patent, assuming it to be valid?

LORD ADAM.—As regards the father, William Ross, the only question is whether, assuming the patent to be valid, there has been an infringement of it. As regards the son Thomas, the only question is whether he has aided and abetted his father in infringing the patent in the knowledge that there was an interdict standing against such infringement. I therefore concur in the course proposed to be taken here.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords having heard counsel on the petition and complaint and answers, find the petitioner and William Ross entitled to a proof of their averments, and the respondent, Thomas Ross, to a proof of his averments in articles 1 and 2 of his statement of facts: Repel the 2d, 3d, and 4th pleas in law for the said Thomas Ross: Remit to Lord Kinnear, Ordinary, to try the cause before himself without a jury."

THOMSON, DICKSON, & SHAW, W.S.—J. STEWART GELLATLY, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 17. SCOTTISH RIGHTS OF WAY AND RECREATION SOCIETY, LIMITED, AND OTHERS, Petitioners.—Murray—W. C. Smith.

Nov. 16, 1886. DUNCAN MACPHERSON, Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Robertson—Asher—Cosens.
 Scottish Rights of Way and Recreation Society, Limited, &c. v. Lord Ordinary without a jury refused.
 Macpherson.

THIS case was reported supra, p. 7. The pursuers presented a petition for leave to appeal to the House of Lords against the judgment in that case. They stated that "the petitioners are advised that, according to the inveterate practice of your Lordships' Court, sanctioned by the House of Lords, such cases are tried on issues by a Lord Ordinary and a jury. No. 17.

2D DIVISION.
 Lord Kinnear.
 M.

 The greatly increased cost and uncertainty of an inquiry by means of proof before a Lord Ordinary, subject to appeal on questions of fact to the Inner-House of the Court of Session and to the House of Lords, gives the petitioners a material interest in the observance of the practice of your Lordships' Court; and as the petitioners the said society are charged with the public interest in this case, and in other similar cases, they deem it their duty to obtain the judgment of the House of Lords upon the question of procedure."

Nov. 16, 1886.
 Scottish
 Rights of Way
 and Recreation
 Society,
 Limited, &c. v.
 Macpherson.

After hearing counsel for the petitioners,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a novel application. The question we considered when the case originally came before us was whether the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary appointing the case to be tried upon issues by a jury should be adhered to, or whether it was more desirable that it should be tried without a jury before his Lordship. That was a question that certainly admitted of two opinions, and we took the opportunity of consulting our brethren upon it, with the result that we ordered the case to be tried without a jury.

I need not detail the reasons which led us to that result. In disposing of the case we did not lay down any rule that could be applied generally; the case was determined on its own circumstances merely. We are now asked to allow an appeal against that procedure judgment to the House of Lords. I am of opinion that there is no good ground for granting that motion.

LORD CRAIGHILL and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—If this had been a question whether cases of this kind should or should not be appropriated to jury trial, it would have been a very proper question for an appeal to the House of Lords. But it being admitted that this is a question for your Lordships' discretion, I am quite sure that the House of Lords would not interfere with that discretion, and therefore it would be no benefit to the pursuers, but the reverse, to allow the case to go there.

THE COURT refused the prayer of the petition.

ANDREW NEWLANDS, S.S.C.—TAIT & CREIGHTON, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN GORDON, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Pearson—Shaw.
 BRITISH AND FOREIGN METALINE COMPANY AND OTHERS, Defenders
 (Respondents).—D.-F. Mackintosh—Macfarlane.
 WILLIAM BRUCE THOMPSON, Defender (Respondent).—C. S. Dickson.

No. 18.

Nov. 16, 1886.
 Gordon v.
 British and Foreign Meta-
 line Co. &c.

Reparation—Judicial slander—Malice—Relevancy.—In an action for damages for judicial slander the pursuer must aver facts and circumstances from which the jury may reasonably infer malice.

Averments of facts and circumstances which were held relevant to support an issue for judicial slander.

Scott v. Turnbull (11 R. 1131) considered.

Reparation—Judicial slander—Partnership.—A company or a private partnership may be sued for damages for judicial slander, notwithstanding that malice must be proved against the defenders.

Reparation—Judicial slander.—Held (rev. judgment of Lord M'Laren) that an action of damages for judicial slander is relevant although the matter alleged to be libellous formed the whole subject-matter of the original action.

Process—Summons—Defenders—Partnership.—An action was brought against a descriptive firm and the individual partners thereof, "as such partners and as

No. 14. of the same, before granting the authority asked for in such application, or as a condition of granting the same.

Nov. 12, 1886.
Earl of Glasgow.

These are very general words, and they must be read so as to give full effect to the apparent object of this section of the statute, that there shall be a security created for provisions which shall do full justice to the beneficiaries. As Lord Shand has expressed it in the note to his interlocutor under review, it is a condition of authorising the disentail that provision be made to secure over the estate the utmost amount to which the widow or children may, at the death of the husband and father, have a direct claim as against the estates.

Now, the provisions over the estate in the present case, which require to be secured, are, in the first place, an annuity to the present Countess of Glasgow, and, in the second place, a bond of provision in favour of younger children, or of children who do not succeed to the entailed estate, and the provision for them is one year's rent if there is one child, two years' rent if there are two children, and three years' rent if there are three or more children.

The first thing to be ascertained, of course, is what is the rental of the estate; and in dealing with provisions and burdens such as those before us, the ordinary rule is that the rent of the estate is to be taken as at the death of the granter of the provision, the heir of entail who was in possession. But in a case like the present it is quite obvious that that rule cannot be followed. The granter of the provision is still alive, and is the heir in possession disentailing the estate in virtue of the powers of this statute. Some other period must therefore be taken at which the rental of the estate is to be ascertained, and in accordance with our practice the Lord Ordinary has taken the date of the disentail,—I mean the date of the order disentailing,—and to that no objection is made by anybody.

But it is quite obvious that in considering what deductions are to be made from that year's rent, the same rule cannot apply, because the burdens which affect the estate at present are obviously burdens which may not, and probably will not, as regards some of them, affect the rents of the estate, when these provisions come to be paid off. There is, for example, the annuity to the Dowager-Countess, who is a very old lady, and in all human probability will not survive until these provisions become payable on the death of the present Earl of Glasgow. In like manner it may be very doubtful whether the rent charges which at present affect the estate, and which are not of a permanent character, but only for a term of years, may not have ceased to be payable before the death of Lord Glasgow. And again the question arises whether we are to assume in the case of Lady Glasgow's annuity, that her two present children will then be surviving, or whether there may not be three then existing instead of two, and whether, therefore, in ascertaining the rent of the estate at that time, the provisions in favour of the children will require to be taken into account before fixing Lady Glasgow's annuity, and correspondingly whether it is to be taken for granted that Lady Glasgow will survive her husband, and that in fixing the children's provisions Lady Glasgow's annuity will have to be taken into account and form a deduction.

Now, as regards all of these things, I think we must carry out the principle that there may be a sum to be paid which will consist of the prescribed amount of the rent of the estate at the death of Lord Glasgow unaffected by any one of these annual payments at the time that Lord Glasgow's provisions come into operation. It is not only very possible, but very probable, that the Dowager and in some degree probable, that those rent charges will have ceased to affect Nov. 12, 1886.

Lady Glasgow's annuity will have come to an end. It is also very possible, No. 14.
 the estate and the rents of it; and it may be—and I say nothing about the Earl of Glasprobability as regards them—that when Lady Glasgow's annuity comes to be GOW.
 fixed, there will be no children of the marriage surviving, in which case the children's provisions could not be taken into account in fixing the amount of her annuity. In like manner, as regards the provisions of the children, we must take into account the same considerations as regards the Dowager's annuity and the rent charges. We must also take into account that when their provisions come to be fixed there may be no burdens affecting the estate in the shape of an annuity to their mother, the present Countess. I therefore come to the conclusion with the Lord Ordinary that we must take all these into account and refuse to give any deduction for the present, either for the Dowager's annuity or for the rent charges, or other provisions made by the present heir of entail in possession.

There is no doubt that there is some inconvenience, and perhaps apparent hardship, in placing upon the estate so large an amount of burden as this necessarily entails. This may lead to some embarrassment in settling the price of the estate as between the seller and the purchaser in the event of the disentailing heir selling the estate. But such difficulties may be overcome by the seller and purchaser settling on the footing of an actuarial value of the burdens left on the estate in accordance with our judgment. But be that as it may, I am clearly of opinion that a burden must be laid on the fee of the estate in terms of the 6th section of the statute, which shall be sufficient to meet every claim arising at the death of the disentailing heir in the most unfavourable view for his successors.

For these reasons I am entirely of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that the sums mentioned in his interlocutor must be the sums to be inserted in the bonds to be granted—of course with a declaration in both bonds that the annuity and provisions shall be restrictable upon the death of the petitioner, in terms of the Aberdeen Act.

LORD MURE.—I quite agree with your Lordship. In the circumstances of this case I see no other course that can well be taken but that which the Lord Ordinary has adopted.

The date of fixing the amount of provisions and deductions in ordinary cases under the Aberdeen Act is the date of the death of the heir in possession, and it is quite easy then to ascertain the rental according to which the provisions are to be calculated, and what the facts are which require to be taken into consideration in fixing these deductions. In the case of a disentail the date of the death of the heir must still, I think, be taken as the period for fixing the deductions, because that is in compliance with the express provision of the Aberdeen Act. But as regards the rental a different rule requires to be applied.
 Because, as the Lord Ordinary has pointed out, the effect of the disentail may lead to the removal of the estate from the heir altogether, and place it in the hands of other persons, and in that case it cannot be expected that the rental in the hands of purchasers fifteen or twenty years after the disentail should “form the measure of the provisions to the widow and children of the heir disentailing.” His Lordship has accordingly held that the rental of the year of the disentail must be

No. 14. taken as the rule, and in that I concur, and indeed I do not understand that there is any serious dispute about that.

Nov. 12, 1886.
Earl of Glasgow.

But the question remains, what are the deductions which fall to be made in the view that the annuitants and children may not be in life at the date of the death of the petitioner, and that certain rent charges now in existence may then have ceased? On that subject I need say no more than that I agree in the views and contingencies so fully explained by your Lordship and the Lord Ordinary. I think the view adopted by the Lord Ordinary, and given effect to in his interlocutor, that the "bond of annuity and disposition in security and said bond and disposition in security shall contain declarations in gremio that the said annuity and provisions shall, on the death of the petitioner, be restrictive, in terms of the Aberdeen Act," is quite safe and satisfactory, and is the only course that can with propriety be adopted at present.

LORD SHAND.—I have had the benefit of the renewed argument which took place at your Lordships' bar, and I retain the opinion to which I gave effect in the Bill-Chamber, and have nothing to add to the reasons which I there gave in the note to the interlocutor which has been submitted to the review of your Lordships.

LORD ADAM.—This is a petition for authority to record an instrument of disentail of the estate of Kelburne, and the 6th section of the Entail Act of 1848 says that, in authorising such instrument of disentail to be recorded, we are to make such provisions as may be just for all debts or provisions affecting the estate, or for the protection of the parties in right of the same. That is the duty laid upon us. Now, I agree that it would not be just to make provision for anything less than the maximum amount of provisions to which these parties, the possible widow and children, may become entitled. I think, if an heir of entail for his own purposes wishes to disentail an estate, it is only just that the provisions existing at the time of the disentail in favour of his widow and children should be secured over the estate, so that they shall suffer no prejudice by the disentail. Now, in this case, the maximum to which the widow may become entitled depends upon the number of children, and upon whether there are any, and, if so, how many, surviving at his death. If there are no children surviving, the maximum will of course be larger than if there were children, and I think it would be manifestly unjust to provide for the widow upon any other terms than those which would arise were the children to predecease him. No one can say whether that will be so or not, and therefore I think it would be unjust to fix her annuity on any other footing.

In regard to the children, I think the case is exactly the same. The children may survive, and there may be no widow, the result of which would be that their provisions would be increased, and so it would not be just to them either to proceed on any other footing than that that may be the case.

Then, again, the case becomes more involved by the fact that there are at present rent charges over the estate, at least of a temporary character, which might affect the amounts of both the widow's annuity and the children's provisions. But here, again, these are charges that may never require to be taken into account at all.

So that it all comes to this, that, if the widow predeceases, of course no sum is necessary for her at all, and, on the other hand, if the children predecease, then, of course, no sum is necessary for them either. No one can say how all this will turn out, and therefore I am of opinion that we must provide for each of these contingencies, and allow for the maximum. There may be apparent hardship in this, but it seems to me that the hardship is more apparent than real, because the heir of entail would arrange terms of sale with a purchaser, not on the footing that the whole sums which are now to be secured will ultimately become a charge on the estate, but by an actuarial calculation as to what the probable sum is that will come to be charged on the estate, and thus allow a settlement to take place at once, instead of postponing it till the petitioner's death.

Upon the whole matter I concur with your Lordship and the Lord Ordinary.

THE COURT adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

J. & F. ANDERSON, W.S.—TODD, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—HOPE, MANN, & KIRK, W.S.—Agents.

No. 14.

Nov. 12, 1886.

Earl of Glasgow.

ROBERT RICHARDSON AND ANOTHER (Horsburgh's Trustees), Pursuers (Respondents).—Gloag—Murray.

No. 15.

Nov. 12, 1886.

Horsburgh's Trustees v. Welch.

RALPH DALYELL WELCH, Defender (Reclaimer).—McKechnie—Kennedy.

Warrandice—Trust—Personal liability of trustee.—A person infeft as trustee in certain heritable subjects, after consenting to certain bonds being granted over them by his author, which were duly recorded, granted a bond and disposition in security for a new loan which he acknowledged to have received, and bound himself to repay "as trustee." In security of the personal obligation he disposed the subjects "as trustee," and the bond further contained this clause—"I grant warrandice."

In an action by the last bondholder upon the clause of warrandice against the representative of the trustee, held that the trustee was personally bound in warrandice from fact and deed, and was liable for loss arising from the prior bonds to which he was a consentor.

Question, whether he was not personally liable in absolute warrandice.

On 23d December 1872 the late Mr Charles Welch, afterwards Welch Tennant, granted a bond and disposition in security for £375 over the lands of Hallfields belonging to him, in favour of a Mr Brody who, in February 1876, assigned it to Mr Robert Richardson and another, the marriage-contract trustees of Mr and Mrs William Horsburgh.

The bond in question proceeded upon the narrative that, under a bond of relief and disposition, dated 30th December 1858, William Wright of Hallfields and others had disposed to Mr Welch, for the purposes therein mentioned, the lands and others therein described, in which the latter was afterwards duly infeft, and empowered him to borrow such sum or sums of money from time to time as might be necessary to enable him to execute the purposes of that deed, and to grant bonds for money so borrowed, "binding the said William Wright and others, their heirs and successors, and the estate thereby conveyed." The bond proceeded,—“Whereas it is necessary, in order to enable me to execute the purposes of said deed, that I should borrow the sum afternoted: Therefore I, as trustee foresaid, grant me to have instantly borrowed and received from Robert John Brody . . . the sum of £375 sterling, which sum I, as trustee foresaid, bind myself and my successors to repay . . . at Whitsunday 1874 . . . and the interest of the said principal sum at the rate of £5 per centum per annum . . . And in security of the personal obligation before written, I, as trustee foresaid, and empowered as aforesaid, dispose to and in favour of the said Robert John Brody,” the lands of Hallfields as there described. The bond further contained this clause,—“I grant warrandice.”

1st Division.
Lord Trayner.
B.

No. 15.

Nov. 12, 1886.
Horsbrugh's
Trustees v.
Welch.

Two prior bonds for £5000 and £1300 over Hallfields had been granted by Mr Wright in 1870, to which Mr Welch had been a consenting party. The creditors in the first bond having entered into possession of the subjects, Horsbrugh's trustees sued the executor and general disponee of Mr Welch for the amount contained in their bond, and interest thereon from Whitsunday 1884. They sought to enforce this personal liability on various grounds, all of which were dealt with by the Lord Ordinary, but it is only necessary here to refer to the single ground on which the Inner-House proceeded.

The pursuers founded upon the warrandice clause in the bond above quoted, and maintained that in respect of it Mr Welch's representative was personally liable for the amount of the bond.

The Lord Ordinary (Trayner), on 29th March 1886, found that the defender was liable to the pursuers in the sums sued for, quoad ultra continued the case, and granted leave to reclaim.*

* "NOTE.— . . . 7th and last of the grounds on which the pursuers ask decree. The bond now held by the pursuers contains the clause,—‘I grant warrandice,’ and in respect of that clause the pursuers maintain that the defender as Mr Welch's representative is personally liable for the amount of the bond, the property over which it was granted having been carried off by a prior bondholder. The facts upon this part of the case stand thus: On 14th May 1870, Mr Wright borrowed £5000 on the security of Hallfields, and in the bond and disposition in security granted for that loan the dispositive clause runs thus:—‘And in security of the several personal obligations before written, I, the said William Wright, with consent of Charles Welch, writer in Cupar, and I, the said Charles Welch, for all my right and interest in the premises, and we both dispense to and in favour of,’ &c. Mr Welch is no party to the personal obligations in that bond, or to the clause of warrandice, or to anything but the disposition, and that in the terms I have quoted. That bond was duly recorded, and (although not admitted by the pursuers) I hold it sufficiently proved, supported by all the probabilities of the case, that the pursuers were aware, when they took the assignation to the bond they hold, that the £5000 bond was a burden on the estate of Hallfields, preferable to theirs. I do not doubt that the pursuers, or their agents, saw the search of incumbrances over Hallfields, which disclosed the existence of the £5000 bond. The question thus arises—What is the effect of the warrandice granted by Mr Welch? The form of the clause, as used in the bond in question, is statutory, and has a statutory meaning (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 101, sec. 119). ‘The clause of warrandice shall be held to import absolute warrandice as regards the lands and the title-deeds thereof, and warrandice from fact and deed as regards the rents.’ On the mere words of the clause, therefore, as interpreted by statute, Mr Welch is bound in absolute warrandice as regards the lands. There is no doubt that the lands have been taken possession of by the holders of the £5000 bond, who are drawing the rents; and there is another bond for £1300, granted by Mr Wright on 18th July 1870, over Hallfields, to which Mr Welch was a consenter, in the same terms as he consented to the £5000 bond, which is still undischarged, and preferable to the pursuers' bond. It is not said by the defender that the estate of Hallfields will, when sold, yield a price sufficient to pay off all the heritable burdens, while the pursuers aver that it will not. At all events, in the meantime, the lands, so far as affording any security for principal, loan, or interest, have been carried off from the pursuers. In these circumstances, I am of opinion that there has been a breach of warrandice, for which the defender, as representative of Mr Charles Welch, is liable. He must either make good the lands as a security for the pursuers' £375, or pay the amount.

“It was urged by the defender, however, that, looking to the whole scope and tenor of the bond held by the pursuers,—that as it plainly was granted by Mr Welch as a trustee and for trust purposes, the clause of warrandice should be read and construed as if it had been expressed thus:—‘I, as trustee foresaid,

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The warrandice clause only warranted the title, and did not cover the subjects conveyed. It did not imply an obligation to purge prior incumbrances. There was that distinction between the present case and a case of sale. This was illustrated by the civil law. In the contract of sale under the civil law there was an obligation to purge prior incumbrances, but in the contracts of pignus and hypotheca there was no such obligation. If this was so under the civil law, it was presumably so also in the law of Scotland.¹ But assuming this was not so, it was only “as trustee” that Mr Welch bound himself in the warrandice clause; and these qualifying words must be imported into it. The clause did not stand alone, and the rest of the deed, the clause imposing the personal obligation, and the dispositive clause, must be looked to in construing it. A trustee’s warrandice was not absolute, but only from fact and deed.

No. 15.
Nov. 12, 1886.
Horsburgh’s
Trustees v.
Welch.

The respondents argued;—No distinction could be drawn between the effect of a clause of warrandice in an absolute disposition and in a bond and disposition in security.² It was said that the words “as trustee” must be read into the warrandice clause, with the result that the trust-estate only was bound in absolute warrandice, and that, so far as Mr Welch was personally concerned, the warrandice was only from fact and deed. Assuming this was so, Mr Welch had been a consenting party to grant warrandice,’—and that a trustee’s warrandice was not absolute, but only from fact and deed. It is not free from doubt whether the pursuers are bound to read the clause otherwise than as really expressed, or whether any meaning can be applied to that clause other than the statutory meaning. But the pursuers argued, that if this concession was made to the defender, the result was not affected. It remains still the fact that it is the deed of Mr Welch under which the lands have been carried off. That he was merely a consenter in the terms above given, I do not regard as material, for his consent was, I should think, necessary to the carrying out of the £5000 transaction. At that date Mr Welch was infeft in the lands in security of a right of relief, and also for certain trust purposes. His consent was necessary to the £5000 bond, in order that it might rank preferably to any right he had, and it is improbable that the lender of the £5000 would have taken a security postponed to Mr Welch’s rights. But Mr Welch consented to the £5000 being ranked preferably to the trust purposes, and the bond now in question was granted in fulfilment of trust purposes; and accordingly it must be held that Mr Welch by his deed had done something to lessen the security of those who lent money to the trust on the trust-estate. Mr Welch might easily have protected himself by excepting from the warrandice granted to the pursuers all the then existing burdens. But how does it appear that the pursuers’ cedent or the pursuers would have accepted a security or lent their money on these terms? Taking it, as I do, that the pursuers knew of the existence of the £5000 bond, they were still entitled to rely on the warrandice to this effect, that if the prior bond carried off the estate, the personal liability involved in the warrandice would then arise, so that even then they had some security for the repayment of their loan. I am of opinion, therefore, that upon this ground the pursuers must prevail. They must, however, if required, assign their bond to the defender, so that he may obtain payment out of Hallfields, should it turn out that the proceeds of that estate are sufficient to meet the whole burdens upon it. As this has not been offered on record, I have meantime only pronounced a finding that the defender is liable to make payment of the sums sued for without pronouncing decree therefor. . . .”

¹ Leith Heritages Co. v. Edinburgh and Leith Glass Co., June 7, 1876, 3 R. 789; Campbell v. Gordon, Feb. 21, 1840, 2 D. 639, 12 Scot. Jur. 360, affd. 1 Bell’s App. 428.

² Macalister v. Macalister’s Trustees, Feb. 28, 1866, 4 Macph. 495, 38 Scot. Jur. 231.

No. 15. the two previous loans for £5000 and £1300 granted over the estate; and the warrandice clause having created a personal contract between him and the respondents, he was liable for the consequences of his own acts.¹ The only appearance of authority against this result was the case of Gordon v. Campbell,² which was a very special case. The law would not be stretched further than it was in that case.

Nov. 12, 1886.
Horsbrugh's
Trustees v.
Welch.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Lord Ordinary has found that “the defender is liable to the pursuers in the sums sued for.” These sums amount to £375, which was advanced by the pursuers upon a bond and disposition in security over the estate of Hallfields, with interest thereon. I think the Lord Ordinary has come to a sound conclusion, and I am prepared to adopt his Lordship’s ground of judgment. Supposing the clause of warrandice were to be read as if it had expressed in so many words, “I grant warrandice as trustee, and as trustee only,”—meaning thereby that the lands were warranted against fact and deed—I should still have thought that the defender was liable, because, as Mr Gloag has said, warrandice from fact and deed infers a protection against eviction by reason of the granter’s own act or omission, past or future. In consenting to the execution of the previous bonds for £5000 and £1300, Mr Welch created securities, the holders of which had it in their power to evict the holder of the subsequent bond and disposition in security. I do not think a bond and disposition by Wright would have been effectual without Welch’s consent, but even if that were doubtful, no creditor would have advanced the two sums I have named without Mr Welch’s consent being given to the transaction, and accordingly Mr Welch, by his act and deed, did co-operate with Mr Wright in effecting the securities.

So far I agree with the Lord Ordinary, and I do not think it necessary to consider the larger question, whether the clause of warrandice is binding on Mr Welch personally,—that is, whether he undertook the warrandice obligation qua trustee only, or whether he was personally liable to make good the security. I have strong doubts whether he would escape personal liability upon that ground. But I merely wish to guard myself against any possibility of being supposed to have decided anything which conflicts with the application of the doctrine I have repeatedly had occasion to enunciate in regard to the personal liability of trustees.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND.—If the clause of warrandice in the present case had been expressly qualified by the words and “I as trustee foresaid grant warrandice,” I am not satisfied that it would necessarily have followed that there was no absolute warrandice on the part of Mr Welch. We know that in partnership questions trustees have been found personally liable although partners solely qua trustees; and in addition to the cases which occurred in connection with the Western and City of Glasgow Bank liquidations, there have been numerous cases in which it has been found that trustees undertaking obligations—prima facie in their trust capacity only—will thereby incur personal liability as, e.g., where trustees acting as such employ builders, contractors, or others to do work on the trust-estate. So, too, in cases of loan—unless when the obligation is expressly specially guarded, as in the case of Gordon v. Campbell (1 Bell's Appa. 428), a personal obligation will be created—and so also as regards obligations by acceptance of bills.

¹ Lumden v. Buchanan, June 22, 1865, 3 Macph. (H. of L.) 89.

² June 13, 1842, 1 Bell’s Appa. 428.

But upon the other ground the limited warrandice which it is admitted was undertaken plainly implies warrandice from fact and deed, not only as regards future acts and deeds, but also as regards the past. I do not doubt that the previous transactions to which Mr Welch was a consenting party amounted practically to a creation of prior and preferable claims against the subject of the security. So that on this ground I think the pursuers are entitled to succeed in the present question.

LORD ADAM concurred.

THE COURT adhered, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed further with the cause. On 19th November following the Lord Ordinary gave decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons, but with a declaration that on payment of the sums decerned for the pursuers should grant the defender an assignation of the bond.

MACANDREW, WRIGHT, ELLIS, & BLYTH, W.S.—J. B. DOUGLAS & MITCHELL, W.S.—Agents.

No. 15.

Nov. 12, 1886.
Horsburgh's
Trustees v.
Welch.

WILLIAM HARVIE, Petitioner.—Ure.

WILLIAM ROSS AND THOMAS ROSS, Respondents.—C. J. Guthrie—A. S. D. Thomson.

No. 16.

Nov. 13, 1886.
Harvie v. W.
and T. Ross.

Interdict—Procedure—Breach—Patent.—A, the holder of a patent, obtained interim interdict against B to prevent infringement. B did not object to the validity of the patent, but immediately thereafter assumed his son, C, as a partner with a view to manufacturing articles which A alleged were in infringement of his patent. A thereupon presented a petition and complaint against B and C for breach of interdict. B and C averred that the articles manufactured by them did not constitute an infringement, and further C challenged the validity of A's patent. Held (in conformity with Dudgeon v. Thomson and Donaldson, 3 R. 604 and 974, and 4 R. (H. L.) 88), (1) that it was competent to bring C into the process, though the interdict was not directed against him personally, and (2) that C was not entitled to a proof of his averments regarding the validity of the patent.

By deed of assignment, dated 26th December 1883, William Harvie acquired exclusive right to certain letters-patent dealing with improvements in apparatus and valves for regulating the supply of water to water-closets, &c.

The patent was originally the property of William Ross, brassfounder, Glasgow, but subsequently through successive assignations came into the possession of Harvie.

In April 1886, Harvie brought a suspension and interdict against William Ross to have him prevented from manufacturing certain articles which he alleged to be in infringement of his patent, and on 12th May interim interdict was granted by Lord Trayner, Ordinary, "in respect that the respondent has failed to find caution" (for profits) as appointed by a previous interlocutor.

On 18th October Harvie presented a petition and complaint against William Ross, and Thomas Ross, his son, in respect William Ross had continued to manufacture the articles alleged to be in infringement of the patent. The petition further stated ;—"He (William Ross) has also, for

1st DIVISION.
B.

No. 16.

Nov. 13, 1886.
Harvie v. W.
and T. Ross.

the purpose of evading the interdict now standing against him, assumed as a partner his son Thomas Ross, who is now actively engaged in pushing the sale of the said valves in Glasgow and elsewhere. The said Thomas Ross is well aware of the said interdict, and of the fact that the valves sold by him and his father are made and sold in infringement of the complainer's patents, and in breach of the said interdict. The said Thomas Ross has thus been and is knowingly and wilfully aiding and abetting the said William Ross in breaking said interdict. The manufacture and sale of valves and apparatus by the said William Ross and Thomas Ross is still continued in breach of said interdict, and to the great prejudice of the petitioner."

The petitioner prayed the Court to find that the two respondents had been guilty of contempt of Court and breach of interdict.

William and Thomas Ross lodged separate answers.

William Ross did not raise any question as to the validity of Harvie's patent, but alleged that the articles manufactured by his firm of William Ross & Sons did not constitute an infringement of the patent.

Thomas Ross admitted in articles 1 and 2 of his statement of facts that he was on 14th June 1886 taken into partnership with his father with a view to manufacturing the articles alleged to constitute an infringement of Harvie's patent, but denied that they constituted such an infringement. In articles 3 to 7 of his statement he went on to challenge the validity of Harvie's patent on several grounds, e.g., prior publication, prior use, &c.

He pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The valves and apparatus in question being manufactured by the firm of William Ross & Son, the petition ought to be dismissed so far as directed against this respondent. (3) No interdict ever having been obtained by the petitioner against this respondent, the petition and complaint ought to be refused so far as directed against him. (4) The petition and complaint ought to be refused in respect that the letters-patent founded on by the petitioner are invalid on certain specified grounds. (5) Assuming the letters-patent to be valid, the petition should be refused, because the respondent has not infringed the said letters-patent, or manufactured any articles which are interdicted under the said interim interdict.

Argued for the petitioner;—The proof to be allowed should be limited to proof as to whether the articles manufactured by William Ross & Son were in infringement of the patent, and Thomas Ross ought not to be allowed a proof of his averments against the validity of the patent. Such a plea afforded no answer to a petition for breach of interdict and contempt of Court. It was quite competent to try the question of infringement in a petition and complaint; there was nothing in the case of *Dudgeon v. Thomson*¹ to shew that the House of Lords thought that an objectionable or incompetent course. Further, it was competent to bring Thomas Ross into the process though no interdict had been granted against him. He admitted that he had been taken into partnership with his father simply to manufacture these articles, and that he was aware of the interdict having been granted against his father. That state of facts brought him directly under the rule which had been applied to the respondent Donaldson in the case of Dudgeon v. Thomson.

Argued for the respondents;—Proof ought at all events to be allowed to shew that the manufacture of these articles did not constitute an infringement. But further, as regarded the son, the petition ought to be dismissed; though he was admittedly in partnership with his father he was working for his own interest, and ought to be allowed to proceed until personally interdicted. He ought further to be allowed to attack the validity of the patent as, if it turned out that he was right in thinking that the patent was bad, that would affect materially the view to be taken of his conduct. No. 16.

¹ Dudgeon v. Thomson and Donaldson, March 17, 1876, 3 R. 604, and July 5, 1876, 3 R. 974, July 10, 1877, 4 R. (H. L.) 88.

Nov. 13, 1886.
Harvie v. W.
and T. Ross.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am of opinion in this case that the complainer is entitled to a proof of his averments, and that William Ross is entitled to a proof of his, and that Thomas Ross is entitled to a proof of his averments in articles 1 and 2 of his answers, but not of those in the remaining articles.

The first question raised is as to the competency of trying this question in the form of a petition and complaint for breach of interdict, and I cannot say that I have any doubt on that point. The question is really, no doubt, whether the patent has been infringed, but also there is the question whether by so infringing the patent the respondents have committed a breach of interdict. The facts on which the decision of both these questions rests are the same, viz., whether the patent has been infringed, and there seems to me to be nothing in the decision in the case of Dudgeon v. Thomson to give ground for supposing that the House of Lords thought that there was any objection to trying such a question by way of a petition and complaint for breach of interdict.

The House of Lords no doubt thought in that case that we had gone wrong, because, after the interdict was granted and before the petition and complaint for breach of interdict was presented, the patentee had lodged a note of disclaimer and alteration, and the effect of that was to bar him from objecting to an infringement of the patent as it originally stood. There is, however, nothing of that kind here.

Then the position of Thomas Ross here, as being a party acting in combination with his father, and as his partner, seems to me to be exactly the same as the position of Donaldson in the case of Dudgeon v. Thomson, for there Donaldson was assumed as a partner in exactly the same way as Thomas Ross was assumed as a partner here. The case of Dudgeon on that point is therefore precisely in point, and it is quite competent to bring Thomas Ross into this process though the interdict was not directed against him personally.

As regards William Ross, he does not raise any question as to the validity of the patent, and he could not do so, as he himself was once owner of the patent and assigned it to someone else, who in turn assigned it to the complainer. The son, however, does raise a question as to the validity by articles 3-7 of his averments, and the next question is, is he entitled to a proof of those articles? I apprehend he is not. The father was interdicted. He was not in a position to raise any question of the validity of the patent, and he cannot do so now, but the complaint against the son is not only that there has been an infringement of the patent, but that he has committed a breach of interdict by aiding and abetting his father in infringing. Now, I do not think that Thomas can be heard when he challenges the validity of the patent as an answer to that complaint, and therefore I think we should remit to the Lord Ordinary to take such a proof as I have proposed.

LORD MURE.—I concur in thinking that a proof should be allowed to the limited extent proposed by your Lordship. I have looked into the observations of the Lord Chancellor in the case of Dudgeon, and I find there nothing to lead

No. 16. me to suppose that the House of Lords thought that such a process as the present was an improper one to try the question we have raised here. As regards the question whether Thomas Ross can be brought into the process, I think the position of Donaldson in the case of Dudgeon is precisely in point. I therefore concur in the course proposed by your Lordship.

Nov. 18, 1886.
Harvie v. W.
and T. Ross.

LORD SHAND.—The simple question raised here is whether the respondent, having been interdicted from manufacturing a certain patented article, has in defiance of the order of the Court gone on manufacturing it. The sole issue that can be raised in that process is whether, assuming the patent to be valid, there has been an infringement of it. In a question with William Ross it is clear that is the only issue, but there is also the question as regards Thomas Ross, whether he is excluded from raising an objection to the validity of the patent. Now, he is not carrying out an independent manufacture of the article but he was assumed as a partner simply with a view to carrying out the manufacture of the articles which are alleged to constitute an infringement. If the complainer does not succeed in shewing that Thomas Ross knowingly assisted his father in infringing the patent then he will fail in his complaint, but if he does succeed then Thomas Ross cannot be entitled to shew as an answer to the complaint that the patent is invalid. But Thomas Ross has not even averred that he has been carrying on an independent manufacture, but admits that he is carrying on the business in conjunction with his father. If that is so, I cannot see how he can attack the patent on any of the usual grounds. The simple question therefore that must go to proof is, has there been an infringement of the patent, assuming it to be valid?

LORD ADAM.—As regards the father, William Ross, the only question is whether, assuming the patent to be valid, there has been an infringement of it. As regards the son Thomas, the only question is whether he has aided and abetted his father in infringing the patent in the knowledge that there was an interdict standing against such infringement. I therefore concur in the course proposed to be taken here.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords having heard counsel on the petition and complaint and answers, find the petitioner and William Ross entitled to a proof of their averments, and the respondent, Thomas Ross, to a proof of his averments in articles 1 and 2 of his statement of facts: Repel the 2d, 3d, and 4th pleas in law for the said Thomas Ross: Remit to Lord Kinnear, Ordinary, to try the cause before himself without a jury."

THOMSON, DICKSON, & SHAW, W.S.—J. STEWART GELLATLY, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 17. SCOTTISH RIGHTS OF WAY AND RECREATION SOCIETY, LIMITED, AND OTHERS, Petitioners.—Murray—W. C. Smith.

Nov. 16, 1886. DUNCAN MACPHERSON, Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Robertson—Asher—Cosens.
Scottish Rights of Way and Recreation Society, Limited, &c. v. Macpherson. Appeal to the House of Lords—Leave to Appeal.—Leave to appeal to the House of Lords against an interlocutor appointing a case to be tried before a Lord Ordinary without a jury refused.

2D DIVISION. THIS case was reported supra, p. 7. The pursuers presented a petition for leave to appeal to the House of Lords against the judgment in that case. They stated that "the petitioners are advised that, according to the inveterate practice of your Lordships' Court, sanctioned by the House

Lord Kinnear.
M.

of Lords, such cases are tried on issues by a Lord Ordinary and a jury. No. 17.
 The greatly increased cost and uncertainty of an inquiry by means of proof before a Lord Ordinary, subject to appeal on questions of fact to the Inner-House of the Court of Session and to the House of Lords, gives the peti- Nov. 16, 1886.
 tioners a material interest in the observance of the practice of your Lord- Scottish ships' Court; and as the petitioners the said society are charged with the Rights of Way public interest in this case, and in other similar cases, they deem it their and Recreation duty to obtain the judgment of the House of Lords upon the question of Society, procedure." Limited, &c. v.
 Macpherson.

After hearing counsel for the petitioners,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a novel application. The question we considered when the case originally came before us was whether the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary appointing the case to be tried upon issues by a jury should be adhered to, or whether it was more desirable that it should be tried without a jury before his Lordship. That was a question that certainly admitted of two opinions, and we took the opportunity of consulting our brethren upon it, with the result that we ordered the case to be tried without a jury.

I need not detail the reasons which led us to that result. In disposing of the case we did not lay down any rule that could be applied generally; the case was determined on its own circumstances merely. We are now asked to allow an appeal against that procedure judgment to the House of Lords. I am of opinion that there is no good ground for granting that motion.

LORD CRAIGHILL and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—If this had been a question whether cases of this kind should or should not be appropriated to jury trial, it would have been a very proper question for an appeal to the House of Lords. But it being admitted that this is a question for your Lordships' discretion, I am quite sure that the House of Lords would not interfere with that discretion, and therefore it would be no benefit to the pursuers, but the reverse, to allow the case to go there.

THE COURT refused the prayer of the petition.

ANDREW NEWLANDS, S.S.C.—TAIT & CRICHTON, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN GORDON, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Pearson—Shaw.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN METALINE COMPANY AND OTHERS, Defenders
 (Respondents).—D.-F. Mackintosh—Macfarlane.

WILLIAM BRUCE THOMPSON, Defender (Respondent).—C. S. Dickson.

Reparation—Judicial slander—Malice—Relevancy.—In an action for damages for judicial slander the pursuer must aver facts and circumstances from which the jury may reasonably infer malice.

Averments of facts and circumstances which were held relevant to support an issue for judicial slander.

Scott v. Turnbull (11 R. 1131) considered.

Reparation—Judicial slander—Partnership.—A company or a private partnership may be sued for damages for judicial slander, notwithstanding that malice must be proved against the defenders.

Reparation—Judicial slander.—Held (rev. judgment of Lord M'Laren) that an action of damages for judicial slander is relevant although the matter alleged to be libellous formed the whole subject-matter of the original action.

Process—Summons—Defenders—Partnership.—An action was brought against a descriptive firm and the individual partners thereof, "as such partners and as

No. 18.

Nov. 16, 1886.
 Gordon v.
 British and Foreign Meta-
 line Co. &c.

No. 18. individuals," concluding against the defenders, "jointly and severally," for a lump sum of £1000 in name of damages for judicial slander. The condescendence contained no averments of individual fault against any of the partners. Nov. 16, 1886. Gordon v. British and Foreign Metaline Co. & Co. Held (rev. judgment of Lord M'Laren) that the action was an action against the firm only.

2D DIVISION. Gordon v. Lord M'Laren. M. ON 18th May 1886 John Gordon junior, merchant, Dundee, raised an action of damages, for the wrongous use of arrestments and for judicial slander, against "The British and Foreign Metaline Company, manufacturers of metaline, carrying on business in Dundee, and having its principal office or place of business at No. 74 Commercial Street there, and William Bruce Thompson, engineer and shipbuilder there, William Stiven, accountant there, and David Stewart, iron merchant there, the individual partners of the said company, as such partners and as individuals," and concluding against the defenders, "jointly and severally," for decree for "the sum of £1000," with interest.

The pursuer averred,—(Cond. 2) "The pursuer was for twelve months, from 1st May 1878 to 30th April 1879, in the service of and interested in the profits of the said The British and Foreign Metaline Company, on the terms narrated in the company's minute of 19th April 1878, which is referred to, and during the period from about a year before the said engagement and three months after it, he was the travelling agent of the said company. Since leaving their service, the defenders, the partners of said company, have cherished the strongest feelings of ill-will towards him." (Cond. 3) " . . . The pursuer on 20th October 1885 obtained a judgment from the Second Division of the Court of Session for the sum of £350 in an action he had raised in the Sheriff Court of Perthshire, at Perth, against John Shields of Balhousie Castle, Perth. The defenders having immediately become aware of this, resolved to take that opportunity of gratifying their feelings of malice and ill-will towards pursuer, and their desire to injure him by preventing him obtaining payment of the sum thus decerned for, and by, if possible, ruining his character and credit by means of the expedients after mentioned. They communicated with Mr Shields, requesting him to decline payment of the sum decerned for, and, upon the day following the decree, they threatened the pursuer with an action against him for an account which they alleged he was due, and which had never been mooted between the parties since their accounts were squared and settled shortly after the pursuer leaving their service; and they further threatened that they would use arrestments in Mr Shields' hands, and so prevent the pursuer from obtaining the money due by him. The pursuer, through his agents, at once protested against the arrangement with Mr Shields, and against the threatened proceedings being carried out. The defenders, nevertheless, intimated their determination to proceed, although warned of the great damage which would be caused, while they stated that they would not have pressed such a claim 'but for the fortuitous concurrence of circumstances in Mr Gordon's favour.'" (Cond. 4) "Accordingly, on or about 4th November 1885, the defenders raised an action against the pursuer in the Sheriff Court of Forfarshire, at Dundee, concluding for payment of £125, 0s. 7d. sterling, with interest from the date of citation, which they alleged to be due in respect of an alleged account due to them by the pursuer between 13th January 1879 and 11th December 1880. They further caused arrestments, on or about the 4th day of November 1885, to be used on the dependence of the said Sheriff Court action against the present pursuer to the extent of '£140, less or more,' of the money in Mr Shields' hands due to the pursuer. Although the claim of the present defenders in the said Sheriff Court action was entirely unfounded, the present pursuer's agents, by letter, dated 27th November 1885, to the present defenders' agents, No. 18. offered to allow the sum of £140 to be held under the said arrestment to await the result of the said Sheriff Court action, if the present defenders would agree to restrict it to £140, so as to enable the present pursuer to get up the surplus of £210, but this the present defenders declined to do." Nov. 16, 1886.

 Gordon v.
 British and Foreign Meta-
 line Co. &c.
 (Cond. 5) " After sundry procedure in said action the present pursuer was, on 10th March 1886, assoilzied from the conclusions thereof, with expenses, by judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, which judgment was affirmed on 7th April following, when an appeal by the present defenders was dismissed, with additional expenses." (Cond. 6) "During the dependence of the last mentioned Sheriff Court action, the defenders, well knowing that they could not succeed therein, and with the view of again laying on arrestments in Mr Shields' hands in order to concuss the pursuer into paying them something under the foresaid action at their instance against him, on or about 18th December 1885 raised a second action against the present pursuer for £500 in name of damages, founding upon the grossly untrue allegations made by them as to the present pursuer having surreptitiously obtained the secret of their business, and having fraudulently made use of an alleged trade-mark, all as after referred to.
 On the dependence of this second action the defenders again used, on or about said 18th day of December, arrestments in the hands of the said John Shields to the extent of £500. This second action was entirely groundless, and was, by interlocutor of date 10th March 1886, dismissed by the Sheriff-substitute, with expenses to the present pursuer. The defenders appealed to the Sheriff-principal, who, by interlocutor of date 8th April 1886, adhered to the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, with additional expenses." (Cond. 7) "Neither of said actions was raised in bona fide, but both were initiated and prosecuted with the sole purpose of gratifying the malice and ill-will foresaid, and, if possible, of extorting money from the pursuer. The laying-on of the arrestments in both actions was also carried out solely from said motives, and with a view to injure the character, credit, and reputation of the pursuer. The said arrestments were so laid on and continued maliciously and without probable cause, and in spite of repeated warnings as to the great loss and inconvenience caused thereby; and further, without even the restriction already referred to, which would have amply protected their rights."
 (Cond. 8) "In consequence of the defenders' arrestments, and of their refusal to withdraw or restrict them, Mr Shields was under the necessity of raising, on 20th January 1886, an action of multiplepoinding in the Sheriff Court of Perth; and, after sundry procedure, he consigned the £350 to abide the settlement of the claims of the arresting creditors. After the dismissal of both the unfounded actions raised by the defenders, the pursuer made application to the Sheriff Court to get up the money consigned in the said action of multiplepoinding, but the defenders maliciously and unwarrantably instructed their agents in said action to prevent his getting up the consigned fund. In particular, the agent for the defenders, at the calling of the said action in the Sheriff Court at Perth on 4th May 1886, on the instructions of the defenders, stated to the Sheriff, notwithstanding the production of the extract decrees in favour of the pursuer dismissing the defenders' actions, 'that other creditors not called in the present action' (i.e., the multiplepoinding process) 'are prepared to lodge claims immediately.' In respect of this statement the Sheriff ordered all parties interested to lodge claims within seven days. In authorising said statement to be made the defenders acted maliciously, without probable cause, from vindictive feelings against the pursuer, and to prevent him getting possession of the consigned fund. It was only after considerable further

No. 18.
 Nov. 16, 1886.
 Gordon v.
 British and Foreign Meta-
 line Co. &c.

trouble that the pursuer was enabled to effect this." (Cond. 10) "In the second action in the Sheriff Court, which, as already averred, was raised solely with the object of extorting money from the pursuer, and of gratifying their malice and ill-will towards him, and of ruining his character, reputation, and credit, it was alleged by the present defenders in their condescendence that the present pursuer, Mr Gordon, 'unwarrantably pried into and obtained insight and information in regard to the secrets of their said invention and manufacture of metaline.' It was further alleged by defenders in said condescendence that 'after leaving their said employment, and in the years 1881, 1882, 1883, and 1884, or during a portion of all or some of these years, the defender fraudulently and illegally represented and held himself out to the public as a manufacturer of the pursuers' invention of metaline, and surreptitiously and illegally used and appropriated or imitated the secret of the pursuers' invention or manufacture of metaline, and also fraudulently and illegally used and appropriated or imitated the pursuers' said registered trade-mark "Metaline." The defenders in said condescendence further alleged as follows:—Amongst others to whom the defender during said years, or some of them, fraudulently and illegally represented himself as a manufacturer of the pursuers' said invention of metaline under the pursuers' said registered trade-mark "Metaline," and also as a seller of such metaline, were the following, viz.:—(Names given). 'The defender also, during said years or some of them, fraudulently and illegally got his name inserted in Slater's Directory for Scotland as a manufacturer and seller of the pursuers' said invention of metaline under their said registered trade-mark. He also fraudulently and illegally advertised himself in the London newspaper Engineering as a manufacturer and seller of the pursuers' said invention of metaline under their said registered trade-mark, "Metaline." The defenders further alleged in said condescendence that 'the pursuers by and through the defender's fraudulent and illegal representations as before mentioned, and of his fraudulent and illegal use and appropriation or imitation of their said registered trade mark, "Metaline," and advertising, &c., and unwarrantably infringing the pursuers' rights as before mentioned, sustained serious loss and damage.'" (Cond. 11) "Said allegations were grossly untrue. They are of and concerning the pursuer, and were made by the defenders falsely, calumniously, maliciously, and without probable cause."

The company and two of the individual defenders, Stiven and Stewart, in defence, pleaded;—(1) The averments of the pursuer are irrelevant, and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons. (2) The defenders being entitled to use said arrestments, and having done so on reasonable grounds, in good faith, and without malice, should be assoilzied, with expenses. (3) The allegations complained of being relevant and pertinent to the cause in which they were made, and the defenders having made them in bona fide belief that they were true, on reasonable grounds, and without malice, the defenders are entitled to decree of absolvitor, with expenses. (4) The pursuer having suffered no loss, injury, or damage, in respect either of the arrestments or the said allegations, the defenders should be assoilzied, with expenses.

The defender Thompson stated (what the pursuer on record denied) that he and Stiven had ceased to be partners of the company on 1st February 1886, and that while he was a partner he had taken no part in managing the company's business, and, besides pleas in the same terms as those of the other defenders, pleaded;—(4) The defender not being responsible for any of the proceedings complained of, he should be assoilzied, with expenses.

The following were the issues proposed by the pursuer, the heading of which was "Issues in the cause in which" Gordon is pursuer and the company and Thompson, Stiven, and Stewart, "the individual partners of the said company, as such and as individuals, are defenders":—

No. 18.

Nov. 16, 1886.
Gordon v.
British and Foreign Meta-
line Co. &c.

"(1) Whether, on or about the 4th day of November 1885, the defenders, or one or more of them, maliciously, and without probable cause, used, or caused to be used, against the pursuer, an arrestment in the hands of John Shields of Balhousie Castle, Perth, for the sum of £140, less or more, and caused the same to be continued until on or about the 18th day of May 1886, to the injury and damage of the pursuer. Damages laid at £250.

"(2) Whether, on or about the 18th day of December 1885, the defenders, or one or more of them, maliciously, and without probable cause, used, or caused to be used, against the pursuer, an arrestment in the hands of the said John Shields, for the sum of £500, and caused the same to be continued until on or about the 18th day of May 1886, to the injury and damage of the pursuer. Damages laid at £250.

"(3) It being admitted that the defenders raised an action of damages for £500 in the Sheriff Court of Forfarshire at Dundee at their instance against the pursuer on or about the 18th day of December 1885, and that a record was made up and completed in said action, and it being further admitted that the condescendence annexed to the petition in said Sheriff Court action contains the following passages:—"Then followed the averments in original action as set forth in cond. 10, beginning "After leaving their said employment."

"Whether the said statements, or part thereof, are of and concerning the pursuer, and are false and calumnious, and were maliciously inserted, or caused to be inserted, in the said condescendence, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer. Damages laid at £500."

The Lord Ordinary (M'Laren) disallowed the third issue, and approved of the first and second issues.*

* "OPINION.—The issues which I propose to allow, being the first and second of those given in by the pursuer, are intended to raise the question of the pursuer's right to damages for the illegal arrestment of his funds. They are in the usual form, and under them the pursuer must prove malice and want of probable cause as conditions of his claim to recover damages. The chief question regarding these issues is as to the insertion of the words 'or one or more of them.' The defenders object to these words on the ground that the action is instituted against them jointly and severally. They contend that under an action instituted in this form it would not be competent to obtain a decerniture against one or more of the defenders, but only against the whole body of partners collectively. They further object to the action altogether in so far as instituted against a mercantile firm or copartnery.

"I think that as the arrestments complained of were used by the company and its partners, the pursuer is within his rights in bringing the action against the parties who used the arrestments, designing them in the terms which the defenders used in laying on the arrestments, as descriptive of the character in which they claimed to attach the pursuer's property. I think, also, that the pursuer is entitled to insert the words 'or one or more of them' to meet the possible case of one or more of the defenders establishing that he or they did not authorise the use of the arrestments. The pursuer is not proposing to discharge any of the defenders, or to withdraw his action against any of them; and in these circumstances I think the distinction founded on the circumstance of the action being directed against the defenders 'jointly and severally' is too critical, and is not supported by the authorities referred to.

"The third issue (which I propose to disallow) is intended to raise the question of the pursuer's right to recover damages in respect of allegations

No. 18. The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The Lord Ordinary had rightly allowed the first and second issues. The first objection to these issues, and it was urged equally against the third issue, was that as in actions of damages for wrongous arrestment or for judicial slander the defence of privilege was open, such actions would not lie against public companies or private partnerships, seeing that the defence of privilege must be met by proving malice, and malice could not, it was said, be proved against a company or a partnership, which had no mind, no feelings, and consequently no power to act maliciously,—in other words, the plea of privilege in the case of a company amounted to a plea of absolute privilege. But it was conceded that where privilege was not pleadable, an action of damages for slander would lie against a company, and this concession was fatal to the defenders' argument, for malice was as much an element in non-privilege actions as in privilege actions, only in the former it was presumed; and there was no greater anomaly, if it was an

Nov. 16, 1886.
Gordon v.
British and Foreign Meta-
line Co. &c.

affecting his reputation made by the defenders in an action instituted against him in the Sheriff Court of Forfarshire.

"The representations made in that action were to the effect that the pursuer had infringed a patent, the property of the defenders, and had also improperly made use of information as to trade secrets which he acquired while in their employment. The claim in the Sheriff Court action was for damages in respect of these alleged wrongs, and there can be no doubt that the description of the alleged wrong was pertinent to the action. The action, however, was dismissed as irrelevant, because, as the Sheriff-substitute explains, it did not appear that there was any subsisting patent, and it was not explained what were the trade secrets which the defender (the present pursuer) had used or disclosed. The case intended to be made under the issue is that there was no real cause of action to justify the Sheriff Court proceedings, and that these proceedings were merely the vehicle of spiteful insinuations against the pursuer's honesty or integrity. However this may be, I am very unwilling to make a precedent for sending to trial an issue of judicial slander where the matter alleged to be libellous is really the whole subject-matter of the action. It is the privilege of any member of the community to submit his supposed claims and grievances to judicial decision, even where these are unfounded, or, it may be, purely imaginary. If the charges are investigated and disproved or dismissed as irrelevant, no injury is done to the reputation of anyone unless to the party whose statements are found to be absurd or untrue. There may be exceptions, but I have difficulty in figuring a case where a defender would be injured by charges from which he successfully defends himself in a court of law. I think also that it is for the public interest that litigants should not be deterred from discussing their claims and grievances in open Court through the apprehension that if unsuccessful an action of damages would lie against them.

"If the issue in question is allowed, it will be difficult to assign limits to such claims. Any person against whom an action of damages for negligence is unsuccessfully maintained may retaliate with an action of judicial slander on the ground that his capacity for the conduct of his business, or his character otherwise, is affected by imputations of inhumanity or want of care in matters affecting the safety of his men. I do not know any instance of an action of judicial slander being sent to trial, except where the slander was extrinsic to the subject or motive of the action. And there is nothing that I can see in the present case to warrant a departure from precedent in this respect. Any annoyance or discomfort which the pursuer may have experienced in consequence of the epithets applied to his conduct in the defenders' pleading is, in my view, no more than a part of the friction incident to public business, which everyone must submit to for the sake of general convenience. I do not enter into the question of the sufficiency of the averments of malice, for I rather incline to the opinion that no action will lie for injury arising from the mere fact of a claim of reparation being made unsuccessfully in a Court of law."

anomaly at all, in presuming a company to be malicious than in proving it to be so. It was said that an action on the ground of fraud would not lie against a company. But the contrary had been held,¹ and although there might be dicta in an opposite direction in *Addie*² and *Houldsworth's*³ cases, all that these cases decided was that a shareholder of a company could not sue for damages on the ground that the company had fraudulently induced him to take shares, and at the same time retain his shares. If he could not or would not rescind the contract to take shares, his only remedy was against the directors personally. Further, companies had frequently been sued for damages for slander.⁴ They acted through their agents or partners, and were responsible for what the agents or partners did in the line of their business. (2) The action was directed against the individual partners as well as against the company. Failure against one of the defenders did not involve failure against the others. In any case, if the company was liable all the partners were liable through it. There was nothing in the pursuer's averments to shew that Thompson was a sleeping partner. That might come out in evidence, and might be held to make a difference; but the issues should stand. (3) The Lord Ordinary was wrong in disallowing the third issue. (a) In the first place, the ground on which he had put his judgment on that branch of it was untenable. He had held that in no circumstances would an action for judicial slander lie where the matter alleged to be libellous formed the whole subject-matter of the original action; in other words, that persons in this country had the absolute privilege of making use of the forms of process to slander their neighbours, if only they took care to make the slanderous statement the subject-matter of the action. It was true that the Lord Ordinary seemed to think the decree of absolvitor in the original action a sufficient redress for any injury that the person slandered might have suffered, and of course if the jury were of opinion that there had been no injury, they would give no damages; but in few cases would a decree of absolvitor be an adequate compensation for having lain for months, it might be, under a painful and unfounded imputation. But (b) the defenders contended that the pursuer must at all events have more than a bare averment of malice—that he must set forth facts and circumstances from which malice was to be inferred. A bare averment of malice was, the defenders conceded, enough in the case of wrongous arrestments, but more, they maintained, was necessary to found an issue for judicial slander. Now, no doubt a rule to this effect had been laid down in Scott v. Turnbull,⁵ but when it was applied to individual cases it was not always easy to say what precisely the rule required. If, for example, the pursuer averred not merely that the slanders were malicious, but that they were false to the knowledge of the defenders at the time they put them on record, would that be a sufficient averment of facts and circumstances? or must the pursuer go on to specify the grounds he had for believing that the defenders knew the slanders to be false? If the latter, that would be to impose a heavy burden on the pursuer, by making him virtually set forth an epitome of

No. 18.

Nov. 16, 1886.
Gordon v.
British and Foreign Meta-
line Co. &c.

¹ Mackay v. Commercial Bank of New Brunswick, March 14, 1874, L. R. 5 P. C. App. 394.

² Addie v. Western Bank, May 20, 1867, 5 Macph. (H. L.) 80, L. R., 1 Sc. and Div. App. 145.

³ Houldsworth v. City of Glasgow Bank, March 12, 1880, 7 R. (H. L.) 53.

⁴ Abrath v. North-Eastern Railway Co., June 22, 1883, L. R., 11 Q. B. Div. 440; Whitfield v. South-Eastern Railway Co., April 29, 1858, 1 E. B. and E. 115, 27 L. J. Q. B. 229; Keith v. Outram, June 27, 1877, 4 R. 958.

⁵ Scott v. Turnbull, July 18, 1884, 11 R. 1131.

No. 18. his evidence; if the former, the protection of judicial proceedings, which it was apparently the object of the rule to secure, was as little promoted by a bare averment that the defender knew the slander to be false, as by a bare averment of malice, for the one might as easily be made at random as the other. But at all events the present record satisfied the rule in any reasonable sense of it. What the pursuer averred was shortly this, that the defenders had made use of the forms of legal process to gratify their ill-will towards the pursuer, by putting forward claims that had no foundation, and by doing all they could to prevent the pursuer getting payment of debts due to him. In particular, they had unwarrantably refused to restrict the arrestments, and had impeded the payment of the fund in medio in the multiplepinding. The evidence, when it came out, might indeed satisfy the jury that all this had been done without malice on the defenders' part, but there was enough of averment here to shew the sort of case which the pursuer proposed to make—enough to shew that he did not make a random averment of malice—and that was all that the rule of Scott v. Turnbull, reasonably read, required.

Nov. 16, 1886.
Gordon v.
British and Foreign Meta-
line Co. &c.

Argued for the defender Thompson;—(1) Malice was either a presumption of law—legal malice, or an inference from proved facts—actual malice.¹ The former might reasonably be imputed to a company or partnership; the latter could not—it was absurd to do so, as a company or partnership had no mind.² Consequently an action of damages for judicial slander or for wrongous arrestments would not lie against a company—privilege being pleadable in defence—unless, perhaps, in the improbable case of a company existing for the purpose of slandering and making illegal use of arrestments. So, conversely, a company or partnership having no feelings could not sue an action for slander—except trade slander. The fraud of its agents could not be imputed to a company,³ and malice was exactly analogous. In both cases, however, if the company had profited by the fraud or the malice, action would lie to the extent to which the company was lucratus. Here the company had taken no benefit. In the cases in which companies had actually been sued for damages, either there was no privilege,⁴ or there was no interest to take the plea, the partners being liable if the company was not.⁵ The present defender certainly had an interest, as he could be reached only through the company. The pursuer on record made no specific case against him as an individual. (2) If, then, the action was bad against the company, it was bad against all the defenders, as they were sued jointly for a lump sum.⁶ Even if the action was held relevant against the company, the words “or one or more of them” ought to be deleted from the issues. (3) The third issue ought to be disallowed on the ground stated by the Lord Ordinary. At all events, the principle on which the Lord Ordinary had proceeded—the high privilege which on grounds of public policy was ¹ Addison on Torts, 5th edit. p. 27.

² Stevens v. Midland Counties Railway Co., June 22, 1854, 10 Exch. 352, per Alderson B., at p. 356.

³ Addie v. Western Bank, May 20, 1867, 5 Macph. (H. L.) 80, L. R., 1 Sc. and Div. App. 145; Houldsworth v. City of Glasgow Bank, March 12, 1880, 7 R. (H. L.) 53.

⁴ Whitfield v. South-Eastern Railway Co., April 29, 1858, 1 E. B. and E. 115, 27 L. J. Q. B., 229.

⁵ Abrath v. North-Eastern Railway Co., June 22, 1883, L. R., 11 Q. B. Div. 440; Keith v. Outram, June 27, 1877, 4 R. 958.

⁶ Western Bank v. Bairds, March 20, 1862, 24 D. 859, 34 Scot. Jur. 435; Taylor v. Macdougall & Sons, July 15, 1885, 12 R. 1304.

accorded to judicial pleadings—made it incumbent on the pursuer to aver facts and circumstances from which malice would be inferred. This rule was by no means laid down for the first time in Scott v. Turnbull.¹ It was well recognised before.² The averments here did not satisfy the rule. They came simply to this, that the defenders had raised two actions against the pursuer; that they had used arrestments on the dependence; and that they had lost the actions. It was not said that the Sheriffs had found the actions to be utterly groundless. In point of fact in the first of them the plea of prescription was sustained, and the present pursuer's oath held negative of the reference. The second was dismissed as irrelevant, as the present defenders did not choose to disclose on record the nature of their trade secret. The refusal to restrict the arrestments used on the dependence of the first action was the only serious evidence of malice, but it was easily explainable otherwise, e.g., there were the expenses besides the actual debt sued for. A bare averment of malice was no doubt sufficient in the case of actions of damages for illegal arrestments, but malice relevantly averred for that purpose, i.e., for the first and second issues, could not be held as relevantly averred for the third. Whether a bare averment that the defenders knew the slanders to be false when they uttered them would be enough, it was unnecessary to inquire; the pursuer made no such averment here.

The other defenders, as having no interest, did not contest the first and second issues; on the third issue they maintained the same line of argument as the defender Thompson.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case the pursuer sues a company for damages on two grounds—the wrongous use of arrestments and judicial slander.

The Lord Ordinary has granted issues on the first of these grounds, but he has refused the proposed issue on the ground of judicial slander.

In regard to the first, and indeed in regard to both grounds, it is maintained, in the first place, that as the defenders are a trading company, malice and want of probable cause cannot be pleaded against them. What the company, through those who act for the company, say is, not that the company were not competent to sue an action or to use diligence, nor even that the company were not capable of using defamatory words and oppressive and illegal diligence, but that these acts and words were privileged, inasmuch as these were judicial proceedings, and that being a company, malice and want of probable cause cannot be alleged against them to avoid the privilege. It must thus be quite manifest that this is not the case of the allegation of an ordinary moral delinquency against a company. I may have my own opinion upon that general question. But this is a plea of privilege on the part of the alleged delinquent, who says that the ground on which privilege might in an ordinary case have been overcome cannot be pleaded because the delinquent is a company. I am of opinion that there is no ground whatever for such a contention. It may be quite true in one sense that the company cannot be guilty of moral wrong. It is said that a company has no animus. Nor has it. It has no will, it has no memory, it has no conscience. But notwithstanding all that, the supposed or imaginary

No. 18.

Nov. 16, 1886.
Gordon v.
British and Foreign Meta-
line Co. &c.

¹ Scott v. Turnbull, July 18, 1884, 11 R. 1131.

² Urquhart v. Grigor, Dec. 21, 1864, 3 Macph. 283, 37 Scot. Jur. 134; Mackintosh v. Weir, July 3, 1875, 2 R. 877; Craig v. Peebles, Feb. 16, 1876, 3 R. 441.

No. 18. persona which constitutes a company may contract obligations although it has no will, or memory, or conscience, and may be compelled to fulfil the obligations so undertaken. It is mere metaphysical subtlety to say that a company cannot be guilty of malice where the very nature of the proceeding in which the plea is taken necessarily implies that the persona has a power of action and a power of judgment. I therefore think that it is no answer to an action of damages for the wrongous use of arrestments, or for judicial slander, that it is directed against a company, and that privilege can only be pleaded by the company subject to the usual conditions.

Nov. 16, 1886.
Gordon v.
British and Foreign Meta-
line Co. &c.

The second branch of the action relates to certain statements, alleged to be defamatory, which were made in an action raised by the company against the present pursuer. It is said that these statements are irrelevant to found an action of damages, in respect that there is no specification by the pursuer of the circumstances from which malice is to be inferred. Now, at this point I should wish to say a few words on the case of Scott v. Turnbull, 11 R. 1131, and the general principle which that case involved. The objection here is, that the mere allegation of malice, without a specification of facts which imply malice and would lead the jury to come to the conclusion that it existed, is fatal to the action. Now, I entirely agree in the view that was taken in the case of Scott v. Turnbull. Malice is in the breast of the party accused, and it cannot be known to the outer world unless there has been some act that evinces malice, and from which the existence of the malice is to be deduced. Consequently when a man alleges malice against another in a privileged suit, he must have some reason from which he has inferred its existence, some reason not in his own mind merely, but deduced from the outward acts or words of the person against whom the allegation is made. All that the rule laid down in Scott v. Turnbull—it had been frequently laid down before—was, that the averment of malice should not be left on the bare allegation of its existence; that he should specify to some extent at least the outward acts, words, or circumstances which have led him to infer that the person acted maliciously. I think that is quite reasonable, because otherwise an allegation of malice may be a random suggestion for which the litigant alleging it has no grounds in fact. But I do not think this case falls under that category. On the contrary, without saying in the least that the facts set out on the record necessarily lead to the conclusion that the proceedings in question were malicious, I think they are at all events facts which a jury are entitled to deliberate upon, and decide whether they were in their view sufficient to infer malice.

Shortly stated, the facts which the pursuer avers are these: The pursuer was the agent of this company, engaged apparently in pressing the sale of a certain article said to be patented, although there are doubts whether the patent was good. The pursuer and the company parted, and the company, it is said, entered into negotiations with a debtor of the pursuer requesting him not to pay his debt, and they raised an action against the pursuer for £125, and arrested the sum in the hands of the debtor, which amounted to £350. The next thing we find averred is a proposal by the pursuer to allow so much of the money, £140, to lie in the hands of the debtor covered by arrestment if the arresting creditor would allow the rest to be uplifted, which proposal, it is said, the defenders declined. The case went on for the £125, and the company lost it, from which it appeared that there was no debt of £125 owing. Having lost that case, they raised a second case, in which they made a variety of assertions which are said in this action to be calumnious and defamatory, to the effect that the pursuer while their agent had fraudulently ascertained a trade secret that belonged to them, and had fraudulently disclosed it or traded on it. They lost that action also. These assertions are put in issue, and that they are defamatory admits of no question. The question is, whether there is sufficient allegation on this record to justify a statement that they were made maliciously and without probable cause? I do not think there is any doubt of that. It cannot be said that there is any want of specification. I think the specification is sufficient, and I think that if the jury are satisfied of the facts when they hear the evidence, there is enough to entitle them to infer malice. As far as this ground of objection is concerned, therefore, I think the issue ought to be allowed.

No. 18.
Nov. 16, 1886.
Gordon v.
British and Foreign Meta-
line Co. &c.

The Lord Ordinary has held that the issue on the second branch of the case ought not to be allowed, because these defamatory statements were in truth the groundwork of the whole action. I do not see that that is a sufficient reason for not granting an issue. On the contrary, it rather seems to me that more importance must be attached to these defamatory statements by the fact to which the Lord Ordinary refers than if they had been merely incidental to the action. The Lord Ordinary says the party should be satisfied with his absolvitor, but absolvitor is no redress for the injury which may be caused by such statements. I do not know of any precedent for making the distinction suggested by the Lord Ordinary, and I am therefore inclined to grant an issue on both grounds.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—The action brought before us by the present reclaiming note is at the instance of the reclaimer, Mr Gordon, against the British and Foreign Metaline Company and the individual partners, as such partners and as individuals, and the purpose of its institution is to recover damages—first, for the alleged wrongous use of arrestments; and secondly, for the judicial slander set out in the record. The conclusion is for a lump sum of £1000, and decree is sought against the defenders jointly and severally. The action is thus an action against the company. They are set forth as the wrongdoers and as the parties by whom reparation is to be rendered, and unless the liability of the company shall be established the pursuer must fail in his action. There is no case laid, either in the condescendence or in the conclusions, by which, if there is no liability upon the company, any liability can be brought home to the individual partners of the company, either as partners or as individuals.

The company does not object to the interlocutor reclaimed against, in so far as it approves of the first and second issues, but this part of the interlocutor is objected to by Mr Bruce Thompson, a partner of the company. He contends that these issues ought not to be allowed, inasmuch as there is no relevant case stated for the pursuer. The irrelevancy is said to consist in this, that special malice is alleged and must be proved, and that this cannot be established inasmuch as the defenders are a company. This, in my opinion, is an erroneous contention. The existence of malice is a fact, and there is no more incongruity in a proof of such a fact against a company than of any other fact which necessarily is an element of liability. If it can be proved against such a company that wrongous arrestments were used, proof that the act was done maliciously may be brought home to the company for anything that appears to the contrary, or can be

No. 18. imagined in the nature of the case. The difficulty of the proof is not the question. Its possibility and its competency are the only things now to be decided. Upon neither of these can reasonable doubt be entertained.

Nov. 16, 1886.
Gordon v.
British and Foreign Meta-
line Co. &c.

The company and Mr Thompson object to the third issue for the reasons explained by the Lord Ordinary, and also upon the ground that there is no relevant libelling of the malice imputed to the defenders. As to the former, my opinion is that the Lord Ordinary ought to have allowed the third as well as the two first issues. Judicial slander is a case of privilege, but not of immunity. If pleadings in an action are made the vehicle of slander, it is not the policy of the law to afford absolute protection. If malice is alleged there must be a trial, and if malice be established judgment for reparation must be pronounced.

The second objection ought also, I think, to be overruled. The case of Scott v. Turnbull, no doubt, raises a difficulty, for there is considerable similarity between the circumstances in the one case and those in the other, though these are not by any means identical. Nevertheless, were it not that every case in such a question is truly one of circumstances, I could hardly avoid the application of that decision on the present occasion. I am not, however, for carrying that precedent further than is necessary. Were we to do so we would practically be deciding that which it is for the jury to determine, and all that we can competently do is to judge whether, if the facts are as represented by the pursuer, the jury may reasonably come to the conclusion that the defenders were influenced by malice.

Such a case is, I think, presented on this record, and accordingly I agree with your Lordship in thinking that the third issue ought to be allowed. To that extent there should be an alteration of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

I may add that when we come to the wording of the issues it will be well to consider whether the words, "or one or other of them," ought not to be kept out of the first and second issues. The defenders, to whom liability for the wrong complained of is imputed, are the company, and the company only. The pursuer cannot recover unless company liability be proved. How that is to be done is not matter for present consideration; but it is plain that even if the individual partners are to be examined, and one or more of them are to prove that the arrestments were used by their orders, the evidence in this case will be immaterial unless the result be that the order given is proved to have been the order of the company. The name of the company, therefore, is all that ought to be introduced into the issue. The proposed addition is inconsistent with the nature of the case, and its insertion might lead to inconvenience or confusion, by which the simplicity of the trial would be prejudicially affected.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I agree in the opinions which your Lordships have expressed. This action is brought against the Metaline Company for the use of wrongous arrestments and for judicial slander. In defence the company were entitled to plead privilege. That plea, as a general rule, only throws upon the pursuer the onus of proving the malice which in other cases of slander would be assumed. But it is maintained by the defenders that the plea of privilege in the present instance has the effect, not merely of making the pursuer prove malice on the part of the defender, but of making all action against the company impossible. I cannot assent to such a result as that. The company, No. 18.

when accused of slandering the pursuer, may certainly plead privilege as a Nov. 16, 1886.
defence. But they may use that plea only so far as it would carry an in- Gordon v.
dividual defender, and not to the length of making the action against them British and impossible. Foreign Meta-
line Co. &c.

With respect to the ground on which the Lord Ordinary has disallowed the third issue, I think his Lordship has taken an erroneous view of the law. Where a party in raising an action makes statements which are relevant, even if they are defamatory of the defender's character, then that party is not liable in law for damages unless it can be shewn that he made these statements maliciously and without probable cause. It has been held that malice must be proved in regard to statements on record, even if these are not necessary to the subject-matter of the case, but are merely pertinent to it. But I have never understood that a party who has made a defamatory statement in a process has an absolute privilege to escape from the consequences. He has a privilege indeed in making his statement, but he is subject to any consequences that may result from his having made that statement, if in addition to having given utterance to the calumny he is proved to have made it maliciously and without probable cause.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

The issues were amended by altering the title to "issues in which," Gordon "is pursuer" and the company "are defenders," and the words "or one or more of them" were struck out from the first and second issues.

THE COURT then recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, approved of the issues as adjusted, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary.

REIND, LINDSAY, & WALLACE, W.S.—J. SMITH CLARK, S.S.C.—
BOYD, JAMIESON, & KELLY, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN CHARLES CUNINGHAME AND OTHERS (Glengarnock Iron Company), No. 19.
Petitioners.—Pearson—M^r Kechzie.

THE WALKINSHAW OIL COMPANY, LIMITED, Respondents (Reclaimers).— Nov. 17, 1886.
Balfour—W. Campbell. Cuninghame,
&c. v. Walkin-
shaw Oil Co.

Company—Winding-up—Creditors' petition—Disputed debt—Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 89), sec. 80.—In a petition for the compulsory winding-up of a limited company the petitioners alleged that the company was unable to pay its debts within the meaning of the 1st subsection of the 80th section of the Companies Act, 1862, two bills drawn by the petitioners and accepted by the company not having been paid when due. It appeared that the company had no other debts, and had large assets, and that there was a bona fide dispute between the parties relating to the sum contained in the bills in question, the respondents alleging that there was a large balance due to them.

The Court dismissed the petition on consignment being made by the respondents, and found the petitioners liable in expenses.

THIS was a petition under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1886, for a 1st Division. compulsory order to wind up the Walkinshaw Oil Company, Limited, B. presented by John Charles Cuninghame and others, the partners of the Glengarnock Iron Company. The petitioners claimed to be creditors of the respondents for £1836, 16s. 2d., the amount contained in two bills, both drawn by the petitioners upon, and accepted by, the respondents—one for £5250, which fell due on 17th July 1886, and the other for £5500,

No. 19. which fell due on 21st July 1886, less a sum of £8953, 3s. 10d., which was due by the petitioners to the respondents. Neither of these bills had been met when due.

Nov. 17, 1886.
Cunninghame,
&c. v. Walkin-
shaw Oil Co.

It was stated in the petition that the affairs of the respondents had lately become embarrassed, and that the company was unable to pay its debts in the sense of the 80th section of the Companies Act of 1862, the respondents having failed to pay the sums due by them, or to secure or to compound for the amount within the time fixed by subsection 1 of that section,* after the service of the statutory notice on 3d September 1886.

The respondents lodged answers, and produced evidence shewing that the petitioners were their only creditors, and that their works cost over £50,000, and were free of all burdens except liability for rent, which was not in arrear. The respondents were subtenants of the minerals in certain fields leased by the petitioners, and it was in connection with the valuation of certain plant which had been bought by the respondents from the petitioners that the debt alleged to be due to the petitioners had been incurred, the respondents alleging that after giving credit for the bills there was due to them a balance of £7600. They further stated,—“The respondents believe and aver that the petitioners took this course for the purpose of avoiding having to pay a fair price for the said plant of which they have taken possession as aforesaid, and with the object of either coercing the respondents to consent to a sale thereof at an inadequate price, or of throwing the respondents' company into liquidation, and so bringing about a forced realisation of their assets.”

It was admitted at the bar that a quantity of coal had been delivered by the respondents to the petitioners on 8th October, thereby reducing the alleged debt by £1200.

After counsel had been heard, on the suggestion of the Court the respondents agreed to find caution for £600.¹

The respondents then moved for expenses.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It appears to me that this was not a case in which the petitioners ought to have proceeded in the way in which they have done. There was, no doubt, a disputed debt, that is to say there was a dispute as to the amount owing by the one party to the other. The petitioners were in possession of two past due bills, which had been granted by the respondents, and they had it in their power to raise the question between them in the usual form, by giving a charge on the bills. If they had done so, the security to be found in the meantime, while the question was being tried, would have been arranged in the usual way in the Bill-Chamber, and arranged in an equitable manner. But

* Subsection 1 of section 80 of the Companies Act, 1862, is,—“A company under this Act shall be deemed to be unable to pay its debts (1) whenever a creditor, by assignment or otherwise, to whom the company is indebted, at law or in equity, in a sum exceeding fifty pounds then due, has served on the company, by leaving the same at their registered office, a demand under his hand requiring the company to pay the sum so due, and the company has, for the space of three weeks succeeding the service of such demand, neglected to pay such sum, or to secure or compound for the same to the reasonable satisfaction of the creditor.”

¹ Petitioners' Authorities.—In re Globe New Patent Iron and Steel Co., June 26, 1875, L. R., 20 Equity, 337; Buckley on the Companies Acts, p. 195.

Respondents' Authorities.—In re London and Paris Banking Corporation, Nov. 21, 1874, L. R., 19 Equity, 444; In re Cathdick Publishing and Bookselling Company, 1864, 33 L. J., Chanc. 325.

instead of taking that very obvious course the petitioners come here alleging against the respondents that they are insolvent and unable to pay their debts, and the presentation of that petition was preceded by a correspondence, of the tone of which I cannot at all approve,—a series of threatening letters, for the purpose, apparently, of forcing payment of the balance of a debt, which was said not to be due. I think, in these circumstances, the petitioners ought to be found liable in expenses.

No. 19.

Nov. 17, 1886.
Cunninghame,
&c. v. Walkin-
shaw Oil Co.

LORD MURK.—I am of the same opinion.

The open and proper course was to give a charge on the bills, and had that been done the question between the parties would have been settled in the usual way. I therefore agree with your Lordship in thinking that in the circumstances this was not a case for having recourse to the remedy of liquidation under the statute.

LORD SHAND.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and concur with your Lordship in thinking that this is a case in which the application for a liquidation was entirely unwarranted. There was only a debt as to which a bona fide doubt exists, and not only is there no evidence of insolvency, but there is evidence before us to shew that the company is possessed of property far beyond the amount of the debt in question, and also that there are no other creditors with debts due to them who desire or are in position to take steps for having the company placed in liquidation. In these circumstances, therefore, I agree in thinking that this petition ought never to have been presented, and that the petitioners ought to be found liable in expenses.

In regard to the statement of the company that a quantity of coal had been delivered by them to the petitioners on the 8th of October, thereby reducing the debt, I shall only say that even if this transfer had not been made, this was not a case for liquidation, but was a case for the use of diligence, and if a charge had been given and suspended all that the petitioners could have claimed would have been caution or consignment of a larger sum than £600, and from all we have seen of the case the company would have had no difficulty in providing such caution or consignment. It must be borne in mind in the case of individual debtors that imprisonment for debt is now abolished, and the remedy against them is by diligence to affect their property. The same diligence is competent against company debtors, whether a limited company or not, and the proper mode of proceeding for a past due bill, where the debt is open to dispute as here, is to use diligence, at least in the first instance, but parties in the petitioners' position cannot, in my opinion, successfully come here and apply for a remedy by way of liquidation.

LORD ADAM.—I concur.

THE COURT, in respect of the consignment by the respondents of the sum of £600, dismissed the petition, and found the petitioners liable in expenses.

J. & F. ANDERSON, W.S.—J. & J. GALLETLY, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 20. MRS ISABELLA M'DIARMID OR WEBSTER, Appellant (in Sheriff Court) (Respondent).—J. G. Smith—Shennan.

Nov. 17, 1886. WILLIAM COUPER TAIT (John Webster's Trustee), Respondent (in Sheriff Webster v. Court) (Appellant).—J. C. Thomson—Salvesen.
Webster's Trustee.

Contract—Pactum illicitum.—Marriage with deceased wife's sister—Bona fides.—A Scotsman went through a ceremony of marriage with the sister of his deceased wife in Norway, where such marriages are legal. They returned to Scotland, and cohabited together there for about twelve years. They then entered into an agreement to separate, the man to pay the woman an annuity of £52 a-year. Held that this agreement was not struck at as being ob turpem causam.
Hamilton v. De Gares, June 26, 1765, M. 9471, doubted.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
I.

ON 21st May 1869 Isabella M'Diarmid went through a form of marriage with John Webster (both being then domiciled in Scotland), in the British Consul's office in Christiania, Norway, to which country they had gone shortly before. This marriage was invalid according to the law of Scotland, Isabella M'Diarmid being the sister of Webster's deceased wife, but it was valid according to Norwegian law. The parties returned to Scotland and lived together there as man and wife until 14th August 1882, when they entered into a "minute of agreement of separation," which bore to be between Webster, of the first part, and "Mrs Isabella M'Diarmid or Webster, presently residing at Baillieston, wife of the said John Webster, of the second part," and proceeding on the narrative that the parties had agreed to live separate and apart from each other, inter alia, provided that the first party should pay to the second party for her separate clothing, maintenance, and support, the sum of £1 sterling per week, during the joint lives of the parties, and so long as they continued to live separately.

On 24th March 1886 the estates of Webster (who had in the meantime married another woman) were sequestrated by the Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

Mrs M'Diarmid or Webster lodged a claim to be ranked for £500 as the capitalised value of her annuity under the above agreement.

On 9th August the trustee rejected the claim.

Mrs M'Diarmid or Webster appealed to the Sheriff, and on 6th October the Sheriff-substitute (Erskine Murray) recalled the deliverance of the trustee, and ordained the respondent to rank the appellant in terms of her claim, finding neither party entitled to expenses.*

* "NOTE.— . . . Now, while it is true that, legally, appellant is not the bankrupt's wife, it is clear that there was an obligation on him to make such a provision. This is not like an agreement void ob turpem causam, in consequence of its being granted as the price of prostitution. Even in a case of ordinary irregular connection, it has been held that 'a compensation for injury already sustained' is not voidable.—See Bell's Principles, sec. 37, and Bell's Illustrations, i. pp. 59 to 61, and specially the case of Gibson v. Dickie, therein referred to on p. 61. In Gibson's case, the man bound himself to pay back to the woman certain sums she had given him, besides paying so much a-year for her life; in the present case there is no obligation to repay the monies received through advances on her property, but only the aliment, so, even had this been a case of irregular connection, it would have been the stronger of the two. But, when there is taken into consideration the fact that, after having gone through the form of a marriage with appellant, and lived thirteen years with her, and resided in her house, and got advances of money thereon, Webster left her for the purpose of marrying another, the wrong done her was so great and manifest, that Webster's obligation to make compensation was clear, and the compensation under the agreement was no way excessive. The fact that appellant is called

The trustee appealed, and argued ;—In general it was true that a distinction was admitted between bonds granted as the price of prostitution, and bonds granted subsequent to the termination of the connection, as a provision due in honour and justice for injury done. But Mr Bell, in so stating the law, excepted from the favour shewn to bonds of the latter description bonds granted where the woman knew the granter to be married at the time of their connection,¹ which was in principle exactly the present case, and this exception was borne out by the case of Hamilton,² on which Mr Bell founded. There was nothing in the report of that case to shew that the connection continued after the granting of the bond, and it was a case decided on a consideration of two previous cases, which were opposed to each other.³ A later case⁴ was in the same direction, though the English authorities were adverse. The bona fides supposed to arise here from the circumstance of a marriage ceremony having been gone through in Norway would equally apply to a marriage between an uncle and a niece, which was valid in some countries.

Argued for the claimant ;—Bell's exception was not sound law. It was not borne out by *Hamilton's*² case, in which the connection continued, for anything that appeared in the report at all events, after the granting of the bond. Even if Hamilton's case was to be read otherwise, the extreme lengths to which the older cases had carried the law on this head had been reprobated,⁵ and the bona fides of the claimant here, which could hardly be doubted, looking to the whole circumstances of the case, took it out of the rule which Hamilton's case had been supposed to establish.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am quite satisfied with the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute in this case, and the reasons he gives for it. I think the bond was given to the woman to enable her to live comfortably on the termination and in respect of the termination of the connection. It is a sad case, and I am not disposed to say more about it. I think the case of Gibson v. Dickie, referred to by the Sheriff-substitute, fully justifies his judgment.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion, and I think it right to say that in the circumstances it was most proper for the man to make a settlement on this woman, and that he would have acted almost brutally if he had not. Going to Norway, marrying her there, living with her for thirteen years as his wife, and then throwing her over in order to marry another woman—I cannot conceive a case in which honour and justice, to use the words of Professor Bell, would make it more absolutely proper for him to make some provision for the woman he had so treated. I confess I am surprised at the opposition, surprised that the creditors should have raised any objection to make this payment, and surprised that the trustee should have insisted in the objection, unless abso-his wife in the agreement does not alter the case. It is argued for the trustee that to sustain the claim would be to put her in a better position than a legal wife of the bankrupt. But this is not so, for the claim of a legal wife would not come to an end by bankruptcy, whereas a simple claim of compensation for an injury does."

¹ Bell's Comm. i. 299.

² Hamilton v. De Gares, June 26, 1765, M. 9471.

³ Durham v. Blackwood, July 20, 1622, M. 9469 ; Ross v. Robertson, June 23, 1642, M. 9470.

⁴ Hamilton v. Main, June 3, 1823, 2 S. 356.

⁵ Young v. Johnson and Wright, May 19, 1870, 7 R. 760, per Lord Deas, p. 764.

No. 20.

Nov. 17, 1886.
Webster v.
Webster's Trustee.

lutely obliged to do so by the creditors. I quite recognise the rule of law of which the cases to which we were referred are illustrations—but no more than illustrations—and some of them, I agree with Lord Deas, go beyond illustrations of the rule, and apply it with a sternness which would be rejected now. The rule of law is that if the consideration for granting a document of debt be one of turpitude, the document will not sustain action. If such a cause appears on the face of the bond—if, for instance, the narrative of the bond bears that the woman agrees to live with the man as his mistress—the law will not enforce that; and if from evidence otherwise the Court are satisfied that the cause of granting was of this nature, neither will they enforce that. But where the object of the bond is to enable the man to make reparation to the woman with whom he has been living, and to put her beyond the reach of destitution for the future—when it is not to act as a retaining fee, so to speak, to insure the continuance of the connection, but as a provision on its termination—such a case is not within the rule of law at all. The case of Hamilton was a peculiar one. I do not say whether I should follow it in circumstances resembling those which it presented. It is possible that I should not. There a man who was living in adultery with a married woman granted a bond of annuity in her favour, and a similar bond in favour of her daughter or niece who was living with her. I suppose the man continued to live with the woman till his death—the rubric implies that, and there is nothing in the report to the contrary—but after his death an action was brought by the woman and her daughter or niece for payment of their annuities, and the Court found that no action lay on the bond granted to the mother, but sustained action on that granted to the daughter. That case, therefore, is quite different from the present—as I have said I rather think I would not follow it if circumstances exactly similar occurred again—but the present case I am prepared to decide on this simple consideration, that the man was in honour and justice bound to provide for the woman, and would have acted with the greatest cruelty if he had neglected to do so.

LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think the circumstances of the case bring it within the rule of the case of Hamilton. I have no doubt of the bona fides of the wife. I can find no allegation in the record to the contrary, and I think she may well have thought the ceremony in Norway sufficient. With respect to the case of Hamilton, I can only say, in the words of an eminent authority, that it deserves to be reconsidered.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal, and affirmed the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, with expenses.

JAMES SKINNER, S.S.C.—GILL & PRINGLE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 21.

ALEXANDER MACLEOD AND ANOTHER, Pursuers (Respondents).—

D.-F. Mackintosh—T. R. Clark.

Nov. 17, 1886.
Macleod, &c. v.
Davidson, &c.

JAMES M. DAVIDSON AND OTHERS, Defenders (Appellants).—Scott—Rhind.

Interdict—Trespass—Right not insisted in.—In a petition by a proprietor of lands for interdict to prevent persons pasturing their cattle on his lands, the defenders, inter alia, pleaded on record that they had a right so to pasture their cattle. Subsequently, by minute, they stated that they never claimed, and did not now claim, such a right, but they made no motion to have the pleas asserting a right deleted from the record, although asked by the Court whether they proposed to do so. Held that the petitioner was entitled to interdict.

No. 21.

Nov. 17, 1886.
Macleod, &c. v.
Davidson, &c.

MAJOR FRASER of Kilmuir, in Skye, was proprietor of a field or park called Staffin Park, part of that estate, of about forty acres in extent, and bounded on the north and east by the sea, on the west by the Kilmartin River, and on the south by the township of Garrafada, also belonging to Major Fraser. This park originally formed part of the Garrafada township grazings, but had, some twelve years before the proceedings to be narrated, been detached from the grazings, the rents of the crofts being proportionately reduced. For the year ending Whitsunday 1885 it was let to Alexander Macleod.

Sheriff of Inverness, Elgin,
and Nairn.
I.

On the night of 22d April 1884 about sixty yards of the wall separating Staffin Park from the Garrafada crofts were knocked down. In order to prevent the crofters' cattle getting into the park, Major Fraser's manager, on 14th May, contracted with a crofter named Lamont to have the wall rebuilt, but next day Lamont, alleging intimidation, declined to go on with the contract. Nothing further was done in the way of rebuilding the wall, but on 5th July Major Fraser had a meeting with the crofters regarding the continued trespassing of their cattle. Having obtained the consent of the tenant, Major Fraser offered the crofters a passage through the park in order to water their cattle at the Kilmartin River, but on condition that they were not to allow the cattle to graze or loiter in the park. They accepted this offer.

In December 1884 Macleod, the tenant of Staffin Park, with consent of Major Fraser, and Major Fraser for his own interest, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Portree against the Rev. James M. Davidson, minister of the parish, as tenant of two of the crofts, and John Mackinnon and others, the tenants of the remaining crofts, for interdict against the defenders encroaching on the park, and placing their cattle thereon, and for removal of the defenders' cattle already there.

The pursuers alleged that the defenders, or those acting on their instructions, had knocked down the wall, and that they had since allowed their cattle to graze on the park notwithstanding repeated requests by the pursuers to remove them.

The defenders denied that they had had anything to do with knocking down the wall, and they pleaded that interdict ought not to be granted, in respect (1) that in any event they had not violated the condition on which the permission of 5th July had been given, and (2) that they had a right to graze their cattle on Staffin Park—the Rev. Mr Davidson (for whom separate defences were lodged), on the ground that such a right formed part of his benefice, and the other defenders on the ground stated in the following plea:—“(4) The permission given by the pursuer William Fraser to the defenders, his tenants, to water their cattle in, and to use the path through the field in question, being a part of the defenders' rights as his tenants, and being a restoration of part of their original rights as tenants of Garrafada, the pursuers are not now entitled to deprive them thereof by summary action of interdict.”

A proof was allowed. The facts already narrated, in so far as they had been in dispute, were proved. There was no evidence connecting any of the defenders with the breaking down of the wall. The defenders' evidence was almost entirely directed to shewing that the cattle had never, at least with their knowledge or authority, been permitted to graze on Staffin Park, and, in particular, that the condition on which Major Fraser's permission of passage over the park was granted had been strictly adhered to.

By two interlocutors, dated 28th and 30th December 1885, the Sheriff-

No. 21. substitute (Speirs) assolized the Rev. Mr Davidson, and granted interdict against the remaining defenders.

Nov. 17, 1886. Mackinnon and others appealed to the Sheriff (Ivory), who, on 23d Macleod, &c. v. Davidson, &c. February 1886, recalled his Substitute's interlocutors, and granted interdict against all the defenders.

The defenders appealed. Their argument was directed to shew that they had made use of Staffin Park simply as a passage for their cattle, and they lodged a minute setting forth "that they never claimed, and did not now claim, any right of grazing their cattle on the park in question, called Staffin Park, or of entering upon the said park, except in virtue of and for the purposes specified in the permission granted by the pursuer Major Fraser on 5th July 1884, and that they will use due care to prevent their cattle grazing or encroaching on the park in question"; but they made no motion to have the pleas asserting a right struck out of the record, although asked by the Court whether they proposed to do so.

The respondents were not called on.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a case of some importance in more aspects than one. It appears that Major Fraser is proprietor of a strip of ground which runs along a river in Skye called the Kilmartin River, and that there are certain grazings on which the tenants of Garrafada have the right of putting their cattle, on the other side of the wall or fence which bounds Major Fraser's ground. A question arose as to the right of the Garrafada tenants to water their cattle at the river, and in order to do so, to pass over the strip of ground belonging to Major Fraser. One night the wall which separated this strip of ground from that in the possession of the tenants was pulled down violently and illegally, it is not known by whom—we have no evidence bringing it home to anyone—but in the morning sixty yards of it, I think, were found levelled with the ground. In consequence of the encroachments on his ground which followed, a meeting and conversation between Major Fraser and the Garrafada tenants took place, in which he admitted that it was not unreasonable that the tenants should have access to the stream for their cattle, and should be allowed to drive the cattle over his ground for that purpose, but he stipulated that in return for this privilege they should take care that their cattle did not trespass elsewhere on his ground. He also wished to have the wall built up again, and contracted with a man named Lamont to have that done. Certain influences, which have not been specifically explained to us, but which we can easily enough understand, were brought to bear, with the result that the wall was not built up, and is not built up yet, leaving Major Fraser's ground still open to the incursions of the cattle. In consequence this action has been brought against the Rev. Mr Davidson, the minister of the parish, who is one of those who claim a right to graze their cattle on this piece of ground, and against a number of crofters who make a similar claim. The actual rioters by whom the wall was pulled down have not been discovered, nor is it proved that any of those who are called as defenders in this action were individually participant in the matter, but I think that the persons who are called in this process lay claim to rights which are wholly inconsistent with the rights of the proprietors of the ground. It appears to me that if these pleas remain on record that is quite a sufficient ground for granting interdict. It is everyday practice that a threatened charge may be suspended or a threatened encroachment prevented by means of an interdict. There is no better ground for granting interdict than that an encroachment has been threatened, and there can be no doubt that an encroachment has been threatened on the part of the minister and the other defenders here. The Sheriff-substitute has assolized Mr Davidson, but the Sheriff has directed interdict against him as well as against the other defenders. I think that the Sheriff's judgment must be supported. Mr Davidson's contention is quite clear. He says that the park in question formed part of the land on which he and his predecessors as ministers of Stenscholl were entitled to exercise the right of grazing, and that he had been illegally excluded from these lands. The other defenders say that the permission given by Major Fraser was merely a restoration of a right which they formerly possessed. We are now told that these pleas are all a phantom, but they were threats of encroachment, and that is enough to justify interdict. Without going into the evidence in the case, I think we ought to sustain the judgment of the Sheriff.

No. 21.

Nov. 17, 1886.
Macleod, &c. v.
Davidson, &c.

LORD YOUNG.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and I only wish to say this, that I agree with your Lordship that the rights which are asserted by the defenders on record, and the pleas which were put there, and are standing there, now being admittedly unfounded, the rule of law is that the complainer is entitled to interdict. That rule is not an absolute rule, for the respondent may be able to shew that interdict is not necessary,—that is to say, although the complainer may be entitled to have the respondent restrained from doing the things of which he complains, yet the whole circumstances of the case may be such, in the opinion of the Court, that the end in view may be obtained with more propriety otherwise than by granting an interdict. Here I think that it is the right of the complainer to have his legal rights in this strip of ground vindicated by means of the remedy of an interdict, for so far as I have been able to discover there are no circumstances in the case sufficient to take it out of the general rule of law.

LORD CRAIGHILL and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute of 28th and 30th December 1885, and the interlocutor of the Sheriff of 23d February last: Find that the pursuer Major William Fraser is proprietor, and the pursuer Alexander Macleod is tenant of the field or park described in the prayer of the petition, and that the defenders assert right to graze their cattle on the said field, and to lead them through it to water in the Kilmartin River: Find that the rights so asserted are unfounded: Therefore repel the defences; interdict, prohibit and restrain the defenders in terms of the prayer of the petition." Then followed a decree ordaining the defenders to remove such cattle as were already on the park, and a finding of expenses.

SKENE, EDWARDS, & BILTON, W.S.—WILLIAM OFFICER, S.S.C.—Agents.

JOHN SMITH, Pursuer (Respondent).—Jameson—Younger.
MRS ANN RIDDELL, Defender (Appellant).—J. A. Reid.

No. 22.

Nov. 18, 1886.
Smith v.
Riddell.

Contract—Family arrangement—Lease—Failure of consideration from supervening circumstances.—By written assignation Smith, an old man of eighty-two, the yearly tenant of a farm, on the narrative that from age he was unable to attend properly to business, agreed with Riddell, the husband of one of his nieces, "that during the remainder of my life the said James Riddell shall maintain and support me at bed, board, and lodging suitable to my station,

No. 22. and along with the said James Riddell and his family, to which I shall be considered to belong, and that whether I or the said James Riddell or both of us remain as tenant" of the farm or remove to another. In consideration Smith assigned and made over to Riddell "the lease and right of occupancy of the said farm, together with the whole stocking, crop, and other effects thereon, surrogating and substituting the said James Riddell in my full right and place of the premises, with full power to him to take and receive full possession of the said whole stocking, crop, and other effects as his own absolute property." Riddell signed the deed as consenting to and adopting it, and shortly thereafter, with his wife and family, went to reside in the farmhouse with Smith, and began to manage the farm; but before he had done so for six months, and before he had been accepted as tenant by the landlord, he died. His widow, as his executrix, claimed the stock and cropping. Held that as in consequence of Riddell's death his part of the agreement was incapable of fulfilment, his widow was not entitled to the stock and cropping, which remained the property of Smith.

2D DIVISION.
 Sheriff of Aberdeen,
 Kincardine,
 and Banff.
 I.

ON 22d November 1884 John Smith, an old man of eighty-two, who had held the farm of Bogmill of Balquhain, in Aberdeenshire, under a lease for nineteen years, which expired at Whitsunday 1883, and had thereafter continued to possess as yearly tenant, granted the following assignation in favour of James Riddell, the husband of one of his nieces, viz.:—"I, John Smith, tenant from Whitsunday 1884 to Whitsunday 1885 of the farm of Bogmill, . . . considering that in consequence of my old age I am unable to attend properly and efficiently to the said farm or business generally, and that in consequence I desire to be relieved of the obligations upon me as tenant foresaid, and of all business matters, and that James Riddell, at present residing at Woodside, Wester Fintray, the husband of my niece, should succeed to me as tenant of said farm, and have transferred to him the stocking therein, to which the said James Riddell has agreed on the terms and conditions after mentioned, viz.:—That during the remainder of my life the said James Riddell shall maintain and support me at bed, board, and lodging suitable to my station, and along with the said James Riddell and his family, to which I shall be considered to belong, and that whether I or the said James Riddell or both of us remain as tenant of the said possession at Bogmill or remove to another possession. Therefore, in consideration of the premises, I hereby assign, convey, and make over to the said James Riddell the lease and right of occupancy of the said farm of Bogmill, together with the whole stocking, crop, and other effects thereon, surrogating and substituting the said James Riddell in my full right and place of the premises, with full power to him to take and receive full possession of the said whole stocking, crop, and other effects as his own absolute property. And I, the said James Riddell, subscribe this assignation as consenting to and adopting the same and the foresaid conditions under which it is granted. And we both consent to the registration hereof for preservation. In witness whereof," &c.

Shortly thereafter Riddell, with his wife and family, came to reside with Smith at Bogmill, and Riddell conducted the management of the farm until July 1885—a period of not quite six months—when he died, without having been accepted as tenant by the landlord. Smith then gave up the farm. Mrs Riddell, as executrix of her late husband, claimed the stock and cropping in virtue of the above assignation, and advertised a dispenishing sale. Smith brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen to have her interdicted from proceeding with the sale.

The foregoing facts were not disputed.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—There being a strong delectus personæ between the parties to the agreement, and the defender's author having failed in the performance of his part, the defender cannot fulfil the obligations incumbent on her author, and parties should now be restored. No. 22.

Nov. 18, 1886.
Smith v.
Riddell.

The defender, who stated that she was willing to aliment the pursuer, pleaded;—The assignation being for onerous causes, and having been completed by possession, cannot now be resiled from.

On 7th June 1886 the Sheriff-substitute (Dove Wilson) declared an interim interdict formerly granted to be perpetual, and appointed the consigned price of the subjects, which had been sold by order of the Court, to be paid to the pursuer, with expenses.*

On appeal the Sheriff (Guthrie Smith) affirmed the judgment.†

The defender appealed.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The Sheriffs are both of opinion that this agreement cannot be, and ought not to be, enforced according to its letter, on the ground, apparently, that supervening events, totally unforeseen, have substantially prevented the consideration on account of which it was granted from being fulfilled, with the result that this old man cannot receive the only counterpart for which he agreed to give up his property. I am inclined to agree in that view. It is an unusual kind of case—a family arrangement, by which, in consideration

* "NOTE.— . . . Whatever difficulties might have arisen had the deceased not died till after he had been received as tenant by the landlord, and after the assignation and delivery of the stocking to him had been thus completed, it seems to me that his death while delivery was incomplete put an end to the agreement. At that time if the pursuer had refused to go on and complete the deceased's entry, or if the landlord had refused to accept him, or if anything whatever had then occurred to prevent the pursuer from giving complete implement, the deceased might have refused to go on. In the same way it seems to me that the defender's inability to give implement of the agreement puts an end to it. The obligation on the defender's side was not that she or somebody whom she might select was to board the pursuer and manage his farm for him. It was an obligation that the deceased was to do so, and to substitute for the deceased a person with whom the pursuer might have no comfort, and in whom he might have no confidence, would not be just. An unforeseen circumstance has put an end to the possibility of carrying out this agreement, before delivery under it was complete, and as the defender can no longer offer the consideration, she seems to me no longer entitled to demand the completion. It seems to me that it cannot well be questioned that, so long as the pursuer was tenant of his farm, and resided on it, he could not be held to have given complete delivery of it or of its stocking to any other party."

† "NOTE.—I think that this case has been rightly decided by the Sheriff-substitute. The respondent, an old man of over eighty years of age, wished James Riddell to come and manage his farm for him, and succeed him in the tenancy—an arrangement to which the landlord apparently had no objection, being willing to 'grant a new lease in which Riddell would be recognised as tenant or joint tenant' (defender's stat. 6). But before this could be carried out, Riddell died, and now neither the respondent nor the landlord will have anything to do with the widow. It is quite clear, in these circumstances, that she has no title to enforce the contract to the effect of demanding delivery of the stocking and other effects which were to have been given to Riddell when the new lease had been arranged in consideration of the respondent being allowed to live in family with him when he was managing the farm. The whole arrangement has proved abortive. The property had never passed out of the respondent's possession. The contract was as purely a personal contract as could be—for it was Riddell, and not his wife, that he had in view when he entered into it, and it would not be fulfilled by his being offered a home somewhere else."

No. 22. of his living in family with and being supported by the husband of his niece, the old man was to give up all interest in the farm and title to the lease. Before it came into operation the niece's husband, who was to undertake the obligation of the lease, died, and now the old man says that he never meant to enter into any arrangement unless he could get Riddell, his niece's husband, to come and live with him, and consequently that through Riddell's death the whole arrangement has been subverted. I am of opinion that this is the reasonable view. I think it would be against reason and against conscience that this agreement should be enforced against this old man when the only consideration for which he undertook it has become impossible of fulfilment.

Nov. 18, 1886.
Smith v.
Riddell.

LORD YOUNG, LORD CRAIGHILL, and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

J. D. MACAULAY, S.S.C.—R. C. GRAY, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 23. THE SCOTTISH MORTGAGE AND LAND INVESTMENT COMPANY OF NEW MEXICO, Appellants.—Balfour—Murray—G. R. Gillespie.
Nov. 19, 1886. THE COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE.—Lord-Adv. Macdonald—Sol.-Gen. Robertson—A. J. Young.
Scottish Mortgage and Land Investment Co. of New Mexico v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue.
Revenue—Property and Income-Tax Act, 1842, 5 and 6 Vict. c. 35, sec. 100, schedule D, Fourth Case—Interest received from foreign investments.—A Scottish company which had invested funds in America, instead of bringing home the interest, invested it in America, but deducted an equivalent amount from capital raised in this country for transmission to America for investment. The amount so deducted was divided as income among the shareholders. Held that the interest was to be regarded as interest received in this country, and was therefore liable to assessment for income-tax under the fourth case of schedule D of the Income-Tax Act, 1842.*

A Scottish company which carried on the business of borrowing money in this country and lending it on American securities, having been charged with income-tax on interest received from American investments under the fourth case of schedule D, objected to the assessment on the ground that the company, as a trading company, could only be assessed upon its profits under the first case of schedule D. Held that the assessment under the fourth case was competent.

1ST DIVISION. M. THE SCOTTISH MORTGAGE AND LAND INVESTMENT COMPANY OF NEW MEXICO, LIMITED, incorporated under the Companies Acts, was formed in 1882 principally for the purpose of borrowing money in this country on debentures at a low rate of interest, and lending it out in the United States of America, together with the paid-up capital, at a high rate of interest, on the security of land in that country.

The company had its head office in Glasgow, with a managing board of six directors, there being also an advising board of directors in the United States, with a manager there. A duplicate of the books of the agencies in America was kept at the office of the company in Glasgow, and the American transactions were recorded therein from monthly advices received from the manager and its agents there.

The company was assessed in the sum of £129, 7s. under the fourth case of schedule D of the Income-Tax Act,* charged upon a sum of £5174, as the company's profits for the year ending 31st December 1884.

* The rule contained in the fourth case, schedule D, section 100, of 5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35, is,—“Fourth case.—The duty to be charged in respect of interest arising from securities in Ireland, or in the British Plantations in America,

The company appealed, and a case was accordingly stated by the Commissioners, which set forth,—

"12. The sum of £5174, on which duty is charged, . . . embraces the following sources of profit, viz. :—

No. 23.
Nov. 19, 1886.
Scottish Mortgage and Land Investment Co. of New Mexico v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

"Interest of money lent by the company on the security of property in the United States of America, earned or accrued and brought into account in the year ended 31st December 1884, . £6926 5 2
"Transfer fees received, 2 12 6

£6928 17 8

"Expenses of management in America, £1193 5 10

"Do. do. at home, . 562 0 7

1755 6 5

"Amount assessed, £5173 11 3"

"The interest paid or due to debenture-holders during the year amounted to £3094, 18s. 1d., and this sum is not deducted in computing the amount for assessment.

"13. The income on which the assessment was charged was applied as follows :—

"Interest on debentures paid and accrued to 31st December 1884, £3094 18 1

"Dividend of 7 per cent to the shareholders, 700 0 0

"Extinction of the debit balance of the year 1883, 499 10 7

"Reduction of preliminary expenses, 508 5 5

"Carried forward, 370 17 2

£5173 11 3"

"8. The interest received by the company's agents in America was periodically brought into account in the books of the company kept at the head office in Glasgow. Out of the funds raised by the company in this country there was retained a sum equivalent to the interest realised from the American securities after defraying the working expenses in America, and no interest from foreign securities was received in Great Britain during the period above mentioned."

"15. It was contended on the part of the company that the company was of the nature of a banking and trading concern, and that the assessment should be made in terms of case first, section 100, of 5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35; * . . . or alternatively, that if the assessment fell to be made under the fourth case, that no assessment fell to be made, in respect that or in any other of Her Majesty's dominions out of Great Britain, and foreign securities, except such annuities, dividends, and shares as are directed to be charged under schedule C of this Act.

"The duty to be charged in respect thereof shall be computed on a sum not less than the full amount of the sums (so far as the same can be computed) which have been or will be received in Great Britain in the current year, without any deduction or abatement."

* The first case, schedule D, is,— "First case.—Duties to be charged in respect of any trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern in the nature of trade, not contained in any other schedule of this Act."

Rules.

"First. The duty to be charged in respect thereof shall be computed on a sum not less than the full amount of the balance of the profits or gains of such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern, upon a fair and just average of three years," &c.

No. 23. no interest arising from foreign securities had been received in this country during the year of assessment, all such interest accruing to the company having been retained and invested abroad.

Nov. 19, 1886.
Scottish Mortgage and Land Investment Co. of New Mexico v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

"16. The Surveyor of Taxes maintained that the profits were of the nature described or comprised in the third clause, schedule D, section 2, of 16 and 17 Vict. cap. 34, and that the assessment fell to be imposed on the actual amounts which have been or will be received in the United Kingdom in the year of assessment, according to the rule contained in the fourth case, section 100, of 5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35.

"17. That although the interest may not have been sent home in forma specifica during the year, yet there was brought into account in the books of the company at Glasgow a sum equivalent to the amount of the interest on the American securities, which sum was retained out of the monies raised in this country, and the sum so retained was applied to the payment of the interest on the money borrowed by the company, to the payment of a dividend to the shareholders, and in payment of the expenses of management in this country."

"19. The Commissioners found (1) that the profits of the company were of the nature described in the 3d clause, schedule D, sec. 2, of 16 and 17 Vict. cap. 34; (2) that the assessment fell to be imposed on the full amount of the sums which had been received in the United Kingdom in the year of assessment, and that according to the rule in the fourth case, sec. 100, of 5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35, duty was chargeable on the profits of the company which had been brought into account in their books at Glasgow, in so far as such profits had been applied to the payment of interest, dividends, debit balance, and preliminary expenses, in respect that, by being so brought into account and applied, they must be held to have been received in this country in exchange for an equivalent sum raised in this country and invested abroad, but not upon the profits which had been carried forward, even although such profits had been brought into account in the books of the company at Glasgow, in respect that they had not yet been actually dealt with and applied as money received in this country."

"When this appeal was previously before the Commissioners, their attention was not directed to the fact that a portion of the profits in respect of which duty was charged had been carried forward, and they now desire to amend the decision then given by them by relieving from assessment the amount of such profits, viz., £370, 17s. 2d."

The appellants argued;—(1) Schedule D of the Income-Tax Act was applicable to the case of profit and gain only. Nothing was subject to taxation which was not profit or gain. It was impossible to say in the present case whether there was profit or gain until the accounts of the whole transactions carried on by the company were complete. The interest upon which the assessment had been made had not yet been received in Great Britain, and had accordingly not entered their balance-sheet. Until it did so it was impossible to regard it as profit. (2) The sums proposed to be assessed did not literally come within the terms of the fourth case under the statute, because they were not received in Great Britain. It was said that the operation disclosed in the case, and which was carried through in the company's books, was equivalent to "receipt." But, as matter of fact, the money remained in America, and was invested there. It was settled law that a member of a firm carrying on business abroad, but having an agency at home, need not return his whole profits, but only what he brought home.¹

¹ Sully v. The Attorney-General, May 11, 1860, 29 L. J., Exch. 464; Attorney-General v. Alexander, Nov. 20, 1874, L. R., 10 Exch. 20; cf. also Casens Sulphur Co. v. Calcutta Jute Mills Co., 1876, L. R., 1 Exch. Div. 428.

The respondents' argument sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Judges. No. 23.

At advising,—

Nov. 19, 1886.
Scottish Mortgage and Land Investment Co. of New Mexico & Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

LOED PRESIDENT.—The question in this case is whether the duty has been properly charged as falling within the fourth case of schedule D of the Income-Tax Act of the 5th and 6th of Victoria, or whether it ought not to have been charged according to the rules applying to the first case under schedule D. The first case is that of "duties to be charged in respect of any trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern, in the nature of trade, not contained in any other schedule of this Act," and under that case duties are to be charged upon a sum equal to the full amount of the balance of profits or gains of the trade, upon a fair and just average of three years ending upon such day of the year immediately preceding the year of assessment on which the accounts of the trade shall have been usually made up. Under the fourth case the duties are charged "in respect of interest arising from securities in Ireland or in the British plantations in America, or in any other of Her Majesty's dominions out of Great Britain, and foreign securities," except such annuities, dividends, and shares as are directed to be charged under schedule C of the Act. In this case the duty is to be charged upon a sum not less than the full amount of the sum so far as the same can be computed, which has been or will be received in Great Britain in the current year, without any deduction or abatement.

Now, the present company is undoubtedly a trading company, and I do not doubt that the duty might have been charged in this case as under the first case in schedule D; but that is not the question. The question is whether it may be lawfully charged under the fourth case. One can quite understand that in particular circumstances the duty may be chargeable either under the one or the other. The income in respect of which the duty is to be charged may fall under more than one description in the statute, and in that case it would, of course, be in the option of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to take the case that was most favourable to themselves. It appears to me that although this might have been charged as a duty upon the balance of profits and gains under the first case, it is equally chargeable as the interest accruing upon foreign securities under the fourth case.

The duty is charged on a sum of £5174, and that sum is computed from the accounts of the company for the year ending the 31st of December 1884, presented to the annual meeting of shareholders on the 7th of April 1885, and it embraces the following sources of profit,—“Interest of money lent by the company on the security of property in the United States of America, earned or accrued or brought into account in the year ended 31st December 1884, £6926”; then there is a slight addition for transfer fees, and there is a deduction of the expenses of management in America, £1193, 5s. 10d., which seems to be quite right, because that cannot have been received in this country as part of the income derived from the foreign securities. But there are also deducted the expenses of management at home. Upon what principle that deduction is made I do not know, but as the Inland Revenue have chosen to make it, of course the other party will have the benefit of it. Then the 13th article sets out,—“The income on which the assessment is charged was applied as follows, as appears from the company's printed report and accounts for the year ending 31st December 1884, interest on debentures paid and accrued to 31st December 1884,”

No. 23.

Nov. 19, 1886.
 Scottish Mortgage and Land Investment
 Co. of New Mexico v.
 Comptroller-
 General of Inland Revenue.

—that is interest paid upon debentures held in this country, in which the company are debtors,—“dividend of 7 per cent to the shareholders, extinction of the debit balance of the year 1883, reduction of preliminary expenses,” and “balance carried forward.” Now, it will be observed that these items are all of them properly chargeable against income, and not against capital. Of course it is needless to say that interest upon debentures payable by the company is a charge upon income, and so is the dividend eminently a charge upon income, and the other items are in the same position. That shews that the company were dealing with this as proper income, which they disposed of in this country, and paid away in this country. But the peculiarity of the case arises from an explanation given in the 8th article of the case, which states that “The interest received by the company’s agents in America was periodically brought into account in the books of the company kept at the head office in Glasgow. Out of the funds raised by the company in this country there was retained a sum equivalent to the interest or gain realised from the American securities after defraying the working expenses in America, and out of this sum was paid all the working expenses in Great Britain, the interest to debenture-holders and depositors, and a dividend at the rate of 7 per cent to the shareholders for the year 1884.”

In these circumstances the company contend that this sum of £5173 cannot be charged with duty as interest arising from securities in foreign countries, because the rule for charging the duty under the fourth case provides that it is to be charged on a sum not less than the full amount of the sums which have been or will be received in Great Britain in the current year; and they say that the state of the fact, as mentioned in the 8th article of the case, shews that this interest was not received in Great Britain. Now, in one sense of the word that may be true. That is to say, the interest received by the company’s agents in America has not been in forma specifica sent to this country. The money received by the agents in America remains in their hands, and it remains in their hands for investment there. But then an equivalent for the amount of that interest is retained by the managers in this country out of money borrowed by them on debentures for the purpose of being sent out to America and invested upon foreign securities there. So that the one sum is just set against the other in the books of the company here, and it is for the Court to determine whether that species facti does not sufficiently satisfy the words of the rule under case fourth, that the interest upon the foreign securities has been received in this country.

I have already adverted to the way in which a sum equivalent to the interest received in America has been disposed of in this country. It has been disposed of as income. In point of fact, it was received in the shape of capital, because it is part of the proceeds of debentures granted by the company in this country, for which they have received capital sums in exchange. But if in the process of book-keeping it was not converted into income, then the payments made out of that money were altogether illegal, because these sums mentioned in article 13 of the case are sums which could not be paid out of capital,—I mean the interest upon debentures, and a dividend of 7 per cent to the shareholders. If the dividend to the shareholders had been paid out of capital, that would have been altogether illegal, and so also with the interest paid on debentures in this country, and all the other items embraced in the 13th article of the case.

So that according to the way in which this company keeps its books, it has really converted a sum which was received in this country as capital into an equivalent for the interest upon the foreign securities, and it represents in their books interests upon these foreign securities. Now, in these circumstances, it appears to me quite impossible for the company to maintain that they have received that interest. They have received it in this most proper sense of the term, that it enters their books in this country as such interest, and is paid away as such. I am therefore of opinion that the duty is rightly charged under the fourth case, and that the deliverance of the Commissioners ought to be affirmed.

No. 23.

Nov. 19, 1886.
Scottish Mortgage and Land Investment Co. of New Mexico v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

LORD MURK.—I am of the same opinion. The sums in question, though received in America, were brought into account here as interest by the company. That is clear upon the admission in the case; and having regard to the articles which your Lordship has referred to, I think the moneys were disposed of in such a way as to shew that the interest was in substance brought into account in this country, and so received and dealt with as interest. Instead of having the interest sent home they used funds which they had in hand here that were sufficient to pay the interest and dividend, as shewn in article 13 of the case. There might have been something in the state of the exchanges which rendered it inconvenient to send the money to this country at the time; and the money in this country which they had in hand was therefore applied to pay dividends and interest. In these circumstances I think the bringing it into account in that way makes it money substantially received by them here in the sense of the fourth head of section 100 of the statute. I think that is clear, and the question thus raised appears to me to be very much the same kind of question as one of those which were so anxiously argued in the case of the City of Glasgow Bank and Liquidator v. Mackinnon, Feb. 3, 1882, 9 R. 535, where it was held that money so dealt with by the City of Glasgow Bank was not to be held as a payment out of capital, but when carried to a profit and loss account was a proper payment of interest, although the interest itself was never sent over to this country.

LORD SHAND.—The alternative contentions of the parties maintained at the bar seem to be these,—on the one hand it is maintained on the part of the Crown that as this company sends a large amount of money, year by year, to America, for the purpose of being placed in foreign securities, which yield a larger amount of interest than they can get here, a practice of that kind falls directly under the fourth case mentioned in the statute, which expressly provides that in regard to foreign securities the duty to be charged in respect thereof shall be computed on a sum not less than the full amount of the sums which have been or will be received in Great Britain in the current year, without any deduction or abatement. On the other hand, it is contended for the company that in their case that rule of the statute should not be followed, but that their balance-sheet for the year should be looked at, and the difference which they bring out as profit in that balance-sheet should be taken as the subject of assessment.

I presume the company making that contention have satisfied themselves that if the income-tax were charged in that way a large advantage would accrue to them. That point seems to depend upon this,—whether they would be entitled, even in that view, in striking their balance for the year, to deduct in a return for income-tax interest upon borrowed capital. The company has a large number of shareholders, and it provides to a certain extent its own capital. But in addition, it borrows a large amount of capital on debenture; and if in striking profits it is proper to deduct interest upon borrowed capital, then undoubtedly they

No. 23. would have the advantage which they claim. We have not been called upon to consider that question, and I express no opinion upon it, but I observe that one of the rules under the first case in the statute is, that in estimating the balance of profits and gains chargeable under schedule D upon assessing the duty thereof, no sum shall be set against, or allowed, or deducted from, or allowed to be set against or deducted from such profits and gains on account of any sum employed, or intended to be employed, as capital in any such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern, nor on account of any capital withdrawn from such adventure or concern. If, on the one hand, the interest upon this borrowed capital is a proper deduction in the case of a trading company, no doubt this company would get the benefit. If, on the other hand, it is not lawful to make such a deduction under the words I have read, it appears to me that the company would get no advantage from it.

Nov. 19, 1886.
Scottish Mortgage and Land Investment Co. of New Mexico v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

But assuming that it would be an advantage to them to be assessed under the first case, I entirely agree with your Lordship that they cannot successfully maintain under the statute that the first is the only case on which it would be open to the commissioners to assess them. The fourth case expressly in explicit terms includes the case of individuals and of companies sending money abroad to be placed upon foreign securities, and provides expressly that the sums received upon such securities shall be subject to assessment. It is true, as your Lordship has observed, that it might be within the power of the Crown to have charged it otherwise if for their advantage. But it is worthy of notice that the first case is headed by these words, "Duties to be charged in respect of any trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern in the nature of trade not contained in any other schedule of this Act." This particular kind of security does appear to me to be contained in case four of the same schedule of the Act, and I concur with your Lordship in holding that the Crown is entitled to assess under that case which in their opinion will produce the largest sum. As to the effect of the words in the statute "interest received in this country," I have no doubt. As your Lordship has pointed out, if it is not in substance received in this country, they would have no right to treat it as profit and divide it. It is treated as profit, it is divided, and therefore it must be taken to be received in this country. But I think it is quite plain that it is so received, because in article 8 of the case the parties tell us that in place of bringing this money home in forma specifica, the company retain it and divide it, instead of sending it out to America for investment. The other course would be that the company should send out so much money to America and get exactly the same sum sent home, having to send a remittance out and get a remittance back, with no possible meaning, and probably as Lord Mure has observed, with a considerable loss in exchange by the transaction. To avoid that they refrain from sending out money which otherwise they would send out to America, and as matter of account they treat that money which was obtained in America as having been sent home. I cannot doubt that within the meaning of the statute the money was so treated as being received in this country from investments abroad, and therefore I am of opinion with your Lordships that that argument on the part of this company also fails.

LORD ADAM.—I concur.

THE COURT affirmed the determination of the Commissioners.

MACKENZIE, INNES, & LOGAN, W.S.—SOLICITOR OF INLAND REVENUE—Agents.

EDWARD SWEENEY, Pursuer (Appellant).—Rhind—Orr.
ROBERT A. M'GILVRAY, Defender (Respondent).—Pearson—Younger.

No. 24.

Nov. 23, 1886.

Reparation—Negligence—Master and Servant—Employers Liability Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. cap. 42).—During the execution of a contract for laying concrete in the premises of a tramway company, the foreman of the contractor had been in the habit of giving orders to the labourers employed under him to come ten minutes before their ordinary work hours each morning to remove from the sheds certain tram-cars which obstructed their work, but which it was the duty of the company to have removed daily.

In an action of damages raised by one of the labourers, who had been injured in assisting to remove the cars, against the contractor, on the ground that the accident had been caused by the fault of his foreman, the defender alleged and adduced evidence to the effect that the removal of the cars did not fall within his contract, and that the employment of his men in this work by the foreman was without his knowledge, and was not authorised by him, and pleaded that he was not responsible.

Held that the foreman's orders for removal of the cars, being in furtherance of the contract work, were orders which the labourers were bound to obey, and that the defender was responsible under the Employers Liability Act for the negligence of his foreman; dis. Lord Craighill, on the grounds that in removing the cars the labourer was not working in the contractor's employment, and that the order to remove the cars was not within the scope of the foreman's authority.

ROBERT A. M'GILVRAY, plasterer, Glasgow, was, in April 1886, under 2^d Division. contract with the Glasgow Tramway and Omnibus Company to lay concrete on certain parts of their premises at Maryhill. In order to enable the men to proceed with their work it was necessary to remove every morning the tramway-cars which were on the rails in a shed on the premises. The cars ought to have been removed by the tramway company before seven o'clock in the morning, which was the hour for M'Gilvray's workmen commencing work. In consequence of the tramway company's servants habitually neglecting to do so, it was the habit of John Gillies, the contractor's foreman or gaffer employed at the job, with the labourers under him, to attend each morning before seven to remove the cars. Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
I.

Edward Sweeney, one of the labourers, having been injured while so engaged, raised an action of damages in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire against M'Gilvray for payment of £200, or for payment of £165, 15s., or such sum as should be found due to him under the Employers Liability Act, 1880.

The pursuer averred that, on the morning of 20th April, there were four or five cars on the rails in the shed, and that, as the materials for making the concrete were on one side of the rails and the mixing machine on the other, the defender's foreman, John Gillies, ordered the pursuer and others to push the cars out of the shed, and that, while the pursuer was engaged in pushing one of the cars, he was injured by Gillies pushing another car against him from behind, and that "the accident was caused through the fault or negligence of the defender or of his foreman, the said John Gillies, for whom he is responsible."

The defender averred:—"On the date in question the defender's foreman, Gillies, who is ordinarily engaged in manual labour, in order to prepare for beginning work at seven o'clock A.M., began moving some of the tramway-cars out of the shed. Gillies gave no orders to pursuer or anyone else to assist him, but the pursuer and another man named M'Mahon, among others, voluntarily began to help Gillies to push out the cars. Gillies was pushing out the last car at a slow pace, when the car in front,

No. 24.

Nov. 23, 1886.
Sweeney v.
M'Gilvray.

which was pushed by pursuer and M'Mahon, suddenly struck on a stone or some other obstacle, and Gillies' car coming up from behind struck the pursuer, and injured him slightly. As Gillies was behind the car he was pushing it was impossible for him to see pursuer, but the pursuer and M'Mahon could easily have seen the car coming up behind them had they been exercising proper care, and could have stepped out of the way, or called to Gillies to stop the car. Pursuer materially contributed to said accident by his own negligence in not so doing. Pursuer was not ordered to push out the cars, nor was it his duty to do so, nor was he under the orders of Gillies, or bound to obey him."

The pursuer pleaded ;—(1) The pursuer having suffered loss, injury, and damage through the fault or negligence of the defender, or of those for whom he is responsible, is entitled to reparation therefor. (2) Or otherwise, the pursuer having been injured, while in the employment of the defender as a workman, through the fault or negligence of the defender, or of those for whom he is responsible, is entitled to decree under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, sec. 1, subsections 2 and 3,* in terms of the second conclusion of the petition.

The defender pleaded ;—(2) The pursuer not having been injured through the fault or negligence of the defender, or anyone for whom he is responsible, the defender should be assoilzied. (3) The pursuer having caused said accident by his own negligence, or having, at least, materially contributed to the accident by his own negligence, the defender should be assoilzied.

A proof was allowed. The evidence was to the following effect :—The work had been going on for some weeks before the occurrence of the accident. There were twelve or thirteen men employed as labourers under the charge of Gillies, as gaffer. The greater part of Gillies' time during the day was taken up in superintending the men, but he also worked along with them. The tramway company's servants had removed the cars from the shed on one or two occasions only, the last occasion being in consequence of a remonstrance by the defender about a week before the accident. The accident took place before seven o'clock in the morning, when the ordinary work hours commenced for which the men were paid, and was occasioned by Gillies pushing a car against a car in front, which latter was being pushed from behind by the pursuer and another labourer. The main points of dispute between the parties were as to the position of Gillies, and his authority to order the labourers to attend before seven for the purpose of removing the cars, and as to the defender's knowledge or sanction of their so doing.

The general import of the evidence for the pursuer was to the effect that the men had received no special order to attend before seven o'clock on the morning of the accident, but they considered that they had general orders from Gillies to attend every morning for the purpose of removing the cars. That Gillies had power to dismiss them if they disobeyed his orders. That they were not aware until after the accident that the defender disapproved of his men removing the cars. No. 24.

* 43 and 44 Vict. c. 42, sec. 1.—"Where after the commencement of this Act personal injury is caused to a workman . . . (2) By reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer, who has any superintendence entrusted to him whilst in the exercise of such superintendence ; or (3) By reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer, to whose orders or directions the workman at the time of the injury was bound to conform, and did conform where such injury resulted from his having so conformed . . . The workman . . . shall have the same right of compensation and remedies against the employer as if the workman had not been a workman of nor in the service of the employer, nor engaged in his work."

On the other hand, the evidence for the defender was to the effect that he was not aware that the men were in the habit of removing the cars. That he had forbidden them to do so, and that Gillies had no power to dismiss the men. Nov. 23, 1886.
Sweeney v. M'Gilvray.

On 2d August 1886 the Sheriff-substitute (Spens) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer was, on the 20th April last, in the employment of defender: Finds that his work began to the defender at seven o'clock on the morning of said day, but a few minutes before said hour he was injured by the defender's foreman pushing a tramcar in such a way as to come against the pursuer's right arm, which was broken: Finds, under reference to note, that there is no liability at common law, or under the Employers Liability Act; therefore sustains the defences, and assolizies the defender," &c.*

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—The pursuer's claim was well founded under the Employers Liability Act. The accident occurred through the fault of Gillies, the defender's foreman. If Gillies gave the order which led to the accident in furtherance of his master's interest, that was enough to infer the master's liability though the master might not know of the order having been given. The negligence of Gillies would make the defender liable for the injury to the pursuer either under subsection 2 of section 1 of the statute,—Gillies having been negligent whilst in the exercise of the superintendence entrusted to him; or alternatively, under subsection 3,—Gillies being a person to whose orders the pursuer was bound to conform, and did conform with the result of being injured by his having so conformed.¹

The defender argued;—The pursuer was not acting in the defender's employment at the time of the accident. The removal of the cars was not part of the defender's contract. Both Gillies and the men had been expressly forbidden by the defender to touch the cars. The men removed the cars voluntarily before the ordinary hour of commencing work, without the defender's knowledge and against his orders.² In any case the defender could not be liable under subsection 2 of section 1 of the statute, because section 8 defines "person who has superintendence entrusted to him" as "a person whose sole or principal duty is that of superintendence and who is not ordinarily engaged in manual labour." Gillies certainly did not fall under this category. Nor could the defender be liable under subsection 3, because that applied to a case of injury resulting from conforming to a negligent order. Here the injury resulted from

* "NOTE.— . . . So far as the second subsection is concerned, I am clear that, to make the master liable, the foreman must be acting within the scope of his employment. That he was clearly acting outwith his employment is not only clear from the evidence already referred to, but from the fact that the master only paid the men as from seven o'clock, and, so far as the employer was concerned, any work done before that hour was not done to the master.

"Again, as regards the third subsection, it follows, from what I have said, that, supposing an order had been given by Gillies to the men to run out the cars, this was not a lawful order, in the sense that there would have been any breach of duty to the employer in the pursuer or any of the other workmen refusing to obey it. . . ."

¹ Osborne v. Jackson & Todd, May 1, 1883, L. R., 11 Q. B. D. 619; Millward v. Midland Railway Co., Dec. 15, 1884, L. R., 14 Q. B. D. 68; Dolan v. Anderson & Lyell, March 7, 1885, 12 R. 804.

² Bunker v. Midland Railway Co., Dec. 12, 1882, 47 L. T. 476.

No. 24. a negligent act of the foreman, not a negligent order. Also, the pursuer could have saved himself from injury by ordinary care.

Nov. 23, 1886.

Sweeney v.
McGilvray.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a very narrow case, and it has been very well argued. It raises some rather subtle questions, both of fact and law. The impression produced on my mind is that no valid defence has been stated to the claim of the pursuer.

The state of the facts is clear enough. The man injured was engaged by the defender to assist as a labourer in laying concrete within the buildings belonging to the tramway company. The work could not go on without the tramway cars, which were standing unused in the shed, being removed from it. Usually the work did not begin before seven o'clock. For some reason it was necessary, or at least it was desired, that the work on the occasion in question should begin before seven o'clock. I have no doubt that the tramway company were bound to clear the building in order that the workmen might begin. Therefore it was clearly a reasonable thing, whatever might be the rights of the parties, that the contractor for the concrete should at his own hand take out the tramway cars, if not removed by the company. He was doing no injury to the tramway company in so doing, they having failed to perform their duty in the matter. Gillies, who was the head of the gang who were at work that day, went with the men before seven o'clock, and finding that the company had not cleared the shed of the cars, told his men to do it. He helped them by pushing a car, and in so pushing it the pursuer was injured. He had been engaged in pushing the car immediately in front. It is said that the defender is responsible, as he employed this man as his foreman. That this man did work with his own hands sometimes is certain, but the same was the case in Dolan v. Anderson & Lyell, 12 R. 804. That does not prevent him from giving orders to the men, and they were bound to obey him. It is said that the pursuer must have known that removing the cars was not part of his duty under his employment by the defender. That is stretching the matter rather far. They could not work at all—could not complete the contract—without removing these cars, and taking them out of the shed was only in furtherance of the work in which they were employed. Nobody was entitled to object except the tramway company, who could not complain of their doing so. It was not unreasonable to order the squad to remove the cars in order to commence the work, and it was in the direction of furthering operations.

It is argued further that the men had no right to touch these cars. But the tramway company cannot, I think, complain, and this is not a question with them. It is said, also, that the foreman had no function to discharge about the cars. But although he was told not to touch them, that was when the tramway company had undertaken to remove them. When the tramway company had failed in this, it is impossible to say that it was not a reasonable order to give. In questions under the Employers Liability Act I am not inclined to split hairs, and, in my opinion, the Sheriff has not construed it rightly in this case.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. I agree that there is much of difficulty about the case. The facts are that the defender was under contract with the tramway company to lay concrete in certain of the company's premises. The pursuer was a workman in the defender's employment as a common labourer.

The contract had been in course of execution for some time. The workmen understood that their work began at seven o'clock. That was the regular hour for starting. But as the tramway company habitually neglected their duty of shoving out the cars in time for the concrete layers to begin at seven o'clock, Gillies ordered the men to attend about ten minutes before seven in order to clear the premises of the cars, and enable them to begin laying the concrete at seven o'clock. Gillies' position is a question of fact in the case, but I do not know that we have better evidence than that of M'Mahon, who says,—“The gaffer's name was John Gillies. We went for the purpose of removing the cars about ten minutes to seven. We were ordered by Gillies the previous morning to shift the cars out before we started work. He was foreman over the job. Sometimes he worked, and at most times he was gaffering the men. For two hours he would be working, and for six hours he would be gaffering. By far the greater part of his time was occupied in gaffering or superintending. We removed the cars that morning before starting time. We had been working there before the accident from the time the job started. We obeyed Gillies when he ordered us to remove the cars. If we did not, we would have to look for another job.”

No. 24.
Nov. 23, 1886.
Sweeney v.
M'Gilvray.

Gillies told them to come ten minutes before seven. This order the men had to obey really on pain of dismissal. As to the habitual neglect of the tramway company's servants, he says,—“I was there from the time that the job started—for more than two or three weeks. I never saw the tramway men put out the cars except one morning, when one of the men gave a bit lift. That was two or three weeks, perhaps more, before the accident. I have not seen the tramway men repeatedly run out these cars. None of the tramway men ever ran them out. I was regularly at the job.” It is proved, in my opinion, in point of fact that the men were ordered by the foreman, and considered themselves bound to obey his order, and reasonably considered so, to attend a few minutes before seven and push out the cars. I think Gillies was appointed by the defender as his foreman, under whose charge he put the pursuer and other twelve or thirteen men. It must be taken that he was acting as gaffer or foreman in giving these orders, which were regularly given and obeyed for two or three weeks before the accident. The defence is that Gillies was transgressing his duty, and that the removal of the cars was outwith the defender's service altogether. But the pursuer was the defender's servant, and he was so under the orders of the defender's superintendent or gaffer or foreman of the job, and along with him other twelve or thirteen men. In these circumstances the defence which the defender states in his evidence is rather striking. “I would not have stopped Gillies from giving orders to any man in his own time to take out the cars, when he was not under my instructions. If he had instructed them after seven o'clock, or at seven o'clock, to touch the cars, I would have stopped him. I would not have allowed him to do that at all. I would not have allowed the men to touch the cars in my time. If the men liked to remove the cars, it was no concern of mine at all.”

Would any master suppose for a moment that that was the state of the men's mind? It is contrary to the reason and the likelihood of the thing. I cannot bear the master say that it was their own liking.

In obeying the order of the master's foreman, and in his service, the accident took place. Was nobody to blame? It was not a damnum fatale, and must have occurred owing to the work having been performed in a dangerous manner.

No. 24. It was the duty of the foreman who gave the order to take precautions that it should be safely performed. Irrespectively of the foreman's responsibility, I think the master was responsible for the proper precautions being taken. The master says he took none, that it was no concern of his at all. Irrespectively of the Employers Liability Act altogether, a master is responsible for the proper discharge of his duties as master, and when he neglects any of his proper duties and damage results to a workman in consequence, he is responsible. At common law, unmodified by the Employers Liability Act, the master is not responsible, if he perform all his duties as master, for neglect on the part of any of his workpeople, even of his superior workpeople. For superior and inferior workpeople went by the name of "collaborateurs," and if the master had performed all his duties, but one of the "collaborateurs" failed in his, there was no liability on the part of the master. The liability must fall somewhere, and if there is no express provision law will imply that the contract is that each workman shall take on himself the risk of mistake or negligence on the part of another. All that assumes that the master has done all his duties as master. Where he has not, there is liability, and the Employers Liability Act does not interfere with that in the slightest degree. Here the defender says that he took no care at all, though the accident shews that there should have been some care. Thus he admits that he neglected his duty as master altogether, that he made no provision for these cars being removed in reasonable safety. The duty was primarily on the superintendent if he was there with the duty of superintending, but the liability is not only on him but on the master under the Employers Liability Act, in whose service he failed by neglect to exercise a proper superintendence in this matter. If he was not acting as superintendent the master would be responsible at common law for allowing his men to attend morning after morning for weeks without having taken any proper precaution to see that the work was performed in safety. The cause of the accident is plain—the want of proper superintendence. That was the neglect of Gillies, if he was put there by the master, and of the master if he was not. On the whole matter I am of opinion that the defender is liable.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—After all the thought which I have been able to give to this case, I am not satisfied that the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute is not right. I therefore think that this appeal should be dismissed.

The pursuer is a labourer in the defender's employment, and suffered the accident, as he says, in consequence of the negligence of the defender's foreman or gaffer. The ground of my opinion that he is not entitled to recover damages is (1) because the work on which he was engaged at the time was not the work of the defender, (2) because the order given was not within the scope of the authority which the gaffer possessed. There is no doubt that the work ought not to have been left to be done by the defender. There was an implied obligation on the tramway company to remove all obstacles to the execution of the contract. One of these consisted in pushing out the tramway cars. It was their duty to remove these cars by seven in the morning that the work might be done. It might quite well be that, the tramway company not having done that which ought to have been done, the defender would give authority to his servants to do it. If so it would be the same thing so far as the pursuer is concerned. But there is no evidence of that, for I think that the evidence leads to an opposite conclusion. The master knew that the cars had been removed by those whom he had engaged in his service. But he did not approve of that which had been so done. He told Gillies he would speak to the tramway company about it, and told his servants not to touch the cars. He repudiated the work as not his work. I have great difficulty in seeing how a servant receiving orders in these circumstances from the gaffer should be entitled to recover damages from his master.

No. 24.

Nov. 23, 1886.
Sweeney v.
M'Gilvray.

But the matter does not rest here. I think that the work must be held to have been within the knowledge of the pursuer as not work for his master. There is a contract between the pursuer and the defender for service. That service begins at seven. If they are asked to come before, must not the men have been satisfied that it could not have been for the master's work? I think the pursuer must have known that this was not under the defender's employment. There is no warrant in the circumstances of this case for the opinion that by refusing to do this work the pursuer would have broken the defender's order. I therefore do not feel at liberty to concur.

LORD RUTHERFORD CLARK.—I think that the judgment should be recalled, and that the pursuer should have judgment in his favour. I am sensible of the delicacy and difficulty of the case, but I can come to no other conclusion. The defender was under contract with the tramway company for laying their premises with concrete. The pursuer was one of the labourers employed by the defender for executing that contract. It is not said that he was in any respect a skilled workman. He was merely a labourer. We may safely infer that his employment consisted in performing any labour which was required for the execution and furtherance of his employer's contract. It appears that in order to enable the work to proceed it was necessary that the tramway cars on the premises should be removed from the shed, and the pursuer was ordered by the foreman of the squad to assist in the removal of these cars. I think that was an order which he was bound to obey, because he was asked to furnish labour with a view to the execution of that contract. I think he would fairly assume that it was within his duty.

It is said that he knew that he was outwith his own contract with the defender because his time commenced at seven o'clock. I cannot draw that conclusion. All that we know is that the workmen were required to come to the premises with a view to doing certain things sometime before the ordinary hour. That leaves them in the same position after they had come as if it had been after the ordinary hour of work. When, therefore, the pursuer was ordered to do this piece of work, he could not know because it was before seven that it was outwith his employment. I have therefore come to the conclusion that he was in the position of one who was bound to obey that order.

It is said that the foreman should not have given that order. But the pursuer did not know of any disqualification to that effect; and therefore that is of no importance. Having got an order which he was bound to obey, the next question is, whether there was any negligence on the part of the person who gave it. I think there was such negligence, because Gillies did not take due care to see that the order was carried out with safety. Consequently, I think that the pursuer is, under the Employers Liability Act, entitled to recover against the defender. I agree very much with the view of Lord Young with reference to the defender's liability at common law. There is great reason to say that he

- No. 24. should have taken care that his own men were not injured in removing the cars. But I prefer to put it under the Employers Liability Act.
- Nov. 23, 1886.
Sweeney v.
M'Gilvray.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find in fact (1) that in April last the defender was under contract with the Glasgow Tramway and Omnibus Company to lay concrete in their premises at Maryhill; (2) that the defender employed the pursuer and other workmen as labourers in executing the work; (3) that it was the duty of the said company under their contract to remove the tramway cars from the premises every morning to enable the workmen to proceed with the work, but that they had continuously failed to do so, and the pursuer and the other workmen of the defender, by order of John Gillies, his foreman, whom they were bound to obey, attended each morning before the ordinary hours of work to remove the cars; (4) that while so engaged on the morning of 20th April the pursuer was struck and his right arm was broken by a car pushed from behind by Gillies against the car which the pursuer was moving forward; (5) that the injury thus sustained by the pursuer was caused by the failure of the defender's said foreman to take reasonable precautions against the collision of the cars: Find in law that the defender is responsible for the negligence of his foreman, and liable to the pursuer in damages: Therefore sustain the appeal: Recall the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute appealed against: Assess the damages at £60 sterling; ordain the defender to make payment of that sum to the pursuer: Find him liable to the pursuer in expenses in the inferior Court and in this Court," &c.

WILLIAM OFFICER, S.S.C.—LINDSAY MACKERSY, W.S.—Agents.

- No. 25. WILLIAM STIRLING AND ANOTHER (Mr and Mrs Urquhart's Marriage-Contract Trustees), First Parties.—Dundas.
JOHN GRUBB URQUHART, Second Party.—Wilson.
- Nov. 23, 1886.
Urquhart's
Trustees v.
Urquhart.
- 2d DIVISION.
M.

Trust—Anticipation of period of payment—Presumption against child-bearing.

JOHN URQUHART and MRS E. URQUHART, in the antenuptial marriage-contract of their son, J. G. Urquhart, bound themselves to convey by deeds (which they subsequently executed), to take effect at their respective deaths, their heritable and moveable estates to their son's marriage-contract trustees for behoof of their son in liferent, for his liferent use allenary, and of the children of the marriage in fee.

After the death of his father and mother the son, as their heir-at-law and sole next of kin, with consent of his wife, called upon the trustees to convey the estates to him, on the ground that no child had been born of the marriage, which had subsisted for thirty-nine years, and that his wife was now sixty-one years of age. In a special case presented by the marriage-contract trustees and the son, held that he was entitled to the conveyance.¹

J. & A. PEDDIE & IVORY, W.S.—MACPHERSON & MACKAY, W.S.—Agents.

¹ Scheniman v. Wilson, June 25, 1828, 6 S. 1019; Shaw v. Shaw, ib. 1149; Gordon v. Cameron, Feb. 8, 1873, 45 Scot. Jur. 272; Louson's Trustees v. Dicksons, June 19, 1886, 13 R. 1003; Fleming v. M'Lagan, Jan. 28, 1879, 6 R. 588; Blackwood v. Dykes, Feb. 26, 1833, 11 S. 443, and June 11, 1833, 11 S. 699, 5 Scot. Jur. 269 and 425; Croxton v. May, Aug. 18, 1878, L. R. 9 Ch. Div. 388; Haynes v. Haynes, Feb. 9, 1866, 35 L. J. Ch. 303.

CHARLES SAMSON (Inspector of Poor of the Parish of Kirriemuir), Pursuer No. 26.
(Respondent).—Pearson—Hay.

ROBERT DAVIE, Defender (Appellant).—Kennedy.

Nov. 26, 1886.
Samson v.

Parent and child—Bastard—Aliment.—Held (diss. Lord Young) that a Davie.
bastard son is liable to support his mother.

On 24th January 1885 Mrs Elizabeth Lindsay or Fairweather, a woman ^{2d Division.} sixty-six years of age, became a proper object of parochial relief, and as ^{Sheriff of For-} such obtained relief from the Parochial Board of Kirriemuir. ^{farshire.}

On 22d July 1885 the Inspector of Kirriemuir brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Dundee against Robert Davie, estate manager, Duntrune House, near Dundee, for repayment of the sums already expended in aliment of Mrs Fairweather and for relief of future aliment.

The pursuer stated that the defender was the natural son of Mrs Fairweather, and pleaded that as such he was liable to relieve the Parochial Board of the obligation to aliment her.

The defender denied that he was the son of Mrs Fairweather, and pleaded further that the action was irrelevant.

On 11th December the Sheriff-substitute (Campbell Smith) dismissed the action as irrelevant, finding the defender entitled to expenses.*

On appeal the Sheriff (Comrie Thomson), on 8th January 1886, recalled this interlocutor, and remitted to the Sheriff-substitute to allow a proof and to proceed with the cause.

* "NOTE.— . . . The question whether a bastard is bound to support his pauper mother is, so far as I am aware, not settled by any clear or direct authority. It has remained a subject of interesting speculation and fascinating doubt for generations, and I am sorry to be compelled to take a step towards putting an end to its indeterminate character, and still more to decide it in a way which I think not in accordance with natural right. But for the fettering considerations of settled civil law, I should have felt inclined to hold that the obligations of parent and child to give support against want ought to be reciprocal and co-extensive, that as the mother or father was bound to support the child when helpless, so the child ought to be bound to support either parent in case of ill health, or old age, or poverty, as is indeed, I believe, the usual custom in Scotland when human affections assert themselves, independently of legal regulations and of civil law; but passing from natural right to civil law, I am met with the insuperable obstacle that, except to one effect, the civil law does not recognise the relation of parent and child as existing between illegitimate children and the persons who have produced them. A bastard is pronounced by a host of authorities to be filius nullius,—that is, being interpreted, not a child at all but a mere physiological product, having no rights of any kind except the right to live and remain in the world at the expense of the temporary pair who have irregularly and improperly introduced it to life. So soon as a bastard is able to support itself, it is an alien to legal relationship, without legal father or legal mother. The bastard inherits nothing from his father, whatever fortune that father may leave. The bastard may make a fortune, and die unmarried and childless. His fortune will go to the Crown as ultima heres, and if the father get any part of his deceased bastard's estate, it will only be through the generosity of the Crown. The same thing would happen with the mother of a wealthy bastard. And here I touch the principle that separates the bastard from all legal ties, except those, by marrying, and otherwise, he or she may form for himself or herself. In law, the defender here is nobody's son. He has no mother at all, and, therefore, no mother for whom he is bound to bear the burden of giving her bread when she is old and destitute. I may have doubts of the real humanity of such a bastard son, but he has at least as much humanity as the law ascribes to him, which is a physiological humanity, with the right to escape from starvation in infancy, and until he becomes self-supporting."

No. 26. The evidence led at the proof disclosed that the defender was the natural son of Mrs Fairweather (which was ultimately not disputed),
 Nov. 26, 1886. that he was born in 1839, that he recollected to have seen his mother on Samson v. two occasions only, when he was 15 and 22 years old respectively, that Davie. he did not know she was his mother, and that neither she nor his father (who was alive) had contributed anything to his support since his childhood.

On 18th February 1886 the Sheriff-substitute (Campbell Smith) gave decree for the sum sued for, and reserved the pursuer's claim for future relief.

The defender appealed.¹

At advising,—

LORD CRAIGHILL.—The appellant is the illegitimate son of Mrs Elizabeth Lindsay or Fairweather, who resides in Kirriemuir. He was born in 1839, so that he is now forty-seven years of age. In infancy and early childhood he was nurtured and cared for by his mother, or by relatives of hers who took upon themselves the duty which she ought to have discharged. When fit for work he did what he could for himself. He always found employment, and has always been steady, and the consequence is that for his position in life, which is that of a farm overseer, he is in easy circumstances. In 1885 his mother became unable from failure of health to do anything for her living, and as she had no one to look to for support, the defender refusing to assist her, she applied to the parish, by whom she has since been maintained. The Parochial Board think that what they are doing for her ought to be done by the defender, for he has plenty of means, and these, as they say, to the extent required, ought, in fulfilment of a legal as well as of a natural obligation, to be used for his mother's support. The defender accordingly was called upon to relieve the Parochial Board. But the defender refused to comply with this application. The present action therefore was instituted.

The defender's ability is not disputed. What is put in issue is the legal liability of the defender. The Sheriff-substitute dismissed the action on the ground, as is explained in the note to his interlocutor, that "the defender being a bastard, he is nobody's son. He has no mother at all, and therefore no mother for whom he is bound to bear the burden of giving her bread when she is old and destitute." The Sheriff was of a different opinion, and the result in the end was that decree was given in terms of the conclusions of the summons. Hence the present appeal.

Were it the case that a woman who has borne a bastard is in the eye of the ¹ Defender's Authorities.—Corrie v. Adair, Feb. 24, 1860, 22 D. 897, per Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis, p. 900, 32 Scot. Jur. 377; Anderson v. Kirk-Session of Lauder, March 11, 1848, 10 D. 960, 20 Scot. Jur. 332; Fraser on Parent and Child, 2d ed. p. 127; Dig. xxv. iii. 5, subsecs. 3 and 4; D'Aguesseau, Dissert. sur les Bastards; Stephan's Blackstone, ii. 303; Horner v. Horner, May 24, 1799, 1 Hagg. 337, at pp. 351 and 357.

Pursuer's Authorities.—Just. Inst. i. 10, 12; Dig. II. ii. 4 and 5; Stair, i. 5, 8 and 9; Bankton, i. 6, 20; Wilson v. Todds, Jan. 30, 1867, 3 S. L. R. 192; Inspector of Inveravon v. Raeburn, Oct. 29, 1856, 1 Sheriff Court Decisions, 192, Taylor v. Spottiswoode, May 5, 1857, 2 Sheriff Court Decisions, 31; Robertson v. Robertson, Nov. 21, 1865, 8 Poor Law Mag. 244; Watson v. Robertson, Jan. 1868, 1 Poor Law Mag. (N.S.) 172; A v. B, Feb. 14, 1868, 1 Poor Law Mag. (N.S.) 439; Hoseason v. Hoseason, Oct. 21, 1870, 9 Macph. 37, 43 Scot. Jur. 20.

law not the mother of the child, there would be much to urge for the conclusion at which the Sheriff-substitute originally arrived. But such a view is repugnant to common sense, and there is nothing in the way of authority by which this paradox can be supported. No. 26.
Nov. 26, 1886.
Samson v.
Davie.

The Sheriff-substitute apparently rests his opinion on the description which has often been used that a bastard is nullius filius. But these words only import that in the eye of the law a bastard is without a father. This is the substance of many texts and many dicta in the civil law and in our own law. The result is, according to the authorities, that there is in law no father to a bastard, but it is nowhere said that in law a bastard is without a mother. Upon this point there never has, so far as I know, been any controversy. The contrary is indeed implied in all the passages in the Corpus Juris Civilis and in our own institutional writers, where it is said that a bastard is without a father. Of these the following are examples—Inst. i. 10, 12, and iii. 5, 4; Dig. i. 5, 23, and II. ii. 4 and 5. Out of our own institutional writers, Stair, iii. 3, 44, and iv. 12, 1, may be referred to. What is implied in these passages is expressed in the Institutes of Gaius, book i. sec. 64, where it is said—“Ergo si quis nefarias atque incestas nuptias contraxerit, neque uxorem habere videtur neque liberos; itaque hi qui ex eo coitu nascuntur matrem quidem habere videntur, patrem vero non utique; nec ob id in potestate ejus sunt [sed tales sunt], quales sunt hi quos mater vulgo concepit; nam et hi patrem habere non intelleguntur, cum is etiam incertus sit; unde solent spurii filii appellari, vel a Græca voce quasi εργασθέντες concepti, vel quasi sine patre filii.”

Mrs Lindsay or Fairweather and the defender are therefore in law, as well as in fact, mother and son, though all the rights and obligations of this relationship which result from the birth of a child in wedlock do not exist in the present case, where the defender is a bastard. And the question which now awaits decision is, whether the burden of his mother's support, now that she is destitute, affects the defender as a legal obligation. She was bound to support him in infancy—this being an obediential obligation based on the law of nature—Vide the case of Marjoribanks, Nov. 30, 1831, 10 S. 79, and the opinion of Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis in Reid v. Moir, July 13, 1866, 4 Macph. 1060, as well as the opinions of Lord Fullerton and Lord Balgray, which are cited by his Lordship. Is the defender in like manner not bound to support her, seeing he is able so to do, now that from age and infirmity she can do nothing for her livelihood? I think he is. The obligation arises ex jure naturali, and is one of those natural obligations to which it is decent as well as reasonable and expedient that our municipal law should give legal effect on account of the natural justice on which it is founded. This is the ground on which the liability of the putative father to contribute to the aliment of his bastard child has been made a rule of our law—Vide opinion of Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis in Corrie v. Adair, February 24, 1860, 22 D. 900—and the reason for this rule is certainly not stronger than can be urged for the recognition of the reciprocal rule that a bastard able to support his mother when she is in destitution is subject to this obligation. Such also was the rule of the Roman law expressed in so many words—Vide Dig. 25, tit. iii. “De agnoscendis et alendis liberis, vel parentibus, vel patronis, vel libertis.” There it is said (title iii. sec. 5, subsecs. 3 and 4)—“3. Idem in liberis quoque exhibendis a parentibus dicendum est. 4. Ergo et matrem cogemus præsertim vulgo quæsitos liberos alere, nec non ipsos eam.”

There is no contradiction to this in any other part of the Corpus Juris, nor

No. 26.
Nov. 26, 1886.
Samson v.
Davie.

in any of the works of any of the commentators. The question has been decided again and again in conformity with this text of the Roman law in many Sheriff Courts in the country, nor is any adverse opinion expressed on the subject by any of our own institutional writers, or by any of our Judges, while there is this passage in the lectures of Baron Hume. He says that "there is no obligation on a natural child to aliment his reputed father—at least it is an extremely doubtful question. The contrary holds with respect to the mother, however, whom the child is always bound to support if she be in indigent circumstances." Vide Fraser on Parent and Child, p. 127, for this quotation. This is of great consideration, and I take it into account, though I do not rest my opinion upon its authority alone. I come to the conclusion that there is legal liability upon the ground already explained, which is supported by the rule of the civil law, and by the opinion of Baron Hume, and it nowhere meets with any contradiction or refutation whatever. The Lord President and Lord Cunningham, as was pointed out at the debate, have expressed an opinion that a putative father in destitution has not a legal claim for support against his bastard child. What was said on this subject in the cases referred to—Corrie v. Adair, 22 D. 900, and Anderson v. Kirk-session of Lauder, 10 D. 960,—was altogether obiter, and there does not appear to have been any argument on the subject addressed to the Court. But even assuming that the views of those Judges were to be applied, were the question to be submitted for judgment, my opinion with reference to the right of the mother to be supported would not be in any way affected. In the eye of the law the woman bearing the child and the child to which she gives birth are mother and son, whereas the child that is born and the man who is made liable for a contribution of aliment, the putative father, are in law in no way related. The ground of liability in the one case therefore does not exist in the other. Lord Cowan in the case of Reid v. Moir makes this distinction in his opinion between the two cases.

On the whole matter my opinion is that the defender's appeal ought to be dismissed.

LORD YOUNG.—This is an interesting question, but I cannot say that I regard it as one of first-class importance. It has never occurred before for decision in this Supreme Court, and just as likely as not it may never occur again. The inclination of my opinion is with the Sheriff-substituta. I have not gone to the Roman law for guidance in this matter. The Roman law regarding the family relations has not very much in common with ours. Its leading idea is the patria potestas, to which we have nothing analogous. Legitimate children were under the power of the father to such an extent that he could put them to death. Even the property which the son acquired he did not acquire for himself, but for his father. He could not sue an action or be defender in one. In short, their rules were altogether different in conception from ours. If I wanted light to aid me, I confess I should prefer the more modern, the nearer, and the brighter light of the practice of our fellow-subjects on the other side of the Tweed, where the law of the family relations is akin to our own, and is conceived in the same spirit. When we were ourselves in a state of comparative darkness we resorted to the Roman law, and got from it some useful and profitable enough maxims, and if any considerations or principles which seem to us to be reasonable or expedient are to be derived from that source now, we will make use of them just as we should make use of reasonable or expedient considerations which may present themselves from any other source. But the question here, now before us for the first time, must, I think, be determined by reference to considerations to which, so far as I know, the Roman law had nothing analogous. We have a poor law of our own, and a law of succession of our own. Jus naturale—it is difficult to say what that exactly means. The poor law is natural I suppose in one sense at least, because it is simply this,—that human beings shall not be allowed to beg or to starve, but that those who can afford to pay taxes shall be taxed for the benefit of those who would otherwise be obliged to beg or starve. Unfortunately, even in this advanced state of civilisation, there are bastards, but our law does not permit even bastards to starve, and I am not aware that we borrowed that from the Roman law. I rather think that by the Roman law bastards were left to starve, but by our law, although people are not encouraged to commit fornication, yet if they do, the fruits of the fornication are protected from starvation, though if those whose illicit amours have brought the fruits into existence are able to support them, and so prevent the tax from being laid on the public, our law is that they shall support their own offspring. That is the plain sense of the whole matter. If the parents cannot be found, or if they are unable to support the offspring, the humanity of modern times does not permit the offspring to starve. The poor law will support them. It might have been a tax imposed on the whole country as a single area, but its smaller areas make up the whole country, so that it comes to be just a public tax, and by means of this public tax illegitimate children are protected against starvation, but the father is bound to support the children if he can afford it, and so is the mother. Is that the jus naturale? It is quite natural at least in one sense—just as it is natural to pay one's debts. But then the converse proposition is, that whereas fornicators are by law bound to protect the public against having to support the fruits of their illicit amours, the fruits are on their part bound to protect the public against having to support the fornicators. I do not think that that follows—the one proposition appears to me reasonable and the other not, and accordingly if I go to the other side of the Tweed I find that they adopt the one proposition but reject the other. It was conceded that they do so.

The present case is that of a woman who has had several bastard children, and who at an advanced age becomes a pauper. The poor law authorities, after she became chargeable, discover that about thirty years ago she gave birth to a bastard son, who is now a gardener in a gentleman's family. She has seen him only twice during that long period, but unfortunately the poor law authorities discover that she and he are mother and son. He was ignorant of the fact himself, and in consequence this action was brought to have it proved against him that he is the son of his mother. Now, I cannot think that it is expedient or for edification to have this man called into Court to discuss such a matter relating to his own history. For, observe it is not a question of feeling or want of feeling on his part towards his mother—it is the public taxpayer who having discovered a relation which neither of the parties to it knew about or cared to perpetuate, says to the son,—“You are bound to relieve us of the sums which we are contributing to your mother's support.” I think that here a consideration arises to which there is nothing analogous in the Roman law, but a great deal that is analogous in the law which prevails on the other side of the Tweed. How do the public, who are seeking here to be relieved of

No. 26.

Nov. 26, 1886.

Samson v.

Davie.

No. 26:
Nov. 26, 1886.
Samson v.
Davie.

the burden of supporting this woman, deal with bastard children? Here the considerations to which the Sheriff-substitute adverts commend themselves very strongly to me as they have done to our neighbours on the other side of the Tweed, who act on them. Does the public treat the son as the child of its natural parents? In one sense certainly. If the father and mother can support the child in infancy the public compels them to do so. But in no other sense will the public recognise the relation. If the father die a millionaire, or if the mother die a millionaire—if they die intestate I mean—to not one shilling of their fortunes would their bastard son be entitled. Nay, more, if the father or the mother died, leaving any fortune you choose to mention, in the event of the failure of blood relatives the public itself would take the fortune—it would go to the fisc through the Queen—and yet it is this bastard child, to whom they would give no benefit, that the public are asking to protect them against the burden of supporting this old woman—a child who, in this particular instance, had no notice that she was his mother until the raising of the action. Now, how would the Roman law deal with such a case—the case of the father or the mother of a bastard dying and leaving a fortune, but no blood relatives to take it? I do not know. Considerations of Roman law, therefore, I put aside. In this country I know that the child is not treated as a child at all. We have a maxim taken from the Roman law, indeed, but which we should, I suppose, have had if that law had never existed, Oujus est commodum ejus debet esse et incommodum—"He who has the benefit should bear the loss." But here, if there is any commodum to be taken from the mother, the public takes it in preference to the bastard child. So true is this that even if she leaves it to her child by will he is taxed for it at ten per cent as a stranger. There is no single circumstance in which the public consents to treat a bastard child as the child of its father or mother except this, that they must take from the public, and upon themselves, the burden of supporting their child if they are able, and the child requires it. In that respect, and in that respect alone, will the public recognise the relation.

As I have said, I am moved by the considerations which have determined the law of England in this matter—considerations which are of equal cogency here. The Roman law, I must confess, I have difficulty in understanding. Lord Craig-hill was good enough to give me the reference to two texts, to which he has also himself referred. One of them, Dig. book 25, tit. iii. sec. 5, subsec. 4, is in these terms:—"Ergo et matrem cogemus præsertim vulgo quæsitos liberos alere, nec non ipsos eam." Now, I put in parenthesis the words "præsertim vulgo quæsitos," and the text will then run,—"Ergo et matrem cogemus liberos alere, nec non ipsos eam"—"A mother, if able, must support her children, and her children must support her." Then, what is the force of "præsertim vulgo quæsitos"? Does it mean that there is a special duty of supporting his mother laid on the bastard, just as there is a special duty of supporting him laid on her, so that, if she has legitimate children as well as the bastard, the "præsertim" applies to him, and he must support her in preference to her legitimate children? That does not commend itself to my mind as good sense, and, if it does not, I cannot regard it as of any authority.

It appears from the proof that the father of this gardener of forty-seven is also alive, and I suppose therefore that the unfortunate man will have to support his father as well as his mother; just as they were both liable to keep him off the rates if they could, so must he keep them if he can, and they need it. Then, again, in one of the cases mentioned, I think, by Lord Craighill, it was held that if a man marries the mother of a bastard child, he must support the child though not his own—he takes the mother with all her burdens, and cannot get rid of them. Now, I suppose this obligation is reciprocal, so that if he is liable to support the child, the child when it grows up becomes liable to support him as well as the mother. I cannot go that length, nor do I see, once you begin, what limit is to be placed to this obligation which it is sought to impose upon bastards of supporting their parents, and so of relieving the public, which refuses to allow to the bastard a single advantage through its relation to its father and mother. My judgment, therefore, after the most attentive consideration I have been able to give to the matter, would be in accordance with that of the Sheriff-substitute in his interlocutor of 11th December.

No. 26.

Nov. 26, 1886.
Samson v.
Davis.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—This case is one of novelty, but after the most careful consideration I have been able to give to it I have come to agree with Lord Craighill. I think we have a considerable body of authority—both text writers and decisions—for the proposition that a bastard son is liable to support his mother, and I am not disposed to pronounce a decision contrary to so much authority, especially as the obligation to support has been recognised in the civil law. I confess I do not share the difficulty of Lord Young in understanding the text on which he commented. It seems to me capable of a very simple rendering—"Ergo et matrem cogemus præsertim vulgo quæsitos liberos alere, nec non ipsos eam," which means, I think, "We will compel the mother to support her children, especially her bastard children, and her children we will compel to support her." Probably the "præsertim vulgo quæsitos" was added because of the difficulty which there might be of discovering the father in the case of bastards—the word "vulgo" seems especially to point to that. I do not think that the words "præsertim vulgo quæsitos" are to be brought into the second member of the clause. I think that the "ipsos" refers to "liberos" simply.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case I concur with Lord Craighill. I have looked into the authorities with some attention, as the question is one of considerable general importance, though the particular application is not likely to be of frequent occurrence.

I should be very sorry if the slightest doubt were thrown on the foundations of our law in this matter, which admit of no question. They are not those of the law of England. As I understand that system, it refuses to acknowledge any natural obligation on the part of parents to support their children. Any such obligation is with them statutory only, under the statutes for the relief of the poor. Now, whatever may be the virtue of that principle in the law of England, I believe England to be the only country in Europe which denies a place to natural obligation as regards this subject. In the case of our own country, from the days of Lord Stair to the present time, there is not a word in the authorities—whether institutional writers or judicial decisions—in which the slightest doubt is suggested as to the principle on which our law proceeds, or which makes any reference to the law of England as at all resembling our own. I think we should bear this clearly in mind now, for I own that I regard the principle of natural obligation as very valuable. We have only to look at that title in Stair under the head of Aliment, where he discusses the whole matter, to see that while he refers to the civil law, he places the subject entirely

No. 26. on the ground of debitum naturale, and the numerous cases in the Dictionary will be found to turn on that principle alone. I have made these observations, although except to assert the acceptance of the principle of natural obligation by the law of Scotland, they throw no light on the only question before us.

Nov. 26, 1886.
Samson v.
Davie.

That question presents some novelty for our consideration. It is not a question of public municipal law. It relates to the mutual rights and obligations of two parties—an illegitimate child and its parent. In regard to the civil law, I thought it was well understood that the law of patria potestas and of succession in the civil law formed no part of our system. They were early rejected, but, on the other hand, on the other relations of parents and children the texts of the civil law are not indeed authorities but illustrations, and very important illustrations. Lord Young has found some difficulty in giving a fitting sense to the text from the Digest which he has quoted. I quite agree with Lord Rutherford Clark's reading of it, but I think the best way of solving such a difficulty is to consult the commentators, and on referring to Voetius (Voet. ad Pand. xxv. iii. 6) I find that he amplifies the text very satisfactorily, and lays it down clearly that the two obligations of parent to child and child to parent are reciprocal, whether the children be legitimate or illegitimate. I do not say that we must necessarily follow these views, but I arrive at the same conclusion. The natural obligation between mother and child is as strong whether the child be legitimate or illegitimate, and therefore as a legitimate child is under an obligation to support its mother, so also must an illegitimate child be under the same obligation. It is true that there is a paucity of authority in this matter. But there are some cases and dicta. The opinions of the Lord President and Lord Cowan in Reid v. Moir, July 13, 1866 (4 Macph. 1060), are important, and are among the latest. The Lord President says that he can think of no other category of law to which the bastard's claim to aliment can be referred except that of "the obediential obligations based upon the law of nature"; and Lord Cowan, while reserving his opinion on the abstract question, says that he cannot see any difference between legitimate and illegitimate children. This case was referred to in Wilson v. Todd, which was an Outer-House decision by Lord Jerviswoode, whose judgment was acquiesced in. The rubric of the report in vol. iii. of the Scottish Law Reporter, p. 192, is—"Held that an illegitimate daughter and her husband were bound during the subsistence of their marriage to aliment the indigent mother of the former."

On these grounds I think we should dismiss the appeal and affirm the judgment.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find in fact (1) that Elizabeth Lindsay or Fairweather is a proper object of parochial relief, and that she has received such relief from the pursuer to the amount of £4, 3s.; (2) that the defender is her illegitimate son: Find in law that the defender is liable to the pursuer in relief of the said sum: Therefore dismiss the appeal: Affirm the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute appealed against: Of new ordain the defender to make payment to the pursuer of the said sum of £4, 3s., with expenses."

REID & GUILD, W.S.—JOHN MACPHERSON, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN CUNNINGHAME, Claimant (Appellant).—Murray.
THOMAS GROSSART, Objector (Respondent).—Shaw.

No. 27.

Election Law—County Franchise—Long leaseholder—Joint tenant—Reform Act, 1884 (48 and 49 Vict. c. 3), sec. 4, subsec. 2.—The Reform Act of 1884 provides, sec. 4, subsec. 2, that “where two or more men are owners, either as joint tenants or as tenants in common, of an estate in any land or tenement, one of such men, but not more than one, shall, if his interest is sufficient,” be entitled to be registered as a voter. Held (dub. Lord Mure) that this limitation applies to the case of joint tenants under a lease for a period exceeding fifty-seven years.

Nov. 26, 1886.
Cunninghame
v. Grossart.

JOHN CUNNINGHAME, Alderbank, Bothwell, claimed to be enrolled as a voter for South Lanarkshire, as joint tenant of lands and tenements and houses at Carluke. Mr Cunningham was a partner of the firm of Merry & Cunningham, ironmasters, by which firm the subjects were held on a long lease, exceeding fifty-seven years. The lease was in favour of the three individual partners of the firm, as partners, and Mr Main, one of them, was already enrolled in respect of the subjects thus held.

Registration
Appeal Court,
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
B.

An objection was taken to the claim on the ground that by the 4th section of the Representation of the People Act, 1884, only one joint owner or tenant was entitled to be enrolled in respect of these subjects. The Sheriff-substitute (Birnie) sustained the objection, and rejected the claim.

Cunninghame having required a case, it was stated by the Sheriff-substitute.

In addition to the facts already narrated, it was set forth,—The houses were at one time used by the firm as dwelling-houses for miners in connection with their iron and coal workings near Carluke, but these workings were discontinued at Whitsunday 1875, and since then the houses have been let to ordinary tenants. Mr Cunningham's name was not upon the register at the date of the passing of the Act 48 and 49 Vict. cap. 3. The clear yearly value of each partner's interest in the subjects is not less than £10.

The question of law was,—“Is the claimant entitled to be enrolled as claimed?”

Argued for the claimant;—The claim here was rested on the franchise conferred by the Reform Act of 1832 on holders of property above £10 annual value under a long lease.¹ That franchise, like other older franchises, still remained.² It was not necessary, therefore, for the claimant to claim as an owner, although, no doubt, the holder of a long lease might now, if he pleased, claim as an owner.³ That he might claim under either description, was decided in the case of Kirk,⁴ where a tenant on a long lease was allowed to combine that title with that of tenant under an annual lease, a thing he could not have done if the former were necessarily to be held to be equivalent to ownership. No doubt, as argued on the other side, occupancy was considered as of the essence of the claim in that case, but simply because the subject was only worth £3, 10s., and occupation even under the Reform Act of 1832 was necessary in such a case. If the tenant did not claim as an owner, then he was not obnoxious to the 4th section of the Act of 1884, which, as interpreted by the 11th section, struck only at pro indiviso proprietors; it had been passed to do away with faggot votes, and was directed against owners only, that being the title under which

¹ 2 and 3 Will. III. c. 65, sec. 9 (Reform Act, 1832).

² 31 and 32 Vict. c. 48, sec. 56 (Representation of the People Act, 1868).

³ 31 and 32 Vict. c. 48, sec. 59.

⁴ Kirk v. McGowan, Oct. 24, 1870, 9 Macph. 11, 43 Scot. Jur. 11.

No. 27. faggot votes were always held, for no one had ever heard a tenant called a faggot voter.

Nov. 26, 1886.
Cunninghame
v. Grossart.

Secondly, these houses were occupied by the firm, who were bona fide carrying on business, these houses being part of their assets.

Argued for the objector;—Tenants under long leases had been raised by the 59th section of the 1868 Act to the position of proprietors. That was thenceforth their character, and they must claim under it. To enforce this contention was not to defeat any franchise given by the Reform Act of 1832. The franchise still remained, but it had a different name. At all events the Statute of 1884, when it spoke of "owner," must be taken to include those who were by the Act of 1868 entitled to that name, and if that were so this claim was inadmissible. The case of Kirk was decided on this ratio, that the claimant there was actually in personal occupation under the long lease, and truly, therefore, was "tenant to all intents and purposes."¹ That was not the case here, for there was no personal occupancy.

Secondly, there being no personal occupancy, the claimant not bona fide carrying on business therein, the exception to the 4th clause of the Act of 1884 did not apply.

At advising,—

LORD CRAIGHILL.—The question for our decision appears to me to be attended with difficulty, and there cannot be a satisfactory determination without minute attention to the provisions of the other Reform Acts, by which the law of the question is now regulated. If the law had been now as it would have been between 1832, when the first Reform Act was passed, and 1868, when the second Reform Act was passed, the right of the appellant to enrolment could not be doubted, but there was a material change effected by the latter of these statutes. Prior to 1868 joint tenants of a property, whatever the number might be, were entitled to be enrolled, under section 9 of the Reform Act of 1832, the lease which they held being for not less than fifty-seven years, if the value of the interest of each in the subject was not less than £10. But in 1868, by the 14th section of the Scottish Reform Act of that year (31 and 32 Vict. c. 48), it was enacted that "where any such lands and heritages shall be owned, held, or occupied by more persons than one as joint owners, whether in fee or in liferent, or as joint tenants and joint occupants of the same as the case may be, each of such joint owners shall be entitled to be registered and to vote, provided his share or interest in the said lands and heritages is of the annual value of £5, provided always that no greater number of persons than two shall be entitled to be registered." There was by this enactment a material change upon the relative provision of the Act of 1832. By the latter any number of joint tenants, if their interest were of sufficient value, were entitled to be enrolled, but by the former the right of enrolment, however numerous the joint tenants might be, and each possessing an interest of sufficient value, was restricted to two. At first sight this appears to be in conflict with section 56 of the Act of 1868, which enacts that a franchise conferred by this Act shall be in addition to, and not in substitution for, any existing franchise. But there is in truth no inconsistency. The qualification for the franchise created by the Act of 1832 remains as it was. All that was done by subsequent legislation was to limit the number of those by whom this franchise might be exercised. Since 1868, accordingly, the right of joint tenants under long leases, whatever the number of tenants might be, has been limited to the number to which by that statute the right to enrolment was restricted. No. 27.

¹ Per Lord Benholme in Kirk v. M'Gowan, 9 Macph. p. 12.

The Act of 1884 proceeded still further in the way of limitation. It was Nov. 26, 1886. Canninghame v. Grossart. thereby (sec. 4, subsec. 2) enacted that where "two or more men are owners, either as joint tenants or as tenants in common, of an estate in any land or tenement, one of such men, but not more than one, shall, if his interest is sufficient to confer on him a qualification as a voter in respect of the ownership of such estate, be entitled (in the like cases, and subject to the like conditions as if he were the sole owner) to be registered as a voter, and when registered to vote at an election."

The question for decision depends upon our view of the true interpretation of this provision. The conclusion to which I have come is, that as the claimant is a joint tenant, and as another joint tenant is already on the roll, the claimant's right to enrolment is barred by the enactment which has now been quoted. The joint tenants, to whom along with others this enactment relates, are the same joint tenants as were the subjects of enactment in section 14 in the Act of 1868, and it appears to me that it would be anomalous were one interpretation given to the enactment in the one statute, and a different interpretation given to the enactment in the other. No doubt there is in subsection 2 of section 4 of the Act of 1884 an expression which suggests difficulty. The subsection begins with the words "where two or more men are owners," which affords apparent plausibility to the contention that the enactment applies only to those who are owners of the property which affords the qualification. But this, I think, is not an expression which affects the result when read in connection with the words which follow, for there are in the sense of the word "owner," as used in the Reform Acts, two sets of persons to whom that description may be applied. One is owners or proprietors in the ordinary sense of the words. The other is joint tenants under long leases for not less than fifty-seven years. This result is brought out by the interpretation clause, sec. 59 of the Act of 1868. "Proprietor or owner," it is there enacted, shall include any person who shall hold "under a lease for a period of not less than fifty-seven years, exclusive of breaks." This being so, it seems to me that subsec. 2 of sec. 4 of the Act of 1884 was properly framed to suit the circumstances as these were left by the previous Acts of Parliament. "Owner" was taken to include tenants under long leases as well as proprietors in the ordinary acceptance. The case of both was to be provided for, and both were provided for in the same way. Of two or more men who are owners either as joint tenants or as tenants in common, it is enacted that one, but not more than one, will be entitled to be registered as a voter, and when registered to vote at an election, and, as Mr Main is already on the roll, the claimant is not entitled also to be put on the register.

For these reasons I concur with the Sheriff-substitute, and am of opinion that the appeal against his decision ought to be dismissed. It was maintained in the course of the argument that this view which I have adopted is inconsistent with the decision of this Court in the case of Kirk, 9 Macph. 11. The rubric of that case is,—“Held that it was competent to combine contemporaneous possession of one subject on an annual lease, and of another on a lease of sixty years, to constitute a qualification as a tenant, although by the Act of 1868 any person who shall hold under a lease for a period of not less than fifty-seven years, inclusive of breaks,” is defined to be included under the term “proprietor or owner.” The reason of that decision is this, the definition in the Act of 1868

No. 27. had extended the meaning of "owner" beyond the ordinary acceptance of the term, and was held to include under it a joint tenant or tenant under a lease for a period of not less than fifty-seven years. The claimant there had been in possession under a lease for sixty years; he afterwards came to be in possession as tenant from year to year of another subject, and he sought to combine these two qualifications so as to make out a subject of sufficient annual value to sustain his claim. It was said that there could be no reference to the lease under which he was tenant for sixty years, because when you go to the interpretation clause you find that a tenant for such a period has been turned into an owner. The Court said that this is a view which you may take; you may claim as owner if you please, but there is an alternative, and you are entitled to take advantage of either character.

Nov. 26, 1886.
Cunninghame
v. Grossart.

The view I take of the present case appears not inconsistent with the view then taken by the Court. I think that Mr Cunningham is not an owner at all unless he seeks to avail himself of that character. He says he is a joint tenant and is nothing else. I take that to be so. The change introduced, as I have said, by the Act of 1868 is not a change of franchise. Tenancy is a good qualification, and so is joint tenancy, but there is a limit to the number of those that may be enrolled as joint tenants upon one subject, and it is because of that limit so introduced that, in my opinion, the Sheriff did right when he refused to sustain this claim.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. The question is whether the appellant and his partner are owners as joint tenants of the subjects in respect of which the claim is made. That the appellant is a joint tenant does not appear to admit of question. That appears on the face of the case, and he cannot be otherwise described in legal language. The next question is, Is he owner as joint tenant? I think he is, for he is so described in the Act of 1868, sec. 59, which, except in so far as it is inconsistent with the later Act, is made part of it.

But then "joint tenant" is said to include "pro indiviso proprietor" in the interpretation clause of the Act of 1884. That is so, but "joint tenant" is not defined as meaning "pro indiviso proprietor," but merely as including it. We are asked to read the clause as implying that "pro indiviso proprietor" in Scotland is to be held equivalent to "joint tenant" in England, but I cannot accede to that argument.

I agree with Lord Craighill in thinking that the difficulty is cleared away by an examination of the previous statutes, and I agree with him in the distinction he takes between this case and that of Kirk v. M'Gowan.

LORD MURE.—Under the 14th section of the Act of 1868, which limits the right of joint tenants and joint owners to be put on the roll, this gentleman's qualification would be quite good. An objection is now made to it under the new statute, which further reduces the number of electors qualified to be put on the roll in respect of the same subject. The question is, What is the true meaning of the 4th section of the Act of 1884?

Now, the expression "owner as joint tenant" is an expression quite unknown to the law of Scotland. It must refer to an English qualification, not to any qualification in this country. But then, by the definition clause, "joint tenant" is defined as a pro indiviso proprietor, confirming the opinion that, in the view of the makers of the statute, joint tenants are in the same class as owners.]

the matter had stood upon these two clauses I should have been clear that this claim was good. No. 27.

But a difficulty is created by the Act of 1868, to which Lord Craighill has referred, for there tenants under a long lease are declared to be owners. The difficulty lies there, but that very point was brought up for decision in the case of Kirk, no doubt in a somewhat different shape. The Judges there laid down that that provision only gave the voter the privilege of claiming as an owner if he chose so to claim, but did not deprive him of his proper character as tenant. Now, if the claimant here is not an owner, but merely a tenant, his qualification does not seem to me to be affected by the limitation of the Act of 1884.

I do not actually dissent from the decision, but my difficulties remain.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal.

MACRAE, FLETT, & RENNIE, W.S.—MYLNE & CAMPBELL, W.S.—Agents.

Nov. 26, 1886.
Cunninghame
v. Grossart.

JAMES SMITH, Objector (Appellant).—Maconochie.

JOHN M'DONALD, Respondent.—Strachan.

No. 28.

Nov. 26, 1886.
Smith v.
M'Donald.

Election Law—County Franchise—Inhabitant-occupier—Change of qualification.—Held that a person who had been for twelve months preceding 31st July in occupation of a dwelling-house in a county, but had removed from it in September, and was consequently not in occupation when the Sheriff came to consider his right at a Registration Court in October, fell to be struck off the roll, and that although he had removed to and then occupied another house in the same division of the county, and would have been entitled to be enrolled had he lodged a new claim.

JOHN M'DONALD stood on the roll of voters for South Ayrshire as tenant of a house at Craigmark, Dalmellington. Registration Appeal Court.
Sheriff of Ayrshire.
B.

James Smith objected to the voter's name remaining on the roll, on the ground that he had ceased to occupy the house.

The following facts were admitted by both parties:—That John M'Donald, who was described on the assessor's list as collier, Craigmark, tenant, house, Craigmark, removed with his family from his house at Craigmark, in the parish of Dalmellington, which he had occupied since July 1885, in September 1886, and from that date till the date of the Registration Court had been inhabitant occupier as tenant of a separate dwelling-house at Bank, New Cumnock, within the same division of Ayrshire.

It was admitted that John M'Donald had removed at a date in September which allowed him sufficient time to give notice to the assessor that his qualification had changed.

The Sheriff-substitute (Paterson) repelled the objection.

The objector having required a case the Sheriff-substitute set forth the facts already stated, and submitted this question of law, viz.:—"Whether John M'Donald, having removed from the dwelling-house at Craigmark on which he is enrolled, is entitled to be retained on the roll on that enrolment?"

Argued for the objector;—It would be a strange thing if a voter were entitled to be enrolled and to vote on a subject to which, ex concessis, he had no right. Nor was this a merely technical objection, as would be seen by reference to the provisions for registration. By sec. 8, subsec. 6 of the Representation of the People Act of 1884, the provisions as to burgh registration were made the rule for counties also. These provisions were contained in the Burgh Registration Act of 1856,¹ as amended by the ¹ 19 and 20 Vict. c. 58, secs. 2 and 3.

No. 28. Reform Act of 1868.¹ By them the assessor's list was made up on the 15th September, and was to be open to inspection till the 21st, and claims must be lodged before the 21st. These provisions were designed to give all voters on the roll an opportunity of looking into their neighbours' qualifications and objecting to them, an object which would be defeated if the present claim were sustained, for no one had been warned that M'Donald's claim was made in respect of his new house at Bank. His proper course was to have taken advantage of "the proper machinery provided by the Act,"² and lodged a new claim. The voter must continue in occupation up to the date when the Sheriff sits, or else make a new claim.³

Nov. 26, 1886.
Smith v.
M'Donald.

Argued for the respondent;—The voter here was entitled on the last day of July to have his name inserted, as it had in fact been inserted, and any claim must have reference to that date.⁴ Nor was it at all anomalous that he should be entitled to be so enrolled, for it must be admitted that a voter once enrolled was entitled to vote even although he should have left the country altogether, a result much more startling than what was contended for here, where the voter was still in the same division of the county. To cut off this enrolment would be harsh and unjust to labourers, colliers and others, who frequently shifted their houses between terms. But the important point of time in the electoral year, with reference to which a man's claim must be judged, was the 31st July. That was the date up to which parochial relief would disqualify.⁵ Again, the period of four months, being the maximum period during which an occupier might let his house without disqualification, was limited to the year before 31st July.⁶ In short "there is a period within which all the elements of qualification or of disqualification must be found, and that period is twelve months back from the last day of July in the year of the claim."⁷ In Donaldson's case the voter had no qualification at all when the Sheriff took up his case. In the cases of Livingstone and Allan the voter had not the necessary qualification for the necessary length of time on 31st July.

At advising,—

LORD MURE.—On the facts stated it is pretty clear to my mind that the party here is in the position of having removed from the house he previously occupied and so has lost his qualification. No doubt he has gone to another house which would give him a qualification, but unfortunately he has not given notice to the assessor of the change he has made, nor has he made any claim.

Now, it is in accordance with the decisions that a party, who, when the Sheriff proceeds to consider his claim, is objected to on the ground that he has lost his qualification, if he has in point of fact lost it, cannot remain on the roll. That is settled, and it is equally well settled that, assuming him to have got a new qualification, it is necessary for him to give notice of it to the assessor or to claim to be enrolled upon it. That was settled in the cases of Donaldson, Livingstone, and Allan referred to.

¹ 31 and 32 Vict. c. 48, sec. 20.

² Per Lord Ormisdale in Livingstone v. Oman, Nov. 2, 1877, 5 R. p. 1.

³ Donaldson v. Cree, Dec. 19, 1868, 7 Macph. 330, 41 Scot. Jur. 193; Allan v. Smith, Nov. 5, 1879, 7 R. 6.

⁴ 19 and 20 Vict. c. 58, sec. 3 (Burghs Registration Act, 1856).

⁵ 31 and 32 Vict. c. 48 (Representation of People Act, 1868), sec. 3.

⁶ 41 and 42 Vict. c. 5 (Occupiers Disqualification Removal Act, 1878), sec. 2.

⁷ Per Lord Ardmillan in Hewat v. Henderson, Nov. 9, 1874, 2 R. at p. 15.

In these circumstances we had a very able argument from Mr Strachan on the question whether these decisions were applicable to cases under the Act of 1868, inasmuch as the enfranchising clauses were sufficient to shew that, if a man was actually in possession of a qualification sufficient to entitle him to be enrolled up to the end of July, that was enough. That was rather a startling proposition, keeping in view the practice which has been in use ever since the Reform Act of 1832. Nothing can be clearer than that under that statute the fact of having lost a qualification after the end of July is a good objection to the retention of the name on the roll. That is made clear by the form of objection given in the schedule H of that Act, which has been in use as a good form of objection ever since.

The words of the Statute of 1868 too discountenance the view for which Mr Strachan contended. They are (sec. 3),—"Every man shall . . . be entitled to be registered as a voter, . . . who, when the Sheriff proceeds to consider his right to be inserted or retained on the register of voters, is qualified as follows, viz., . . . (2) is . . . an inhabitant-occupier as owner or tenant of any dwelling-house." Then there are words shewing that he must not only be in occupancy at the date of making up the register, but must have been so for twelve months immediately preceding 31st July. I am therefore of opinion that the Sheriff did wrong in admitting this man.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—It is clear both upon the decisions and on principle that we must take a different view from the Sheriff. Mr Strachan overlooked this, that with regard to forms we are not bound by the Act of 1856, for we are only bound by it in so far as it is not inconsistent with the provisions of later Acts, and it is applicable "with the necessary alterations of notices and other forms" (48 and 49 Vict. c. 3, sec. 8, subsec. 6).

Now, previously to the Act of 1868 the sole inquiry was whether the person claiming had been in possession for twelve months back from 31st July. But then there was introduced a provision necessitating inquiry not only into what was the state of matters in July, but what is the state of matters when the Sheriff is sitting in judgment. It is the law introduced by that statute to which we are to have regard, and therefore I concur with your Lordship.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, and remitted to the Sheriff to expunge the name from the roll.

J. & F. ANDERSON, W.S.—W. WHITE MILLAR, S.S.C.—Agents.

ANDREW HUNTER BALLINGAL, Objector (Appellant).—Darling.
ARCHIBALD MENZIES, Respondent.—Young.

No. 29.

Nov. 26, 1886.
Ballingal v.
Menzies.

Election Law—County Franchise—Inhabitant-occupier—Service Franchise —"Dwelling-house"—Reform Act, 1884 (48 and 49 Vict. c. 3), sec. 3.—A clerk in the employment of a hydropathic company occupied as sole occupant a room in the building belonging to the company. No particular room was expressly stipulated for by him, but when he entered on his employment a room was given to him which he had occupied for ten years; part of its furni-

No. 29.

Nov. 26, 1886.
Ballingal v.
Menzies.

ture belonged to him. He took no meals in this room, but either in the servants' hall or the reception-room. During about four months in winter he left the room thus occupied by him and lived in a smaller and more comfortable room. No one occupied the other room in his absence; he was entitled to use it, and he moved from the one to the other of his own choice. The house-steward had a room in the building set apart for him, but usually resided in a separate house in the neighbouring village.

Held that the clerk inhabited a "dwelling-house" in the sense of the 3d section of the Reform Act of 1884, and that the "dwelling-house" was not inhabited by any person under whom he served, and that therefore he was entitled to be registered.

Registration
Appeal Court.
Sheriff of Perthshire.
B.

IN the Registration Court for West Perthshire objection was taken to the name of Archibald Menzies being on the roll, his character and qualification being that of "tenant and occupant of house, Strathearn Hydropathic, Crieff"; the franchise claimed was that known as the "service franchise," introduced by the 3d section of the Representation of the People Act, 1884.*

In 1876 Archibald Menzies had been engaged by the directors of the Strathearn Hydropathic Company, Limited, to act as a clerk, and he had since been in the employment of the said company in that capacity. When so engaged the company agreed that besides his wages he should have, in virtue of his said employment, a separate room in the main building. No particular room was expressly stipulated; but when he entered on service a room in the building was allotted to him, and he had for ten years occupied as sole occupant that room as his bedroom during the summer of each year. During the winter months he slept in a smaller room; he did so of his own choice, and for the sake of the greater warmth of that room. During these months he was entitled to use the other and larger room in which his bed was left, to which he had free access, and which was not occupied by anyone else. He was in the habit of using the smaller room from the end of October until May or thereby, but the exact times when he went to it and left it varied each year, and depended on the state of the weather and the temperature. Part of the furniture in the larger room belonged to him, and part of it to the company. He took his meals either in the servants' hall or in the reception-room—sometimes in the one, sometimes in the other.

The Strathearn Hydropathic is a limited company, managed and conducted by Dr Meikle, who is employed and paid by the company, and who resides in a house adjacent to the main building, and by a house-steward who has a house in the village of Crieff, in which he usually resides, but he resides sometimes in the building, in which there is a room appropriated to him. Archibald Menzies was subject to the orders of the house-steward; but both were subject to the orders of Dr Meikle. No director of the company resided in the building.

The Sheriff (Gloag) repelled the objection, whereupon the objector required a case, which was accordingly stated by the Sheriff.

The foregoing facts were set forth, and this question of law was stated:—"Whether, in respect of the foresaid facts, the said Archibald Menzies is entitled to be entered on the roll in respect of the qualification set forth in the 3d section of the Act 48 and 49 Vict. cap. 3?"

* 48 and 49 Vict. c. 3, sec. 3.—"Where any man himself inhabits any dwelling-house by virtue of any office, service, or employment, and the dwelling-house is not inhabited by any person under whom such man serves in such office, service, or employment, he shall be deemed . . . to be an inhabitant-occupier of such dwelling-house as a tenant."

Argued for the objector;—(1) The respondent was not, in the sense of the Act, an inhabitant-occupier, and (2) if he was, the dwelling-house was inhabited by one under whom he served.

No. 29.
Nov. 26, 1886.
Ballingal v.
Menzie.

(1) He was not an inhabitant-occupier, for the franchise introduced by the Act was limited to cases where a "house or part of a house was occupied as a separate dwelling."¹ That was meant to apply to cases where a man lived in a one-roomed house, complete in itself. This argument was supported by the recent case of Brown,² where a right to occupy part of the dining-room was alleged, and was looked upon as essential to the validity of the claim. It would be a strange result if this man were held to have "a separate dwelling" in respect of a room where he never took a meal, and from which, moreover, he was absent for six months of the year. For the franchise claimed, actual personal occupation was surely an essential.

(2) The house-steward inhabited the dwelling-house of which Menzie's room was a part. It was plainly absurd to argue that "dwelling-house" in the second part of the clause meant the same thing as "dwelling-house" in the first part of it; for if so, a butler, e.g., could not be excluded unless his master slept in the same bedroom with him. The steward here was as much an inhabitant as the clerk, and that was sufficient to defeat the claim; true, he was not the employer, but the words of the statute were "under whom such man serves," not "whom such man serves." [LORD MURE.—I am under the impression that this question was decided in England in the case of Marshall & Snelgrove's Shopmen, after there had been contradictory decisions by different revising barristers.] That was so, and the claims had been admitted.³ But the present case was distinguishable from that. There no one lived in the premises except the claimants, for the caretaker was not looked on as an occupant, and there was a particular room where all had their meals regularly and as part of the arrangement under which they lived there, a fact which assimilated their case rather to that of the claimants in Brown's case.²

Argued for the respondent;—The one room, of which he had the exclusive use, was enough to satisfy the statute, and the present case was very close to the English case cited.³ There, as here, there was no dining in the separate "dwelling-house," not because that privilege was denied to the occupants, but because it was more convenient for them to dine elsewhere, viz., in a common room. That the voter here did not all the year round actually use his room was not sufficient to defeat his claim. The fact that it was open to him all the time and closed to all others just shewed the fulness and exclusiveness of his right.

Second, It was maintained that "dwelling-house" must mean the same thing in both parts of the clause, so that the master or upper servant must occupy the same rooms as the lower servant before the claim could be defeated. [LORD KINNEAR.—That seems very hard to maintain. Had you not better read the interpretation clause (sec. 11, subsec. 4) into the 3d section, so as to make it run,—“Where a man inhabits any house or part of a house as a separate dwelling . . . and that house is not inhabited by any person under whom such man serves”?] Besides, the house steward did not inhabit the hydropathic establishment. He had a house in Crieff, and the case, if properly read, implied that that was his habitation.

¹ 48 and 49 Vict. c. 3, sec. 7, subsec. 4, defining "dwelling-house."

² Brown v. Martins, Nov. 6, 1885, 13 R. 159.

³ Stribling v. Halse, Nov. 2, 1885, L. R., 16 Q. B. Div. 246.

No. 29. At advising,—

Nov. 26, 1886.
Ballingal v.
Menzies.

LORD MURE.—Upon the facts as stated it does not appear to me to admit of doubt that if the respondent had continued to use the room so allotted to him as his bedroom throughout the year, his qualification and right to remain upon the roll would be established in respect of the provision of the 3d section of the statute. It is precisely the same question as that which was decided in England with reference to a service qualification in the case of Stribling, L. R., 16 Q. B. Div. 246, to which we were referred in the discussion, and which depends upon whether a bedroom so occupied by a party who takes his meals in another room in the same house is to be considered as a “dwelling-house” in the sense of the statute, and it was held that it did. Now, by the 7th section of the Act of 1884, sub-division (4) “the expression dwelling-house in Scotland” is said to mean “any house or part of a house occupied as a separate dwelling,” and it appears to me that a separate room allotted to a clerk, and occupied by him as his bedroom, being part of a house, falls within the definition of a separate dwelling in the sense of the statute.

But the difficulty raised in this case arises from the fact that the respondent did not use this room as his bedroom throughout the whole of the year. For the case bears that “during the winter months he slept in a smaller room of his own choice, and for the sake of greater warmth,” and if while he did this he had given over the larger room to someone else, I should have had great difficulty in adhering to the Sheriff’s decision, although even then the principle of the successive occupancy clause in the Act of 1868 would have afforded strong ground for maintaining that the substantiale of the qualification remained. In the present case, however, no such difficulty is raised. For the case bears that “during these months the respondent was entitled to use the other and larger room in which his bed was left, to which he had free access, and which was not occupied by anyone else.” In these circumstances it appears to me that the decision of the Sheriff refusing to remove the respondent from the roll should be adhered to. Because, although he does not appear to have actually used the room during the winter months as his bedroom, but to have slept by permission of the manager of the company in a warmer room, his right so to occupy it at any time he chose remained, and he moved into it and used it as his bedroom in the spring whenever it suited his convenience. That, I think, is sufficient to entitle him to retain his qualification.

Upon the further question raised, as to his qualification being affected by the residence of a manager or house steward in the building under whom he was bound to serve, I am of opinion that upon the facts no such residence is proved.

LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur, but I confess that had it not been for the decision in the case of Stribling v. Halse, I should have had some doubt whether a person who has the exclusive use of the room in which he sleeps, and a joint use with other persons of other rooms in which he carries on business or eats, can be said to inhabit his bedroom. But that is my only difficulty, and that has been settled, as I think, by the case of Stribling v. Halse. That decision is not binding on us, but I agree with your Lordships in thinking that we should not lightly differ from the decision of the Court of Appeal in England on the interpretation of a statute which was passed to give a uniform franchise in the two countries. No. 29.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal.

D. FORBES DALLAN, S.S.C.—J. KNOX CRAWFORD, S.S.C.—Agents.

Nov. 26, 1886.
Ballingal v.
Mansie.

JOHN EGLINTON MONTGOMERIE AND OTHERS (W. S. Stirling Crawford's Trustees), First Parties.—Balfour—Guthrie.

CAPTAIN JAMES STIRLING STIRLING STUART, Second Party.—Sol.-Gen. Robertson—C. K. Mackenzie.

THE DOWAGER-DUCHESS OF MONTROSE, Third Party.—Balfour—C. J. Guthrie.

No. 30.

Nov. 26, 1886.
Stirling Crawford's Trustees.

Heir and Executor—Warrandice—By whom obligation of warrandice prestable—Catholic security.—An obligation to free lands of debt arising under the warrandice clause of a disposition falls to be satisfied by the executor of the grantor of the disposition in a question between him and the heir.

In a trust-disposition and settlement, executed in 1853, the grantor conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees, for the purpose, inter alia, failing heirs of his body, of conveying his estate of M, and his other lands in the county of L, to his brother, and the heirs of his body, under the fetters of an entail. By the same deed he directed his trustees, failing his own issue, to make over the whole residue of his estate to the person who should succeed to M. By a codicil, dated in 1876, he disposed to his wife, in the event of her surviving him, the lands of B and A (which were among the lands originally directed to be entailed), and bequeathed to her the whole residue of his estate. The disposition of B and A contained a clause of warrandice in ordinary form under the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 101), which imports absolute warrandice. In 1882 the truster granted a bond and disposition in security for £250,000 over the estates of M, B, and A. Held, in a question between the widow and the brother of the truster, the institute under the entail of M, that the debt of £250,000 fell to be apportioned between them according to the respective values of M on the one hand, and B and A on the other, and that, assuming that the widow had a claim under the clause of warrandice to have B and A cleared of debt, it was not a claim against the heir of the truster, but fell to be satisfied out of the residue which had been bequeathed to her.

WILLIAM STUART STIRLING CRAWFURD, of Milton, was married on 22d January 1876 to the Dowager-Duchess of Montrose. He died on 23d February 1883, survived by his wife. He left a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 21st October 1853, by which he conveyed mortis causa his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees for the purpose (after paying debts and legacies) of conveying Milton, and any other lands and heritages in the county of Lanark which should belong to him at his death, to the heirs of his body, whom failing, to his brother, Captain James Stirling Stirling Stuart of Castlemilk, and the heirs of his body, with a further destination, under the fetters of a strict entail. By the same deed he directed his trustees to make over the whole residue of his estate, failing his own issue, to the person who should succeed to Milton on his death. 2ND DIVISION. I.

He left, among other testamentary writings, a codicil, dated 1st November 1876, whereby, inter alia, in the event of his wife surviving him, he disposed and bequeathed to her the lands of Balornock, in the Barony Parish of Glasgow, and the lands of Auchinearn, in the parish of Cadder and county of Lanark, and expressly excepted these lands from the lands by his said settlement directed to be entailed, and directed his trustees to include in the entail the lands and estate of Milton only; and

No. 30. thereby he also bequeathed to his said wife the whole residue of his estate, heritable and moveable, wherever situated, with the exception of the estate of Milton, and of any special bequests by him.

Nov. 26, 1886.
Stirling Crawford's Trustees.

The codicil contained a description of the lands of Balornock and Auchinearn, and the following clauses:—"And I bind and oblige myself, and my heirs and successors, to grant all deeds and writings which may be necessary for making the foregoing conveyance and bequest of the said lands of Balornock, Auchinearn, and others, in favour of the said Duchess, my wife, and her heirs and successors, valid and effectual: To be held; the said lands and others hereby conveyed, a me vel de me; and I resign the said lands and others for new infestment or investiture; and I assign the writs; and I assign the rents from and after the period of my death; and I bind myself, my heirs and successors, to free and relieve the said Duchess, my wife, and her foresaids, of all feu-duties, casualties, and public burdens payable for, or in respect of said lands and others, up to the said period; and I grant warrandice."

At the date of Mr Stirling Crawford's death there was a bond and disposition in security for £250,000 affecting the lands of Milton, and also the lands of Balornock and Auchinearn. This deed was dated 9th November 1882, and recorded on the 13th November 1882 and 23d January 1883.

Various questions arose under Mr Stirling Crawford's testamentary deeds between the Dowager-Duchess and Captain James Stirling Stirling Stuart of Castlemilk, Mr Stirling Crawford's brother, who was entitled under the trust-disposition and settlement to be the institute in the entail of the estate of Milton to be executed by the trustees. A special case was presented to the Court to have these determined. Among the matters in dispute was the question on whom the liability for the sum of £250,000 contained in the bond and disposition in security fell. Captain Stirling Stirling Stuart, the party of the second part in the special case, maintained that the bond was apportionable as in a question between him and the Dowager-Duchess, the party of the third part, and that the estate of Milton was entitled to relief from a share thereof in the proportion of the respective values of the estates of Milton on the one hand, and Balornock and Auchinearn on the other. The Dowager-Duchess maintained that the said bond fell to be met entirely out of the estate of Milton.

The question of law submitted to the Court on this point was,—“Is the bond for £250,000 entirely chargeable against the estate of Milton; or, as in a question between the party of the second part and the party of the third part, is the estate of Milton entitled to relief out of Mr Stirling Crawford's residuary estate from a share thereof in the proportion of the respective values of Milton on the one hand, and Balornock and Auchinearn on the other?”

Argued for the third party;—The disposition to the third party of Balornock and Auchinearn in the codicil of 1st November 1876 contained a clause of warrandice, which was in the form given in schedule B of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 101), and therefore (under section 8 of the statute) was a clause of absolute warrandice. Mr Stirling Crawford had therefore undertaken to give these estates to the third party free of all incumbrance.¹ It was clear that he intended this debt to be heritable, and therefore it fell to be paid by the second party as the heir in heritage. The third party, as residuary legatee, must have relief against the heir in heritage if she paid off the debt.¹ This view was strengthened by the fact that the deceased had charged the debt on Milton as well as on the estates disposed to the third party.

¹ Coventry v. Coventry, July 8, 1834, 12 S. 895, 6 Scot. Jur. 486; Strong v. Strong, Jan. 29, 1851, 13 D. 548, 23 Scot. Jur. 244; Ersk. ii. 3, 27; Macalister v. Macalister's Executors, Feb. 28, 1866, 4 Macph. 495, 38 Scot. Jur. 231.

No. 30.

Nov. 26, 1886.
Stirling Crawford's Trustees.

Argued for the second party ;—Apart from the question of warrandice, the debt would fall on the estates proportionally.² The third party, as donee, with a clause importing absolute warrandice by the disponent, might have a claim for relief against his representatives, but the question was, who was primarily bound to satisfy the claim,—the heir or the executor of the deceased. The obligation of warrandice was simply an obligation to pay money. It was personal, not real warrandice, and was an obligation to indemnify in case of eviction.³ The party evicted would claim damages in money, and such a claim must fall on the executor, not on the heir. The present claim arose under a mortis causa disposition, but the principle was the same as under an ordinary disposition to a purchaser. The third party, as residuary legatee, must satisfy such a claim herself. The argument for her assumed that because the debt to be cleared off was heritable, that therefore the obligation to clear it off must be heritable and fall on the heir.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This question is in regard to the bond for £250,000 charged over the estates of Milton, Balornock, and Auchinearn, Milton belonging to the heir of entail, but Balornock and Auchinearn having been settled on the truster's wife, the Duchess of Montrose. The point which arises is whether the obligation of warrandice contained in the settlement of these two estates is prestable by the personal representatives of the grantor of the conveyance, or is a charge upon the heir in heritage. Upon that point, as a general point, I have no doubt whatever. It does not follow because a man disposes real estate, and comes under an obligation in regard to it, that the obligation is a debt against his heir, being heritable in its character. Exactly the reverse may be the case. Where a disponent conveys land to a donee, and undertakes over and above his disposition either to clear the estate of outstanding debt and burdens affecting it, or to relieve the donee for the future of burdens that may affect it, as in the case of augmentations of stipend, these may be personal obligations, and it does not alter their character that they refer to a landed estate. The obligation of warrandice here is exactly in that position, for it is contended that Mr Stirling Crawford undertook that no burden should be put on Balornock and Auchinearn, and then that subsequently he borrowed £250,000, and charged this sum on the three estates of Milton, Balornock, and Auchinearn. It is said that was contrary to the obligation of warrandice undertaken in the disposition, and I shall assume that it was. I am not altogether satisfied that when Mr Stirling Crawford bound all three estates to repay the £250,000 that he had any intention to make one of them liable, and that the others should be free, although the obligation of warrandice granted six years before had no doubt that effect. I do not, however, raise any question of that kind, because there may be good reasons which would dispel any doubt that I have. But this is a simple obligation.

¹ Bell's Trustee v. Bell, Nov. 8, 1884, 12 R. 85 ; Duncan, June 22, 1883, 10 R. 1042 ; Macleod's Trustees, June 28, 1871, 9 Macph. 903, 43 Scot. Jur. 517 ; Douglas's Trustees v. Douglas, Jan. 17, 1868, 6 Macph. 223, 40 Scot. Jur. 113.

² Bell's Pr., sec. 1936.

³ Bell's Pr., secs. 894, 895 ; Stair, ii. 3, 46.

No. 30. tion not to burden these two estates, or to relieve them of any burden that might be imposed on them. That obligation, supposing it to subsist at all, is an obligation on the personal representatives, and not on the heir of the person granting it.

Nov. 26, 1886.
Stirling Crawford's Trustees.

LORD YOUNG.—My opinion concurs with that expressed by your Lordship. The deceased left at least three heritable properties, Milton, which went to his heir-at-law, his brother, not succeeding as heir but under a special disposition to himself, Balornock and Auchinearn, which similarly went to his widow, the third party to this case, under a disposition by him. There was a catholic security for debt over the whole three estates, without distinction, for a sum of £250,000. It was conceded, and properly so, that where there is a catholic security over two or more estates, and these are given to different parties, that the catholic security falls to be divided and distributed among them, according to the proportionate value of the estates. This is a case for applying that rule. But in the disposition to the widow of the two estates given to her there is a clause of warrandice, and the case was argued on the footing that a clause of absolute warrandice imports an obligation to clear off any debt from the property conveyed. The most familiar instance is where a man sells an estate burdened with debt, and sells it not subject to the debt, but with a clause of absolute warrandice, then he is under an obligation to pay it off. In that specimen instance there is no doubt that he must do so, and if he dies without doing so, the obligation would be good against his representatives, whether in heritage or in mobilibus. It is good against both to the party who is the creditor in the obligation, but in a question between heirs the executor is primarily liable, for the simple reason that it is a personal obligation. If the price has not been paid at his death the executor would get it. If it was paid before his death the executor would take it. The obligation is a simple personal obligation, and is primarily prestable, not by the heir in heritage, but by the executor who takes the money, out of which money any such obligation is to be discharged. The claim is just for so much money as will enable the holder of the obligation to clear off the debt which he is entitled to have cleared off. In this instance that is the proportion of £250,000 effeiring to the properties in the disposition in which the clause of warrandice occurs. The question is why should that claim for money be heritable. The answer given is, because it is to pay a heritable debt. But what has that to do with it? The secured creditor is a creditor in a heritable debt, because he has got security over the three estates, but the creditor in the obligation of the clause of warrandice is not. She holds no security for that obligation. If secured over any estate it would be over Balornock and Auchinearn, which, being her own, are no security to her. But it is really not secured over these at all. It is entire confusion to say that, because the obligation is to pay off heritable debt, therefore it is heritable.

The only consideration which affected my mind seriously, even temporarily, was whether the deceased, having made his widow his executrix and residuary legatee (so that his bounty to her would be diminished if she had to pay this debt), is not to be taken as having intended that it should be paid by his brother taking the estate of Milton. But I have rejected this without any doubt as unsound. She was made residuary legatee and executrix so early as 1876, but it is according to the rule of our law that every last will—any deed or number of deeds—whereby a person is made executrix or residuary legatee, is to be taken as speaking in the last moments of the rational existence of the deceased. When he put it on paper is generally quite immaterial. He might have altered afterwards this will made in 1876, and if he had, and given the residue of his estate to a third party, what reason could the widow have suggested for passing over that third party and going against his brother who took Milton? She happens to be the person to whom, in the last moments of his rational existence, he destined the residue of his estate, and therefore she is the person with means to satisfy the obligation.

I am perfectly satisfied on these considerations that she has no claim against the heir of Milton, or on the estate of Milton, to satisfy the proportion of the catholic debt, secured over the estates, effeiring to her own properties. If she had taken nothing else but these properties she would have had a claim against the heir or executor, primarily against the executor, but being herself the executrix, and taking the estate out of which the obligation is to be satisfied, I am clearly of opinion that she has no other claim.

LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I also concur. The third party is the disponee under a disposition mortis causa of the two estates of Balornock and Auchinearn. These were subject to a security for a debt which had been charged upon them. The disposition contained a clause of warrandice, and she claims to have the estates disburdened of the debt. It is admitted on both sides that the claim to that extent is well founded. The only question is on whom does the fulfilment of the obligation lie,—on the heir or on the executor? I think the obligation is distinctly a personal obligation. And all personal obligations must be fulfilled by the executor, because they are primarily obligations on him.

THE following interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords having heard counsel for the parties in the special case are of opinion that the bond for £250,000 is not entirely chargeable against the estate of Milton, and that that estate is entitled to relief out of Mr Stirling Crawford's residuary estate from a share of the said bond, in the proportion of the respective values of Milton on the one hand, and Balornock and Auchinearn on the other : Find and declare accordingly," &c.

JOHN C. BRODIE & SONS, W.S.—GRAHAM, JOHNSTON, & FLEMING, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN HUNTER, Pursuer (Appellant).—Moncreiff—Low.
SCHOOL BOARD OF LOCHGILPHEAD, Defenders (Respondents).—D.-F. Mackintosh—J. A. Reid.

No. 31.

Dec. 1, 1886.
Hunter v.
School Board
of Lochgilp-
head.

School—Powers of school board—Use of buildings.—A school board has a discretion to allow the use of its schools for purposes which do not interfere with proper educational purposes.

Held that a country school board had not abused this discretion by granting its school for five days in vacation to a charitable society to be used as a sleeping and cooking place for a large number of poor children brought from a town for a holiday.

Public trust—School Board—Jurisdiction—Sheriff.—Question whether the Sheriff has jurisdiction to control the managers of public property in their administration. Opinion (per Lord Young) that he has not.

No. 31.

Dec. 1, 1886.
Hunter v.
School Board
of Lochgilp-
head.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Argyll.
I.

JOHN HUNTER, surgeon, one of the members of the School Board of Lochgilphead, presented a petition in the Sheriff Court of Argyll, at Inverary, against the School Board of Lochgilphead, their clerk, and two of the members of the board, craving the Court to interdict the defenders "from granting the use of the old public school and playground, situated in the village of Lochgilphead, to the Glasgow Foundry Boys' Religious Society, or the 'Fair Week Trip Committee' of the said society, or to any person or persons for the purpose of affording accommodation for the Foundry Boys during their annual summer trip, or for any purposes other than are authorised by the disposition of the site thereof" and by the Education Act of 1872.

The disposition of the site of the school, granted by Mr Campbell of Auchindarroch to the Presbytery of Inveraray in 1851, bore that the site was granted as a site for a school for the education of poor persons and for the residence of a schoolmaster and schoolmistress, "and for no other purpose whatever."

At a meeting of the board, on 4th May 1885, a letter was read from the secretary of the "Glasgow Foundry Boys' Religious Society," a kind of Ragged School Society in Glasgow, asking the board for the use of the school for the children of the society from 17th to 22d July. The managers of the society annually took the children of the society to the country for a few days, and it was proposed to use the school buildings as a shelter for them at night or in bad weather, and as a cooking place. The use of the school had been granted to the society on several previous occasions, the last being in 1883 during the school vacation. In 1884 the use of it had been refused.

At this meeting on 4th May it was decided by the casting vote of the chairman to grant the use of the school. At another meeting on 6th July Dr Hunter moved that it should not be granted. For this motion two members voted, and for an amendment confirming the previous resolution the chairman and one other member voted. The other members being absent or declining to vote, the former resolution was confirmed by the casting vote of the chairman.

Thereupon Dr Hunter raised this action. The two members of the board called were the chairman and the member who had voted with him. They did not lodge defences. He averred,—“The school was refused in 1884 owing to the manner in which the privilege had been abused in 1883, when the forms were unscrewed and displaced, the bedding and litter left on the school premises after the departure of the boys, the walls and blackboards written upon, and various other acts done to the loss and damage of the property. The Foundry Boys are drawn from the lowest classes of Glasgow, and are under no authorised discipline or control. . . . Looking to the classes from which the Foundry Boys are drawn, he is of opinion that there is danger of infection and disease to the children attending the said school, as well as the risk of serious damage to the board's property.”

The School Board answered;—“Denied that the school was refused in the year 1884 owing to the manner stated by the pursuer. Explained that since the year 1866, being the first year that the Glasgow Foundry Boys' Religious Society commenced their annual summer trips to various places in Argyllshire and elsewhere, no case of an infectious nature has ever been heard of or reported to the society, and every precaution is taken by the responsible managers in charge of the society, who become responsible, and pay for cleaning the school after their departure.”

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defenders are not entitled to use the said schoolhouse and ground for other than educational purposes, or such as are sanctioned by the title thereto and the Acts of Parliament above quoted. (2) In any case the defenders are not entitled to grant the use of the said school to the Glasgow Foundry Boys' Religious Society, or to the Fair Week Trip Committee of said society, for affording accommodation to the Foundry Boys during their annual summer trip.

No. 31.
Dec. 1, 1886.
Hunter v.
School Board
of Lochgilp-
head.

The defenders pleaded;—(6) In the whole circumstances, the pursuer is not entitled to interdict as craved in the present action.

On 26th October the Sheriff-substitute (Campion) assoilzied the defenders on the ground that the application had been presented too late to interdict the defenders for 1885, and that he could not dispose of any question that might arise next year.

On 25th May 1886, the Sheriff (Irvine) recalled his Substitute's interlocutor, sustained the 6th plea in law for the defenders, and assoilzied them.*

* "NOTE.—In this cause the Sheriff has come practically to the same conclusion with the Sheriff-substitute, although on somewhat different grounds.

"He cannot consider the interdict here sought by the pursuer as limited to the single occasion now in question. It seems to him to be rather of the nature of a continuing interdict, and that it is thus necessary for its satisfactory disposal, to some extent at least, to go into the merits of the question here raised. And (1) as to the title to the ground on which these school buildings stand, and (2) the conditions and restrictions imposed there and in the Act of 1872, bearing on the uses to which alone these buildings may properly be applied, it seems to the Sheriff that these provisions are directed against permanent alienations of the schoolhouse for purposes opposed to its proper and primary use rather than against a temporary employment of that building for a limited and casual purpose like that in question, and therefore do not go very far towards solving the question here at issue.

"Nor does it appear that there exists anything in the shape of cases adjudged in the Courts of law to aid in this solution. In default of such authority, it might perhaps be thought that decisions of these Courts as to the legality of proposed applications of churches to other than their primary uses, of which some well-known instances are found in the books, might at least supply something by way of precedent or analogy, but here again the principles of decision are different. It is true that church buildings are not now, as they were in former times, devoted by consecration to the uses of public worship and the administration of the sacraments; yet a dedication of them, either actual or constructive, is recognised by our law,—'Though the formal consecration of things to sacred uses,' writes Mr Erskine, ii. l. 8, 'hath not been practised by the Church of Scotland since the Reformation (Mackenzie, sec. 4, h. t.), yet churches, communion cups, bells of churches, and other things destined to sacred purposes, retain to this day so much of the character of sacred that they are exempted from commerce, and so cannot be applied to the uses of private property while they continue in that state.' See also the opinion of Lord Medwyn in Kirk-Session of St Andrew v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, January 31, 1835, 13 S. 391. So Sir George Mackenzie, in the passage referred to by Erskine (Inst. ii. l. 4), includes among things that do not fall under commerce, 'things that are said to be no man's, but are juris divini, which are either sacred, such as the bells of churches; for though we have no consecration of things since the Reformation, yet some things have a relative holiness and sanctity, and so fall not under commerce, that is to say, cannot be bought and sold by private persons.'

"The law is similarly laid down by Bankton, ii. tit. 8, secs. 189 and 195. Reference may also be made to the cases of M'Naughtan v. Magistrates of Paisley, February 7th, 1835, 13 S. 432; and Easson v. Lawson, July 20th, 1843, 5 D. 1430. It would, however, appear that even as to the use of such buildings more freedom was sometimes allowed. 'It frequently happens,' says Mr Dunlop (Parochial Law, p. 60) 'that public meetings for objects totally apart from

No. 31.

Dec. 1, 1886.
Hunter v.
School Board
of Lochgilp-
head.

The pursuer appealed. Argued for him;—First, it was ultra vires of the board to give leave, but, second, even if they had a discretion to lend or let the school for purposes other than educational purposes, that discretion had been abused. The board could not use the school save for educational purposes, or grant it to others for any non-educational purpose, and the purpose must be one in which only their own parish was concerned. Otherwise the board, which had assessed the parish for the building of schools for the purposes of the Education Act, would be applying that assessment to a purpose and for the benefit of a set of persons for whom the Act did not authorise them to provide. They would be abusing their trust, and besides that contravening the conditions of their title. A school could not be lent for a flower show.¹ There was no doubt a custom of allowing the use of schools in country places for various kinds of local meetings, and it would be unreasonable to object to these. But the pursuer here appealed to the strict law, and relied on the cases in which the use of churches for other purposes than public worship had been prevented,² the character of the building there—consecrated by sentiment, if not by religious ceremonial—disposing the Court to apply the strict law even where, as in Easson's case,³ the proposed use was quasi ecclesiastical. But, if there was a discretion, the board had overstepped it. The pursuer here relied on his averments as to the damage done on former occasions and the risk of infection. These averments he offered to prove.

The defenders argued;—There were no doubt two questions here—First, assuming that the board had a discretion in the matter, had there been any act in excess of that discretion? and second, had the board a discretion at all, or was it not ultra vires to let or lend the school for any purpose other than education? If there was a discretion in cases of fire, anything relating to religion or to the affairs of the parish are held in the church, and that it is likewise used for meetings of Courts of law and formerly of freeholders for the election of members of Parliament. This use of churches is certainly contrary to an ancient law, which prohibited holding of Courts of law within churches and churchyards (Quoniam Attachiamenta, cap. 86); but how far since the Reformation our Courts would interfere to prevent such use of a church seems doubtful.

“As already said, there do not appear to be any decisions of the Courts fixing with certainty the allowable uses of school buildings, but from the very absence of such judgments it may not be too much to infer that these questions are usually left to the discretion of those who are responsible for the due and proper care of the fabric itself, to grant or to refuse its use as may seem fit, and, where granted, to impose such regulations and restrictions as may be necessary for the prevention of injury, or for the repair of any damage that may be done.

“Cases of abuse may from time to time arise, but these, where gross or clamant, will no doubt be corrected by the Courts. But the use here granted seems a charitable, or at least an innocent one, and it does not appear to the Sheriff to call for the intervention of the law for its prevention.”

¹ School Board of Kettle, per Lord Adam (Ordinary on the Bills), June 1878, Sellar's Manual of the Education Acts, 178.

² Kirk-Session of St Andrews v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, Jan. 31, 1835, 13 S. 391, 11 F. 213, 7 Scot. Jur. 187—(interdict against a ward meeting); McNaughtan v. Magistrates of Paisley, Feb. 7, 1835, 13 S. 432, 10 F. 251, 7 Scot. Jur. 214—(interdict against use of church bell).

³ Easson v. Town-Council of Dundee, July 20, 1843, 5 D. 1430, 15 Scot. Jur. 633—(interdict against meeting “to explain the present position of the church and enforce her missionary and other schemes”).

plague, or shipwreck,¹ it would, for instance, plainly fall to be exercised in favour of the victims. It was difficult to place any limit on discretion, but it was sufficient to say that here there were no averments that raised an extreme case. Any damage was to be made good, and the fear of infection was vain in connection with a barely furnished building like a schoolhouse.

No. 31.

Dec. 1, 1886.
Hunter v.
School Board
of Lochgilp-
head.

But was there a discretion? It would be a pity if there was not, for all admitted that it was usual to let or lend schools for meetings that were not educational. The London School Board had framed a set of rules to regulate the letting of their schools for evening meetings and Sunday schools.² If boards were not to be allowed to let their buildings, it might operate to the loss of the ratepayers both by way of loss of possible rent, and also by deterring boards from building useful adjuncts, e.g., gymnasia, which they might expect to pay for by contributions from persons other than pupils who might use them. It was jus tertii to appeal to the condition in the title, and that condition was pointed at a permanent alienation. The Education Act could not be held to forbid boards to let property belonging to them, such as old schools, and yet the pursuer must carry his argument that length. If public buildings generally had been declared by the Court to be capable of being used, each only for its primary purpose, no doubt this interdict must be granted. But the only class of cases cited was churches. At the root of all the authorities on that subject was the idea of the obligation incumbent on the Court and on burghal corporations to protect the Church of Scotland. Even although that distinction was sentimental, still, if it pervaded, as it did, these judgments, it prevented them from ruling any other class of cases.

At advising,—

Lord Young.—It appears that the charitable managers of the Glasgow Foundry Boys' Society provide an outing for the boys every summer, taking them generally to some sea-side place for a few days. They applied to the School Board of Lochgilphead for the use of the school as a kind of camping-ground for the boys at night. That use was granted, the school being then in vacation, and the buildings not being required for their ordinary use. But the pursuer maintained that this use was illegal, pleading "(1) The defenders are not entitled to use the said schoolhouse and ground for other than educational purposes, or such as are sanctioned by the title thereto and the Acts of Parliament above quoted." The second ground of his application is that, if not illegal, this was indiscreet, and should be checked and prevented, inasmuch as, "looking to the classes from which the Foundry Boys are drawn, he is of opinion that there is danger of infection and disease to the children attending the said school, as well as the risk of serious damage to the board's property."

These, then, are his two grounds. The first that this use is illegal,—that the law will not sanction the use of the board school except for the purposes specified in the Education Act. There is a reference, no doubt, made to the title under which the school is held, but it would only be the granter of the title who could complain on the score of a contravention of it. The other ground is that it is not discreet to allow this use.

On the first ground, I am of opinion that it is unfounded. There is nothing illegal in itself in allowing these children, under proper charge, to enjoy the shelter of the schoolhouse on these summer nights. It may be more or less

¹ Per Lord Mackenzie in case of churches in Eason's case, 5 D. 1430.

² Owen on the Education Acts, p. 83.

No. 31.

Dec. 1, 1886.
Hunter v.
School Board
of Lochgilp-
head.

discreet—I am not concerned with that at present—but it is not illegal. It is said that it is not a proper use under the Education Act. See what that would lead to. It would be illegal to allow a flower show, for example. To say that that would be illegal because it is not an educational purpose under the Act approaches nonsense, and the same may be said of a variety of purposes for which the use of school buildings is habitually given. Large rooms fit for meetings are not very frequently found in villages, and many useful meetings for public purposes could not be held at all if they could not be held in the schoolroom. When I was Sheriff of a Highland county I know that Small-Debt Courts used to be held there.

I think, then, that there was no illegality. But discretion is another matter. We know that there is a large discretionary power in this Court to regulate the administration of the guardians of public property,—the managers of public property,—for the benefit of the community. Questions of that kind have been raised about Bruntfield Links (Magistrates of Edinburgh v. Warrender, June 5, 1863, 1 Macph. 887, 35 Scot. Jur. 526), Kirkcaldy Links (Grahame v. Magistrates of Kirkcaldy, June 19, 1879, 6 R. 1066), Musselburgh Links (Sanderson v. Lees, June 22, 1859, 21 D. 1011, 22 D. 24, 32 Scot. Jur. 14), and others. Many questions may be raised as to the exercise of discretion by such persons in permitting this or that use of the property, e.g., selling, fencing, building, &c., and the Court may always prevent any use that is prejudicial to the interests of the community. But I never heard of an appeal to the Sheriff in such cases. He may interpose in cases of emergency to prevent an illegal thing being done, but to appeal to the Sheriff on a question as to the discretion or propriety of a resolution arrived at by a public body for the administration of its property is a novelty.

I am not prepared to say whether the resolution is right or wrong in the present case. I think the Sheriff is not to be called in in such a matter, and it would need to be a matter of considerable weight and importance to induce this Court to interfere. The board are the proprietors here as a matter of title, and I am not called upon to judge one way or the other as to the advisability of one course or the other. I can see a great deal to say on both sides. But it is a matter for the majority of the board to determine, and they did determine it. The matters raised are all matters for deliberation and discussion in the school board, but I do not think the Sheriff is to be called in to review the decision of the majority. I agree with the Sheriff in thinking that there is no ground in the matter of discretion or propriety for interdict, but I wish to repeat that in a question as to the exercise of discretion by guardians and managers of property for others, the Sheriff Court is not the proper tribunal to appeal to.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The question is whether the school board is entitled to allow the school buildings for other than educational purposes. I think they are not restricted as the complainer maintains. I should be sorry to prevent any use of the buildings which may be useful for the community by pronouncing such a judgment as the complainer desires.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur, although I cannot say I think it is altogether a clear case. The complainer would need to shew that the school board had gone beyond their statutory powers, for I think that the thing was in itself reasonable. I am not prepared to say that the Sheriff might not fairly be invoked (1) on the question whether the board might give the use of the buildings for purposes which are not its primary purposes, or (2) in order to prevent any possible injury by the proposed use. But it is not necessary to determine that in the view I take of the case, for I think the amount of prospective or apprehended danger is not sufficient to induce us to interfere. I think the board have power to give the use of the room for purposes that will not interfere with the use of the school for its proper purposes.

No. 31.
Dec. 1, 1886.
Hunter v.
School Board
of Lochgilp-
head.

LORD CRAIGHILL was absent.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal, and affirmed the judgment.

M'NEILL & SYME, W.S.—J. & A. F. ADAM, W.S.—Agents.

NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY CO., Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Asher—J. C. Thomson—Dickson.

BENHAR COAL COMPANY AND ITS LIQUIDATORS, Defenders (Respondents).—Sol.-Gen. Robertson—Murray.

No. 32.

Dec. 1, 1886.
North British
Railway Co. v.
Benhar Coal
Co.

Contract—Interpretation—Creditors making performance impossible.—The North British Railway Company, by an agreement entered into with the Duke of Abercorn to facilitate the passage of a bill promoted by them, agreed to buy 35 acres lying along the north side of their line at Portobello, including the site of a road running north and south across the land so acquired called Hope's Road. The company also agreed "whenever they take possession of any part of Hope's Road," to make a road "coloured yellow on a plan and according to section and specification hereto annexed," and to pay for the ground required at the rate of £400 per acre. This road was to run from east to west along the southern boundary of the Duke's ground and to lead at its eastern end into a road running parallel to Hope's Road. The agreement further provided,—“The Duke to have it in his option either to require of the railway company that this road be made, or that the cost of constructing said road, including the cost of the land at £400 per acre, and the cost of erecting larch fencing along north side of same, be paid to him in lieu thereof. Time of payment to be whenever the company take possession of any part of Hope's Road.”

A person coming in right of the Duke fenced off his ground to different fensurs up to the boundary of the railway company's property, and indeed encroached inadvertently on that property, thus making it impossible to form the road stipulated for.

Held (diss. Lord Rutherford Clark, and rev. judgment of Lord Kinnear), that as the road, the formation of which was the basis of the whole article of the agreement, was not to be formed, those in right of the Duke could not demand from the company a sum equal to the cost of constructing or of fencing it.

In 1872 the North British Railway Company, who were promoting a 2^D DIVISION. bill in Parliament, in order to facilitate the passing of the bill entered into an agreement with the Duke of Abercorn, who was then proprietor of Easter Duddingston, for the purchase of 35.165 acres of land on the north side of their railway at Portobello, including the site of a road called Hope's Road. Hope's Road ran from south to north across the land to be sold to the company near the middle of it. At the east end of the land to be sold another road called the Black Road ran from north to south parallel with Hope's Road. Hope's Road at its north end ran into the High Street of Portobello. Hope's Road was a private road which passed across the railway and into a high road on the south.

The fourth article of the agreement was in these terms:—"Fourth, The company to form the road coloured yellow on the plan not less than forty feet in width, and according to section and specification hereto annexed when-

Lord Kinnear.
M.

No. 32.

Dec. 1, 1886.
North British
Railway Co. v.
Benhar Coal
Co.

ever they take possession of any portion of Hope's Road, and to pay for the ground required therefor at the rate of £400 per acre, and to give to the Duke, his tenants and feuars, the right of use of any extended road to the High Street that the company may form. The Duke to have it in his option either to require of the railway company that this road be made, or that the cost of constructing said road, including the cost of the land at £400 per acre, and the cost of erecting larch fencing along north side of same, be paid to him in lieu thereof. Time of payment to be whenever the company take possession of any part of Hope's Road."

The road thus to be formed was to run along the edge of the company's property from Hope's Road to the Black Road, forming the northern boundary of the land acquired by the company.

This agreement was made while the bill was in committee, and was embodied in the Act of Parliament.

Subsequently the Duke sold his land to the Benhar Coal Company, who feued it out for villas. By inadvertence they gave out to their feuars part of the land sold to the railway company, and it was occupied by gardens, &c. It thus became impossible to make the road. The Benhar Company, however, maintained that they were entitled in the exercise of the option given to the Duke to demand from the company a sum equal to the cost of making and fencing the road, and the cost of the ground at £400 per acre, and that without making any road.

The railway company and the Benhar company came to terms for a conveyance to the latter company of the ground which had been inadvertently taken, but the railway company raised an action of declarator that the Benhar Company were not entitled to enforce implement of the fourth article of the agreement "except in so far as it provides that the pursuers are to give to the said Duke, his tenants, and feuars the right of use of any extended road to the High Street of Portobello the pursuers may form, and that the pursuers are freed and relieved of all obligations to form the road referred to in said fourth article and coloured yellow on the plan therein mentioned, and to pay for the ground required therefor, or to pay the cost of constructing and fencing the said road referred to in said fourth article." There was an alternative conclusion that the defenders, if they were entitled to receive the cost of the road, were bound to make it.

The pursuers stated that the proposed road would have been of great value to them, in the event of Hope's Road being shut up, as an access to the Black Road, and that they would have to provide such an access at their own expense.

The defenders denied this, and explained that they had formed other roads at their own expense for the convenience of their feuars.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defenders having, by their own actings, rendered it impossible to make the road referred to in article fourth of said agreement, the pursuers are entitled to decree in terms of the first declaratory conclusion; or otherwise, in respect of the terms of said agreement, and of the said road being serviceable and necessary to the pursuers as condescended on, the pursuers are entitled to decree in terms of the second declaratory conclusion.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The terms of article 4 of said agreement, with the option there specified of taking payment if required, being binding on the pursuers, the defenders are entitled to be assolizied.

On 20th May 1886 the Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) assolizied the defenders.*

* "OPINION.—The only question between the parties is as to the construction of the fourth article of the agreement between the Duke of Abercorn and the

The railway company reclaimed, and argued ;—This was an iniquitous claim, for the Duke had feued the land already, and those in his right were now seeking to obtain its value over again. The option given to the Duke was either to make the road himself and be paid for his expense by the company, or to call on the company to make the road for him. The words of the agreement plainly shewed that that was so, and that nothing fell to be paid if a road was not made, for the sum to be paid by the company was “the cost of constructing said road,” i.e., the road on the plan

No. 32.

Dec. 1, 1886.
North British
Railway Co. v.
Benhar Coal
Co.

North British Railway Company. They are agreed that the defenders are now in right of the Duke under that agreement, and that they have dealt with their land in such a manner as to disable them from furnishing the ground required for the construction of the road described in the fourth article. In these circumstances the pursuers maintain that they are relieved not only of their obligation to make the road, but also of the alternative obligation to make the payments stipulated in the same article of the agreement, in the event of the Duke or the defenders in his place electing to demand these payments, instead of requiring the road to be made.

“I think this construction of the contract cannot be sustained. The Duke stipulates for the formation of a road, not upon the land conveyed to the railway company, but upon his own land in the event of the company taking possession of the road called Hope’s Road, the site of which is included in the conveyance to them, and, if that were all, there can be no question that he could not insist upon performance of this obligation, unless he were in a position to give the land required for the formation of the road. But he further stipulates that he ‘shall have it in his option either to require of the company that this road be made, or that the cost of constructing said road, including the cost of the land at £400 per acre, and the cost of erecting larch fences along the north side of the same, be paid to him in lieu thereof.’ And in the event of his preferring to take the money instead of his road, he stipulates that the time of payment shall be ‘whenever the company take possession of any part of Hope’s Road.’

“It appears to me that this is an option to require either that a road shall be made, or that money shall be paid in lieu of a road. The stipulation is for the benefit of the Duke and his tenants or feuders ; there is no obligation on him to convey the road to the company in the event of its being constructed, or even to give them the use of it, and there is no obligation to construct a road in the event of his preferring to take money. It is not immaterial to observe that if, instead of requiring a road to be made, he elects to take the stipulated payments, such payments are to be made immediately upon the obligation coming into force by the company taking possession of any part of Hope’s Road. It cannot be suggested, therefore, that the previous construction of the road by the Duke is an implied condition of his right to demand payment. Nor can I see any ground on which the company could interfere after the money had been paid, and insist upon its being applied in the construction of a road. The Duke might have sold his land after obtaining payment, free from any obligation to the railway company, and, in the event of his doing so, the company would have no claim for repetition or damages. The only result therefore, of the conduct of the defenders in making use of their land as they are said to have done appears to me to be that it determines their election. They cannot require a road to be made on their land if they cannot give the land for that purpose. But that will in no way affect their right to have a money payment in lieu of a road, in the event of the obligation coming into force.

“The option for which the Duke has stipulated would have no meaning upon the pursuers’ construction. There is no difference, except in words, between requiring of the railway company that a road shall be made and requiring them to pay for making it. But the contract must be supposed to contemplate a real alternative. I think it was intended to provide for any contingency in which the actual construction of the road might be unnecessary or inconvenient for the Duke of Abercorn.”

No. 32.

Dec. 1, 1886.
North British
Railway Co. v.
Benhar Coal
Co.

and the cost of fencing it. They were now asked to pay the cost of a road that never could be constructed, and the price of land that they could never acquire. If this had merely been an obligation to make a road, the company would certainly be free, for the Duke had made that impossible by his own act; any obligation coming in place of that obligation to make the road was alike incapable of enforcement. The company undoubtedly would have had a right of use in this road if it had been made, for it was to come in place of Hope's Road, in which confessedly they had a right. Hence their interest in having the road made, and a right to prevent it from being closed if once made.

The respondents argued;—The argument and illustration of the Lord Ordinary in his opinion were sound and cogent. Hope's Road was valuable, and the Duke was entitled to be paid if he was deprived of it. He might be paid either in money or in kind by the construction of a new road. That was the option given to him, and if the contention of the other side was to receive effect he had no option given to him at all. Looking to the possibility of Hope's Road being closed, the Duke had had to use valuable feuing ground as streets in order to give an access to his feus, and his feuing plan had been laid out on the footing that the road in question was not to be made. He had thus acted throughout on the footing that he had the option for which he now contended, and had spent money in making accesses, and lost the opportunity of making more money by turning feuing ground into streets. His claim was therefore quite a fair claim, and not iniquitous as had been maintained. The proposed road was no substitute for Hope's Road. The latter was an access from the north to the railway company's property: the former was an access to the Duke's feus. It was not therefore the case that the company would have had any right to use it if it had been made. On the construction of the clause, in addition to what the Lord Ordinary had said it was obvious that the company's construction gave no force to the words "in lieu thereof," which must mean "in place of the road," and therefore must contemplate the case of no road being constructed.

At advising,—

LORD YOUNG.—The matter depends on the construction of the import and effect of the 4th article of the agreement. It will be borne in mind that this agreement was made to facilitate the passing of the bill through Parliament, a kind of agreement which is made while bills are passing through committee, and made more or less hurriedly. Now, the fourth article is in these terms:—"The company to form the road coloured yellow on plan, not less than 40 feet in width, and according to section and specification hereto annexed, whenever they take possession of any portion of Hope's Road, and to pay for the ground required therefor at the rate of £400 per acre, and to give to the Duke, his tenants and feuars, the right of use of any extended road to the High Street that the company may form."

Now, I stop here in the meantime, although it is on the subsequent words that the question really arises, for I think that a great deal depends on the import and effect of the words I have read. Hope's Road is a private road, the solum of which belongs to the Duke of Abercorn, crossing the line of railway from south to north, and proceeding on the north to Portobello. By a previous clause in the agreement the solum of that road is sold to the railway company. They are the proprietors of the road, with liberty, of course, to shut it up. Although it is not so provided, the Duke and those in his right are to be entitled to use it until it is shut up. That is the plain meaning of the agreement, although it is not so expressed. Then, when it is shut up, a substitute road is to be provided. No. 32.

"Take possession of Hope's Road" is not language used in its ordinary sense, for the company were in possession in 1872. "Take possession" in an agreement hurriedly made, as I have explained, must mean when they use the solum of the Co. road so that it can no longer be a road, then you are to make a substitute road. They are to pay for the ground, and to make a road upon it, with a right to use it as they use Hope's Road, the Duke also having a right to use it just as he uses Hope's Road. I think it is to be a substitute road in every sense for both parties.

Dec. 1, 1886.
North British
Railway Co. v.
Benhar Coal
Co.

But there is an alternative, which does not, however, as I think, dispense with the making of the road. So far as I have read, the company are to form the road. But then the agreement goes on,—“The Duke to have it in his option either to require of the railway company that this road be made, or that the cost of constructing said road, including the cost of the land at £400 per acre, and the cost of erecting larch fencing along north side of same, be paid to him in lieu thereof. Time of payment to be whenever the company take possession of any part of Hope's Road.”

Now, I should have thought at first sight, although I see the argument of the Lord Ordinary, and appreciate it on a critical examination of the words, that the meaning of the words was that the Duke may require the company to make the road, or to supply him with money to make it, but it is to be made. That is a common sort of agreement, and it is an alternative with which we are quite familiar, e.g., in the conclusions of summonses. It is not a power to exact a fine, it is a power to make the party with whom you contract execute the operation himself, or supply you with money to do it. The whole thing rests on the basis that the road is to be made. What is the cost of constructing a road which is never constructed? You may, of course, put the case,—“Suppose the road made, and suppose it fenced in a certain way, what would be the cost?” I dare say you could arrive at a sum, but the language is not suitable to such an agreement; it is suitable to an agreement that the road shall be made. It appears to me, indeed, to be a question whether the railway company may not have a remedy against the Benhar Coal Company if it has been rendered impossible to make the road. But that question does not arise here.

The interpretation contended for by the Benhar Company, I think, is contrary to good sense and to the intention of parties, and but for the difference of opinion which I know to exist, I should have thought that that was very clear. The Lord Ordinary sets some importance on the time of payment. As he has done so, there must be some foundation for his argument, but I do not see it. I have pointed out that the time when the railway company takes possession of Hope's Road means when they stop the use of it as a road. They are then to pay the cost of the substitute road. It is not to be a prepayment, however. If the Duke had proceeded to make the road it would have been absurd to make estimates before he began and to have had a prepayment of the estimated cost.

Now the road is not to be constructed, the North British Railway Company and the Benhar Coal Company must both go without it, except in so far as the railway company may have a ground of complaint against the other company, and I do not say they have not, because the means of making the road have been taken from them. That is the view I take of the case, and it leads me to an opposite conclusion from that of the Lord Ordinary. I think the Benhar Company is not entitled to demand any sum of money.

No. 32.

Dec. 1, 1886.
North British
Railway Co. v.
Benhar Coal
Co.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I agree. It appears to me, notwithstanding that the Lord Ordinary has adopted the opposite view, that this is a case in which a conclusion can be reached, and reached without difficulty, such as I have arrived at. Article 4 of the agreement seems to consist of two parts, the first being that which is set forth in the first sentence. There is there an obligation undertaken by the railway company to form the road, and as a part of that obligation another obligation to pay for the land required for the road at the rate of £400 per acre. These are the only obligations undertaken by the railway company.

The second part of the article consists of two sentences, and two things are provided for. An option is given to the Duke that he may require the road to be constructed by the railway company, the other alternative being that the cost of providing the road—of taking the land, and of putting up a fence—should be paid to him “in lieu thereof.” These seem to me not independent obligations, but obligations purely ancillary to the obligation undertaken by the railway company.

Now, that obligation on the railway company by which the company undertakes the formation of the road implies an agreement by the Duke of Abercorn that ground should be reserved by him for the making of the road. There was no need to take that land at once. It was only necessary to take it when Hope’s Road should be shut up. If the Duke was to insist for the fulfilment of this obligation when the time came, he behoved to reserve land for the purpose, for the road cannot be formed when there is no land on which to form it. The necessary result of making it impossible to form the road is the extinction of the obligation. Now, as a necessary consequence, not only is the obligation set forth in the first part of the clause extinguished, but the corollary of that obligation is also extinguished, viz., the obligation to pay for the land for formation of it. If there is to be no road the railway company is released from its obligation to make a road, and from its obligation to pay £400 for land for making it.

That being the actual state of things according to my reading of the agreement and my estimate of the nature of the circumstances, what is the effect on the ancillary obligation? The Duke might require the railway company to make the road. So he might, but only on the supposition that he has ground to give them to make it on. But if he has no ground to give, and cannot exercise that power, neither is he entitled to the alternative. That depends for its efficacy on the undertaking in the original obligation. The liability of the railway company centres in their original obligation. If that obligation is extinguished, there is no obligation to pay money. When the making of the road,—a road to be used by both parties,—became impossible, the agreement must be extinguished in all its parts. The result contended for is that the company is to be called upon to pay money and to go without the road.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I agree with the Lord Ordinary, and, looking to the language of the agreement, I can reach no other conclusion. Proceeding as I do on exactly the same grounds as his Lordship has stated, it is unnecessary that I should give any further reasons for my opinion.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I agree with the majority of the Court. This result, I think, is the only course that can possibly be taken in fair dealing, for nothing can be given as a consideration for the money which it is proposed shall be paid by the railway company. No. 32.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor, and found and declared in terms of the first conclusion of the summons.

MILLAR, ROBSON, & INNES, S.S.C.—J. & F. ANDERSON, W.S.—Agents.

Dec. 1, 1886.
North British
Railway Co. v.
Benhar Coal
Co.

COMMERCIAL BANK OF SCOTLAND, LIMITED, Petitioners.—

Sol.-Gen. Robertson—J. C. Lorimer.

LANARK OIL COMPANY, LIMITED, Respondents.—Balfour—M'Keechie.

No. 33.

Company—Winding-up order—Inability of a company to pay its debts—Security for debt—Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 89), sec. 80, sub-sec. 1.—Where a limited company, in answer to a creditor's petition for a winding-up order, on the ground of inability to pay a liquid debt under the 1st subsection of the 80th section of the Companies Act, 1862,* pleads that the debt is sufficiently secured, the security must be such as will command in the market the amount of the debt founded on.

Dec. 2, 1886.
Commercial
Bank of Scotland, Limited,
v. Lanark Oil
Co. Limited.

THE COMMERCIAL BANK OF SCOTLAND, LIMITED, were creditors of the 1st Division.
Lanark Oil Company, Limited, in a sum of £10,000, 7s. 10d., the balance due as at 26th August 1886 under a cash-credit bond and assignation in security, dated in September 1884, granted by the company and three co-obligants named therein, and £567, being the interest due thereon. Under the bond and assignation in security the company and the other obligants were bound, conjunctly and severally, to pay the principal and interest to the bank "at any time when the same shall be demanded after three months from the last date hereof." B.

On 30th September 1886 the bank served a demand on the company, requiring them to pay the balance and interest above mentioned, but the company having neglected to pay the debt, or to secure or compound for it, to the reasonable satisfaction of the bank, the bank presented a petition to the Court in which they submitted that the company was unable to pay its debts, and prayed that it should be wound up, in terms of the Companies Act, 1862.*

It appeared that the capital of the company, which had been established in 1883, for the purpose of carrying on the manufacture of mineral oils, had originally consisted of £130,000 (since reduced), and had been all called up, and that the company had never made any profit.

The company lodged answers, in which they stated, inter alia,—"Explained and averred that the sum originally borrowed by the company from the petitioners was £20,000, of which £14,250 was upon the said cash-credit, and £5750 upon a temporary overdraft, but that the said loan of £20,000 was, in April 1886, reduced by a payment to account thereof,

* The 79th section of the Companies Act, 1862, enacts that "a company under this Act may be wound up by the Court as hereinafter defined under the following circumstances, viz :— . . . 4. Whenever the company is unable to pay its debts."

The 80th section enacts that "a company under this Act shall be deemed to be unable to pay its debts—(1) Whenever a creditor, by assignment or otherwise, to whom the company is indebted, at law or in equity, in a sum exceeding £50 then due, has served on the company, by leaving the same at their registered office, a demand under his hand requiring the company to pay the sum so due, and the company has for the space of three weeks succeeding the service of such demand neglected to pay such sum, or to secure or compound for the same to the reasonable satisfaction of the creditor."

No. 33.

Dec. 2, 1886.
Commercial
Bank of Scotland, Limited,
v. Lanark Oil
Co. Limited.

to the said balance of £10,000, 7s. 10d. In security of the said balance and interest now remaining due, the petitioners hold as a first charge the company's works and property at Lanark, which cost £80,000, and after writing off a sum of £30,000 for depreciation, now stand in the company's books at the value of £50,000. In addition to the heritable estate and plant thus held by the petitioners in security for the balance of the said cash-credit, they hold the personal obligation of three of the late directors of the company."

It further appeared that the petitioners had served a notarial requisition and protest on the company, on 4th September 1886, calling up the debt due to them under the bond, which notice would expire on 4th December, after which the petitioners would be in a position to realise their security.

The respondents further alleged:—"The whole debts of the company, both secured and unsecured, do not exceed £32,000, while the assets of the company exceed £85,000 or thereby, even at their present low and depreciated value. The respondents were in course of making arrangements for having the said cash-credit balance paid off before the petitioners were in a position to sell the said heritable subjects, but these arrangements have been stopped by the presentation of the present application." They accordingly submitted that they were not unable to pay their debts in the sense of the statute.

The petitioners argued;—The answers were irrelevant. Liquidation was not an exceptional remedy. It was the equivalent provided by the Legislature in the case of limited companies for sequestration in the case of ordinary trading firms. On the face of their bond the petitioners were entitled to immediate payment of their debt. It was liquid and undisputed. In order to be valid the security offered in answer to such a petition as the present must be such as could at once be placed in the market and would realise the amount of the debt.¹ Here there was no attempt to prove the value of the security. It was said to stand in the company's books at £50,000. But that was not cash down, which was the right of the petitioners. If they were really solvent—either the company or the individual obligants—as was alleged, there could be no difficulty about payment of the debt.

The respondents answered;—The debts contemplated in the statute were unsecured debts. Secured creditors—like the present petitioners—were not entitled to present an application for liquidation. But in any case, the position of the respondents' company, as set forth in their answers, was sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the statute as to security. Besides, the action of the respondents had been paralysed by the service of the requisition and protest under the bond, which prevented them from raising money.²

LORD PRESIDENT.—The remedy which is given to a creditor of a limited company under the Companies Act of 1862 to apply for a winding-up order is no doubt a very strong one, but I agree in the Solicitor-General's observation, that the remedy in question is intended to come in place of all the remedies possessed by the creditors of an ordinary trading company. The creditor of an ordinary trading company may apply for sequestration of the company's estate, and may proceed with diligence not only against the company, but also against the individual partners of the company. Under the Companies Act of 1862, a creditor of a limited company has none of these remedies, and the present petition asks us to enforce the right or remedy which is given by that Act, in place of those rights or remedies which are open to creditors in the case of ordinary trading firms. The remedy which is substituted by the Act of 1862 is not one which can be lightly refused by the Court. It is a statutory right.

¹ European Life Assurance Society, Oct. 15, 1869, L. R., 9 Equity, 122.

² Authority quoted.—In re London and Paris Banking Corporation, Nov. 21, 1874, L. R., 19 Equity, 444.

No. 33.
Dec. 2, 1886.
Commercial
Bank of Scotland, Limited,
v. Lanark Oil
Co. Limited.

The debt upon which the present petition proceeds is due under a bond and assignation in security by which the debtor company was bound to make payment of the amount of principal and interest outstanding, at any time, when the same should be demanded, after three months from the date of the bond in September 1884. That period has long since expired, and accordingly I have no doubt of the petitioners' right to make this demand. The debt is long past due; it is liquid as being constituted under the bond to which I have referred, and it is undisputed. This of itself will not entitle the bank at once to present a petition for a winding-up order; they must make out that the company is unable to pay its debts, and the 80th section of the statute shews what is enough to justify the Court in inferring inability on the part of the company to pay its debts. A company is deemed unable to pay its debts if, after three weeks succeeding the service of a demand for payment, it does not pay the debt or give adequate security therefor. There is in the present case this presumptive evidence that it is unable to pay its debts. Notice was served upon the company on 30th September last. The three weeks have expired, and the debt remains unpaid. The only answer made by the company is that there is ample security for payment of the debt, and that this being so the case does not come within the operation of the 1st subsection of the 80th section.

I am quite willing to concede that that subsection may be construed to mean that the debtor company has not neglected to pay its debt if it can shew that at the time the demand was made there was in the hands of the creditor ample security for the debt. If, for example, a creditor held a first bond and disposition in security over a landed estate, say for £5000, and the rental of the estate reached as high a figure as £5000 per annum, the creditor would of course be amply secured, and it would be unreasonable to ask for farther security. The subsection does not exactly cover such a case, but it is a reasonable implication that there can be no failure within the meaning of its terms when the existing security is ample. That case is very unlikely to occur, and if it did, I think a different course would be adopted by the creditor. The debtor would not hesitate to make payment; for he could raise the money on an assignation to the security, and thus he would be enabled to pay the creditor. I rather think it is only where the security is insufficient, or is suspected to be so, that the question can arise; and when it does arise, the true test of its sufficiency will always be whether it is a security which can command the amount of the debt if put into the market. If so, the debtor is in no difficulty. The security, in short, must be marketable, else it is not such security as will reasonably satisfy the creditor.

This being so, I do not think the company has made any relevant answer to the demand of the bank, and I must say that when they suggest to the petitioners that they ought to exhaust the security by realising and selling the subject of it and applying the price pro tanto, if not to the full amount, in payment of the debt, they are suggesting a course which would be quite destructive of

- No. 33. their own credit and existence as a company, because the security extends over the very works in which the company carries on its business. A sale of the works would lead to the breaking up of the company as much as the winding up. I am therefore of opinion that the petitioners are entitled to a winding-up order.
- Dec. 2, 1886. Commercial Bank of Scotland, Limited, v. Lanark Oil Co. Limited.

LORD MURE, LORD SHAND, and LORD ADAM concurred.

THE COURT accordingly pronounced a winding-up order, and appointed Mr Francis More, C.A., Edinburgh, to be liquidator.

MELVILLE & LINDESAY, W.S.—GEORGE M. WOOD, S.S.C.—Agents.

- No. 34. MRS CATHERINE SMILLIE AND SPOUSE, Pursuers (Appellants).—Steele.
THOMAS BOYD, Defender (Respondent).—Sym.
- Dec. 2, 1886. Smillies-v. Boyd.

Reparation—Dangerous animal—Dog within owner's premises.—Held that the owner of a dog which he knew to be vicious, and which he allowed to go unrestrained through his garden, was liable in damages to a person who had permission to enter the garden, and had been injured there by the dog.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
I.

IN November 1885, Catherine Goldsmith or Smillie, pig keeper, Rutherglen, with consent of her husband, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow, against Thomas Boyd, Braeside Avenue, Rutherglen, for damages on account of injuries which she had sustained through the bite of a dog belonging to Boyd.

In defence Boyd pleaded that the pursuer having been bitten through her own negligence he was not liable in damages, he having exercised all reasonable care as the owner of the dog.

A proof was allowed. The evidence was to the following effect:—The pursuer was in the habit of calling at houses in the district to collect the refuse of food, which she got gratuitously, for the use of her pigs. Among other places she had frequently gone to the house of the defender, who there had a valuable collie dog. The pursuer stated that she had never seen this dog, but it was not disputed that she knew of its existence, and further that she as well as the defender knew that it was of a vicious disposition, it having already bitten several persons, among others the pursuer's father, with whom she lived, and who like herself collected pig's meat. The defender led evidence to shew that he had warned both the pursuer and her father of the danger of coming to the house, as the dog had an antipathy to them, and that he had put a lock on a gate at the side of the house to prevent them going round to the back unnoticed. On the day in question, 7th October 1885, the pursuer went to the gate and rang the bell, and was admitted by the defender's wife, who unlocked the side gate, and took the pursuer round to the scullery at the back. The pursuer stated that she then got some refuse from Mrs Boyd, but Mrs Boyd's evidence was that she gave the pursuer nothing, having nothing to give her. Mrs Boyd then went into the house by the back door, which she shut. She admitted, however, that before doing so she might have told the pursuer that she was at liberty to go into the garden to gather some cabbage blades. The pursuer deponed that Mrs Boyd gave her this permission—See the evidence of both quoted in Lord Young's opinion, infra. In point of fact the pursuer did go into the garden. About twenty minutes afterwards Mrs Boyd, who stated that she was entirely ignorant that the pursuer was in the garden, told the dog to "run away and fetch coals," and opened the back door to let him out. He immediately rushed at the pursuer, who was still gathering cabbage blades, and bit her severely on the leg. No. 34.

On 3d February 1886 the Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie) pronounced this interdictor:—"Finds that on 7th October last the pursuer was bitten in the left leg by a collie dog belonging to the defender: Finds that the dog was known to the pursuer to have bitten several persons and to be of a vicious disposition: Finds that the pursuer and her father had often been warned not to come upon the defender's premises lest the dog should attack them: Finds that on the said 7th of October the defender's wife admitted the pursuer to the garden, and after finding that there was no broken meat or refuse for her dismissed her: Finds that some time after the defender's wife went out for coals, taking the dog with her: Finds that the pursuer was still in the garden picking cabbage leaves, and that the dog at once attacked and bit her: Finds that the pursuer was in fault in being still in the garden after being warned of the danger: Therefore assolzies the defender," with expenses. Dec. 2, 1886. Smillies v. Boyd.

On appeal the Sheriff (Clark) adhered.

The pursuer appealed, and argued that the case was within Burton v. Moorhead,¹ which required the owner of a dog, who knew it to be of a vicious disposition, to use not merely reasonable but absolute precautions for the safety of the public. The pursuer was not a trespasser. The fair result of the evidence was that she had Mrs Boyd's permission to enter the garden.

Argued for the defender;—It was unnecessary for him to question Burton v. Moorhead. It was proved that the pursuer was in fault, and at all events it was to suit herself only that she went into the garden, taking the risk of a danger of which she knew perfectly well. The question was whether she was negligent.² On that question the Sheriffs were with defender. In *Daly v. Arrol*³ the Court had assolzied the owner of a dog which he knew to be of a vicious disposition, and which had bitten, not a stranger, but one of his own workmen, the ground of judgment being that the pursuer was guilty of negligence in unnecessarily approaching the dog.

LORD YOUNG.—In this case I think the whole question turns on the evidence of the pursuer and of Mrs Boyd, the defender's wife, and the greater part of that evidence leaves no ground for controversy as to the facts. The defender was the owner of a vicious dog, which was known by him to have been vicious, for it has conclusively shewn its vice by biting several persons, although it seems to have been a nice dog and an intelligent one for all that—I say "to have been," for since this occurrence it has been destroyed. The pursuer, a married woman about forty years of age, keeps pigs, and her father, who lives with her, seems to do so too, and they are in the habit of going about the houses in the neighbourhood to carry off the refuse of food—"brock" is what the pursuer calls it—which is useless to its owners, but is useful to the keepers of pigs, and in this way the legitimate ends of both parties are served. Upon the occasion in question, in October 1885, the pursuer went to the defender's house to get "brock," if the defender had any; she went to the front door and rang the bell; the defender's wife saw her and knew her, and from previous experience knew what her errand was. The defender's wife went to the gate leading to the back premises, un-

¹ Burton v. Moorhead, July 1, 1881, 8 R. 892.

² Sarch v. Blackburn, Feb. 24, 1830, 4 Car. and Payne, 297.

³ Daly v. Arrol, reported of date Dec. 2, 1886, infra, p. 154.

No. 34.
Dec. 2, 1886.
Smillies v.
Boyd.

bolted the gate, and allowed the pursuer to go in. In short, she invited her to come in and to go round to the kitchen door to see if there was any "brock" to be had or not. Now, up to this point the pursuer was not a trespasser. She was there on the invitation of the defender's wife on a humble but very useful errand.

The next matter, however, is one on which it is desirable to refer to the evidence of the two witnesses, whom I have mentioned as being the only really important witnesses. The pursuer's evidence is this,—“Mrs Boyd then asked me to take away some cabbage-leaves out of the garden; these were the blades left on the stalks after the cabbage is cut off. I went into the garden and was gathering the blades when the dog bit me. I did not see where it came from. It seized me by the left leg and threw me down on the green, till my screams brought Mrs Boyd to my assistance.” But Mrs Boyd being asked,—“Did you ask her to go in among the vegetables and get some cabbage-leaves?” gives this evidence:—“(A.) I could not swear I did, but her father and she were in the habit of taking everything they could. When I let the pursuer in I did not know I had no ‘brock’ to give her. I may have told the pursuer to go into the garden for the cabbage-leaves. (Q.) Was your attention next attracted by a scream from the pursuer? (A.) No. (Q.) Did you not go out to her assistance in consequence of the dog having attacked her? (A.) I let the woman in, and when I found there was no ‘brock,’ I went into the house and shut the door. The dog was in the house with me, and about twenty minutes afterwards I said to the dog—‘Run away and fetch coals for the kitchen fire.’ I went out with him, and the pursuer was there among the cabbages, and the dog ran forward and bit her.” Now, I cannot regard that evidence as a contradiction of the pursuer's, but rather as a confirmation. For although Mrs Boyd will not swear that she asked the pursuer to go into the garden to get cabbage-leaves she says it was a most likely thing for her to do; that the pursuer and her father were in the habit of going there and taking everything they could—everything which was useless to the defender, and which it was a relief to him to get rid of. Then was the pursuer in the garden with the permission and on the invitation of the defender's wife? I say on all the evidence that she was, and while she was thus on the defender's premises with the permission and by the invitation of his wife she was bitten by his dog, which was known to him to be vicious.

Now, listen to the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute,—“Finds that on 7th October last the pursuer was bitten in the left leg by a collie dog belonging to the defender: Finds that the dog was known to the pursuer to have bitten several persons, and to be of a vicious disposition.” The pursuer had never seen the dog before, but I think the Sheriff has truly enough found that she knew it to be of a vicious disposition. I think, however, that I should rather have expected a finding to the effect that the dog was known to the defender to be vicious; of that there is much more evidence. The judgment goes on,—“Finds that the pursuer and her father had often been warned not to come upon the defender's premises lest the dog should attack them.” I think that there is evidence that they were told that the dog was vicious, and that they had better not come. I should not have said that the proof was all one way, though I think there is evidence to that effect. But I should not have thought the evidence very material unless it could be shewn that the pursuer was where she was against the orders of the defender or his wife, whereas here she had Mrs Boyd's express permission and invitation. The Sheriff then goes on—"Finds that on the said 7th October the defender's wife admitted the pursuer to the garden, and after finding that there was no broken meat or refuse for her dismissed her." Now, I could not have pronounced that finding. The pursuer says that she got some refuse. Mrs Boyd says that she had none to give her, and on that evidence I could not have come to a conclusion one way or the other, but it is a matter of no moment. Then we have two findings to which it is not necessary particularly to advert, and then comes the material part of the interlocutor—"Finds that the pursuer was in fault in being still in the garden after being repeatedly warned of the danger: Therefore assoilzies the defender, and decerns." No. 34.

Dec. 2, 1886.
The Smillies v. Boyd.

Now, I cannot find that the pursuer was in fault. I am of opinion that she was in the defender's premises by the permission and on the invitation of the defender's wife, and I am of opinion that she was not in fault. I cannot put into words the fault she is supposed to have committed. The case comes to be this—A vicious dog, which is known by its owner and keeper to be vicious, attacks and severely wounds a person who is lawfully, and without any fault at all, on the premises of its owner, and that being so, is there liability here? I think there is, and but for the circumstance that the Sheriffs have come to another conclusion, I should say an exceptionally strong and clear case of liability. If your Lordships think proper I should therefore propose to recall the judgment of the Sheriff, and find the pursuer entitled to damages as well as to expenses, and the damages I would propose should be fixed at £30.

LORD CRAIGHILL and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I quite agree in the judgment proposed by Lord Young, but I only wish to say one word in regard to the case of Arrol, because I think that that case illustrates a distinction sometimes lost sight of. If a dog is known to be vicious, then there is an obligation on the owner of the dog to keep it in proper restraint. But knowledge that he is a vicious dog does not impose an obligation on the friends of the owner to stay away from his premises. They are bound to exercise a reasonable amount of precaution, but that is all. In this case the proprietor ought to have kept the vicious animal in restraint, and it is quite clear that he was in fault in not so restraining him. But in Arrol's case the dog was restrained; he was securely chained up, but the injured man in taking a short cut out of the works went within the range of his chain, so that the restraint was neutralised by the man going too near the dog. I quite concur in the present judgment.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—" . . . Find that on the occasion libelled the pursuer, while in the defender's garden by permission and on the invitation of his wife, was attacked and severely bitten by his dog, which was known to him and to his wife to be vicious: Find that the defender was in fault in allowing the dog to be at large, and is liable in damages to the pursuer, who did not by fault or negligence on her part induce the said attack: Therefore sustain the appeal, recall the judgments of the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute, assess the damages at £30," &c.

E. BRUCE LOW, S.S.C.—D. HILL MURRAY, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 35.

Dec. 2, 1886.*
Daly v. Arrol
Brothers.

MYLES DALY, Pursuer (Appellant).—M'Kechnie—A. S. D. Thomson.
ARROL BROTHERS, Defenders (Respondents).—Jameson—Napier.

Reparation—Dangerous animal—Dog—Negligence.—A workman unnecessarily went within reach of a dog belonging to his employers, and known by them to be of a vicious disposition, which was chained to a kennel in the work-yard. He was bitten by the dog. Held that he was not entitled to damages from his employers on account of the injury thereby sustained, the Court being of opinion that the injury was due solely to his own negligence.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
I.

MYLES DALY, boilermaker, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against Arrol Brothers, engineers there, for damages on account of injuries sustained by the pursuer through the bite of a dog belonging to the defenders, in whose employment he was at the date of the occurrence.

The defence was that the injuries had been caused by Daly's own fault.

A proof was allowed. The evidence disclosed the following facts :—The defenders had in their works a large watch-dog, which was chained to a kennel in their yard by a chain about six feet long. This dog had previously to 13th June (the date of the occurrence in question) attacked and bitten two workmen when it was off the chain. This was known to the defenders. Its kennel was in a part of the yard where it was not usual or necessary for workmen to pass. On 13th June the pursuer, during working hours, in order to take a short cut, passed the kennel within the range of the chain, when the dog came out and bit him very severely.

The Sheriff-substitute (Spens) assoilzied the defenders, holding that the pursuer was barred by his own carelessness.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session.¹

THE COURT (LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK, and LORD M'LAREN) pronounced this interlocutor :—"Find that on the occasion mentioned in the record the defenders' dog was lodged in their works in a kennel, to which it was attached by a chain six feet in length : Find that the pursuer was aware of the presence of the dog there, but nevertheless approached it so near as to be within range of the chain, and was attacked and bitten : Find that the injury thus sustained by the pursuer is attributable to his own fault, and not to any fault on the part of the defenders : Therefore dismiss the appeal ; affirm the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute appealed against : Of new, assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the action : Find them entitled to expenses in the inferior Court and in this Court," &c.

W. R. PATRICK, L.A.—J. & J. ROSS, W.S.—Agents.

No. 36.

Dec. 2, 1886.
Lawson Seed
and Nursery
Co. Limited,
v. Lawson &
Son, Limited.

LAWSON SEED AND NURSERY COMPANY, LIMITED, AND LIQUIDATORS, Petitioners.—H. Johnston.

PETER LAWSON AND SON, LIMITED, Respondents.—Balfour—M'Kechnie.

PETER LAWSON AND SON, LIMITED, Petitioners.—Balfour—M'Kechnie.

LAWSON SEED AND NURSERY COMPANY, LIMITED, Respondents.—H. Johnston.

Company—Winding-up—Petition for supervision order—Objection by creditors to winding-up—Competency—Companies Act, 1862, sec. 129.—A petition by the liquidator in a voluntary winding-up for a supervision order was objected to by a creditor of the company, on the ground that the winding-up would in-

* Decided June 25, 1886.

¹ Authorities cited.—Stair, i. 9, 5 ; Sarch v. Blackburn, Feb. 24, 1830, 4 Car. & Payne, 297 ; Clark v. Armstrong, July 11, 1862, 24 D. 1315 ; Burton v. Moorhead, July 1, 1881, 8 R. 892 ; Addison on Torts, p. 115.

juriously affect his rights. He also presented a petition for recall of the resolution to wind up the company on the same ground. Held that the objection was not relevant, and that the petition was incompetent. No. 36.

The A company, limited, which carried on business as seedsmen and nurserymen, agreed to transfer its seed business at a valuation to the B company, and to allow the latter to manage and realise the nurseries for a commission of 5 per cent on sales, reserving right to the A company to sell the nursery stock as a whole, and also agreed that the B company should, subject to the control of the A company, collect the whole debts due to the A company for a remuneration of 5 per cent. Two years afterwards the A company resolved to wind up voluntarily. Dec. 2, 1886.
Lawson Seed and Nursery Co. Limited,
v. Lawson & Son, Limited.

In a petition by the A company and its liquidators for a supervision order the B company opposed the application, and presented a petition for recall of the resolutions to wind up, alleging that the liquidation was a device of the A company to get rid of the agreement; that it was perfectly solvent, and had no creditors pressing for payment, and that the respondents would, under the agreement, be able to recover more than sufficient to pay any sums due to them. Further, that if the object of the liquidation was the realisation of the A company's estates, they had agreed that the realisation should be effected by the B company, and that the latter had a right to conduct it.

Held that the petition for recall was incompetent, and that the answers to the A company's petition for a supervision order were irrelevant.

Question, whether a shareholder who had voted against the resolutions had a title to petition for their recall.

THE LAWSON SEED AND NURSERY COMPANY, LIMITED, was incorporated under the Companies Acts in January 1873, and thereafter carried on the business of nurserymen and seedsmen in Edinburgh and London. 1st DIVISION.
M.

In November 1884 the company, as first parties, entered into an agreement with Thomas M'Laren, S.S.C., as representing a new company, to be formed under the name of Peter Lawson & Son, Limited, second party, whereby the first parties agreed (1) to grant or to concur in granting in favour of the new company a lease of certain premises in Edinburgh; (2) to sell to the new company at a valuation the said stock, &c. belonging to the first parties, their interests in certain seed contracts, and the goodwill of their seed business.

The agreement further bore,—“Seventh, The said new company shall manage and realise, on behalf of the first parties, and subject to their direction and control, the said nurseries . . . and pay the proceeds, as these are received, to the first parties. The said first parties shall pay all nursery rents, taxes, wages, and other expenses connected with the said nurseries, including the wages of all parties employed with approval of the first parties exclusively in the nurseries, but the said company shall pay all other expenses of management. The said company shall be entitled to deduct from the proceeds realised a commission of 5 per cent for their trouble, but declaring that this commission shall be payable only on trade sales, by private sale or public sale, and not on a sale of the nursery stock as a whole, should that be carried out by the first parties, who reserve full power at any time to dispose of the nursery stock in bulk or as a whole. But in the event of the said company finding a purchaser for the said nurseries as a whole, other than themselves, to the satisfaction of the first parties, the said company shall be entitled to a commission of 5 per cent on the purchase price. Eighth, The said company shall, subject to the direction and control of the first parties, collect the whole of the book debts due to the said first parties (and for which they shall receive a remuneration of 5 per cent on the amount collected), and shall pay the same on collection to the said first parties. Ninth, That all debts incurred by the said first parties in connection with said seed business, prior to 11th November 1884, as also the warehouse

No. 36.

Dec. 2, 1886.
Lawson Seed
and Nursery
Co. Limited,
v. Lawson &
Son, Limited.

and office rents, and taxes, and employees' salaries, up to said date, shall be paid by them, and that the said company shall free and relieve the said first parties of all such expenses, from and after said 11th November 1884."

At an extraordinary general meeting of the Lawson Seed and Nursery Company, Limited, held on 29th October 1886, extraordinary resolutions were adopted, in terms of the 129th section of the Companies Act, 1862, to the effect (1) that it had been proved to the satisfaction of the company that it could not, by reason of its liabilities, continue its business, and that it was advisable to wind it up; (2) that the company should be wound up voluntarily; that George Todd Chiene and John Scott Tait, both chartered accountants in Edinburgh, should be appointed liquidators; and (4) that it should be an instruction to the liquidators if and when they found it expedient to have the voluntary liquidation continued subject to the supervision of the Court.

On 9th November following a petition for a supervision order was presented to the First Division by the company and its liquidators.

To this petition Peter Lawson & Son, Limited, lodged answers, in which, after narrating the agreement, they stated,—“ 3. In terms of, and in reliance on the said provisional agreement, the said company was formed, and was called Peter Lawson & Son, Limited. The company has carried on business since 11th day of November 1884 in Edinburgh and elsewhere, and in pursuance of and in conformity with the said provisional agreement, they have been collecting the debts due to the petitioners, and paying over the same to them as they were collected. . . . 4. The respondents acquired right by the said agreement to recover the said debts, and they also acquired right to manage, and if possible to realise the whole of the nurseries and stock belonging to the petitioners. In point of fact, they had been managing the works of the petitioners until the 4th day of January 1886, when, contrary to the terms of the said provisional agreement, the petitioners appointed a separate manager to look after their works. The fact that the respondents were to have the right to collect the said debts, and receive a commission thereon, and to manage, sell, and realise the said nursery, and also to receive a commission therefor, was a very important consideration in entering into the said agreement, and in point of fact it would not have been entered into but for that consideration. The petitioners were anxious at that time that the whole of the nursery business should be realised, and they got the promoters of the respondents' company to form the said company in order to put them in funds to clear off indebtedness to the bank for which the directors of the petitioners' company were personally liable. In this way a sum of about £16,000 was paid by the respondents to the petitioners, and the said directors were thus enabled to free themselves from personal liability, and to put their company upon a sound and solvent basis. . . . 7. The object of the resolutions is to put the said company into liquidation, and thus to end its liabilities under the said agreement. The petitioners had no other object than that in passing the foresaid resolutions. The said company is perfectly solvent, and it has no creditors who are pressing for payment, if indeed it has any creditors at all, except the respondents, who are not pressing for payment, and who are satisfied that if the said provisional agreement is worked according to its true intent and meaning they will recover from the debtors of the respondents sums more than sufficient to pay any sums due to respondents, and they are willing to wait until that is done. Further, if the object of the liquidation is to realise the estate and assets of the petitioners' company, the respondents have a right to effect that realisation, and so get payment for their trouble in doing so, in terms of the conditions of the said provisional agreement." No. 36.

Peter Lawson & Son, Limited, further presented a petition for recall of the above narrated resolutions. Dec. 2, 1886.
Lawson Seed
and Nursery
Co. Limited,
v. Lawson &
Son, Limited.

The Lawson Seed and Nursery Company, Limited, argued that the only claim which the new company had was for a commission, or for damages for breach of the agreement. They were merely creditors, and creditors could not intervene to prevent a voluntary liquidation. Under the 129th section of the Companies Act that was a matter entirely in the discretion of the company.

Peter Lawson & Son, Limited, argued ;—The sole object of the petitioners was to get rid of the agreement. The respondents had acquired the whole trade connection of the petitioners under the agreement, and they were under the agreement entitled to administer, manage, and realise the petitioners' nursery business. Impliedly the petitioners had renounced their right to wind up under the Companies Acts. They were personally barred from taking that step.¹ At anyrate the original petition should be sisted to enable the respondents to bring a reduction of the resolution to wind up.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The petitioners in this case, at an extraordinary general meeting of the company held on 29th October 1886, adopted extraordinary resolutions to the effect that it had been proved to the satisfaction of the company that it could not, by reason of its liabilities, continue its business, and that it was advisable to wind up, and that the company should be wound up voluntarily. They proceeded to name liquidators, and a resolution followed to the effect that it should be an instruction to the liquidators to apply, whenever they should deem it expedient to do so, to have the voluntary liquidation continued subject to the supervision of the Court. The present petition proceeds upon that extraordinary resolution, and asks the Court to pronounce a supervision order accordingly.

The jurisdiction of the Court in a matter of this kind is somewhat limited. If the voluntary liquidation has been regularly gone about, and the resolutions are in competent form, there is scarcely any question as to whether the order asked for should be obtained or not. I can easily understand that a creditor may come forward at such a stage and object upon various grounds. In the first place, he may object to the liquidators who have been chosen being continued, or he might shew that the resolutions to wind up voluntarily had not been competently gone about on any ground appearing on the face of the proceedings, or he might contend that, if the liquidation was to proceed at all, it was more expedient for the interest of the creditors that the winding-up should be conducted voluntarily rather than under supervision of the Court. All these are fair grounds for opposition to the granting of a supervision order.

But, if a creditor merely says that he thinks his rights will be prejudiced if the company goes into liquidation, I doubt exceedingly the relevancy of that objection. It is quite possible that creditors of a particular class may be prejudiced if the company goes into liquidation, and that they may expect to make a great deal more of their claim if they can succeed in persuading or compelling the company to carry on its business, notwithstanding the opinion of the shareholders expressed in their resolutions that it cannot be carried on by reason of

¹ Anglo-American Brush Electric Light Corporation, Limited, v. Scottish Brush Electric Light and Power Co., Limited, June 22, 1882, 9 R. 972.

No. 36.

Dec. 2, 1886.
Lawson Seed
and Nursery
Co. Limited,
v. Lawson &
Son, Limited.

its liabilities. But such an objection is altogether irrelevant as an answer to such an application as this.

One can, of course, figure cases of continuing contracts where the subsistence of the company is quite indispensable to the creditor's being able to make the most of his contract. But that is no answer to an application like the present. What Peter Lawson & Son, Limited, state is that they have a contract with the company for managing its affairs. The company holds a lease of the grounds and nurseries, and Peter Lawson & Son, Limited, say they have an agreement under which they are entitled to manage its affairs, and to derive a money advantage in the form of commission. They also say they have a right, not only to manage its affairs, but also to wind it up—a winding-up which cannot very well be gone about until the termination of the seven years, when the leases expire. It is quite possible that this creditor company may have an interest adverse to the winding-up of the company; indeed, that they may have an interest that the company should go on; but I do not think that this is a sufficient objection to the liquidation.

That being so, it appears to me that the course adopted by Peter Lawson & Son, Limited, of presenting a petition for the purpose of having the resolutions to wind up voluntarily set aside summarily, as an answer to the petition for a supervision order, is quite incompetent. It is admittedly unprecedented, and I cannot see any authority for it in the statute, and there is certainly no warrant for it in the ordinary practice of the Court. The petition, therefore, must be refused.

The only remaining question accordingly is whether it is more expedient that the liquidation should remain a voluntary liquidation, or whether it should be under the supervision of the Court. Upon that question the opposing creditors say they have no interest to object, and, in these circumstances, the Court has a plain duty to perform, and that is, to grant a supervision order.

LORD MURK.—I am of the same opinion. The resolutions in question were passed in respect of powers contained in the 129th section of the Companies Act of 1862, and there was thus a unanimous resolution by the company to wind up voluntarily, and they now come here for leave to have the liquidation carried on under a supervision order. This is objected to by Peter Lawson & Son, Limited, who have also come into Court with a petition to have the resolutions rescinded. It appears to me, however, that this is incompetent on the grounds stated, because, under the 129th section of the Act, the question of the advisability of a winding-up is left to the company to decide, and I do not think that this Court has any power or jurisdiction to review their decision. That being so, I think that the petition of Peter Lawson & Son, Limited, must be refused.

In these circumstances, I see no good reason for refusing to grant a supervision order, which the company wish to have the benefit of. It may be that Lawson & Son, Limited, may be in a position to raise the points on which they say they will suffer prejudice before the liquidator at a future stage, but at present I cannot see that they can be heard to interfere on the grounds they have taken up in the matter now before us.

LORD SHAND.—If Messrs Peter Lawson & Son had any good grounds for challenging the resolutions to wind up which were passed by the company, it appears to me that these would require to have been enforced in an action of reduction for the purpose of having them rescinded. The resolution to wind up was adopted, inter socios, by the shareholders as a matter dealing with the regulation of the company business, and the statute provides (sec. 129) that a company under that Act may be wound up voluntarily "whenever the company has passed a special resolution" (i.e., by taking the votes of the members of the company) "requiring the company to be wound up voluntarily." Accordingly, if a resolution be passed by the shareholders of the company, until it has been rescinded or set aside it must be acted upon, and I think the Court is bound to proceed upon it, as a good and valid resolution, until it has been set aside. I certainly think that this is so, as in a question with an outsider, a creditor of the company, like Peter Lawson & Son, Limited. Whether a shareholder who had attended the extraordinary general meeting, and had voted against the resolution, would have a good title to present a petition for its recall, or to bring a suspension, need not now be decided. But I confess that, for my part, I am disposed to think a reduction would be necessary.

No. 36.
Dec. 2, 1886.
Lawson Seed
and Nursery
Co. Limited,
v. Lawson &
Son, Limited.

I take it that we must hold this petition for recall of the resolutions to be incompetent. But I farther think that the answers which have been lodged to the petition for the supervision order cannot be entertained, because they are presented by a party who is without right or title to object to such a resolution, for creditors of a company have, in my opinion, no title to object to the company going into liquidation where the provisions of the statute have been complied with. I regard them merely as creditors. The Lawson Seed and Nursery Company, which is now in liquidation, made an arrangement in December 1884 by which it was agreed that the new company, to be called Peter Lawson & Son, Limited, should manage and realise the nurseries and other estate belonging to the Nursery Company. But the only interest which the new company has in the Nursery Company is the pecuniary one that they shall receive a commission for their trouble. Mr Balfour says that they had this further interest, that their own business should be benefited under the new contract, and that it is the fact that it will be greatly prejudiced. But even if this could be spelt out of the agreement, which I think it cannot, I am unable to see that they are more than creditors having a money claim, and, this being so, I think they have no ground for stepping in with a view to having the present proceedings for a winding-up interfered with. These are entirely matters for the shareholders of the company going into liquidation.

The only other argument submitted was this: It is said by Peter Lawson & Son, Limited, that it is implied in the agreement in question that the company was not to be wound up except by them, and that thus the present proceedings are being taken in the face of the implied understanding or undertaking that was come to between the parties. I should be very slow to arrive at the result, upon the reading of this or of any agreement, that by implication a joint stock company was not to be entitled to take the benefit of the provisions of the Companies Acts, under which it was registered, relating to liquidation. I doubt whether a company could make such an agreement to bind them. But I think there is nothing whatever, either express or implied, to this effect in the present agreement which can deprive the company of the benefit of the provisions of the Companies Acts under which it was constituted.

LORD ADAM.—I concur with your Lordship in the chair.

THE COURT accordingly granted the supervision order prayed for, refused the petition of Peter Lawson & Son, Limited, and found them liable in expenses.

MACKENZIE & KERMAK, W.S.—T. & W. A. M'LAREN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 37. GEORGE TOD CHIENE (Liquidator of the British Canadian Lumbering and Timber Company, Limited), Petitioner.—Murray.

Dec. 3, 1886.
British Canadian Lumbering
and Timber
Co. Limited.

Company—Liquidation—Process—Intimation—Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 89), sec. 100.—The liquidator of a company applied for an order under the 100th section of the Companies Act, 1862, on a former agent of the company, who was resident in Canada, to deliver up books and papers in his possession belonging to the company, and moved the Court to pronounce the order without intimation. The Court (dis. Lord Rutherford Clark) refused the motion, and ordered intimation.

Company—Liquidation—Sale of assets.—Circumstances in which the liquidator of a company in liquidation under supervision was authorised to sell growing timber belonging to the company by private bargain.

2D DIVISION.
M.

THE liquidator of the British Canadian Lumbering and Timber Company, Limited, which was being wound up subject to supervision, presented this note, under the 100th section of the Companies Act, 1862,* praying for decree against Allan Grant, a former agent of the company in Canada, ordaining him to deliver up to the liquidator certain books and papers belonging to the company in Grant's possession (over which, the note stated, Grant claimed a right of lien for a debt alleged to be due to him by the company), and failing compliance with this order for authority to the liquidator, or his duly authorised agent, to proceed against Grant in the Canadian Courts for recovery of the books and documents.

The liquidator moved that the prayer should be granted without intimation to Grant, and argued;—It was not necessary to give notice of applications under the 100th section of the Companies Act, 1862. Form No. 13 of the rules framed by the English Court under the Act, which was to be found at p. 594 of the 4th edition of Buckley, implied that. [LORD YOUNG referred to Buckley, p. 254, and the case of the Commercial Union Wine Company, Dec. 15, 1865, 35 Beav. 35, there cited.] That case was in the teeth of Form 13, and was very meagrely reported. It was the practice to proceed under section 100 against contributories without notice. No doubt if Mr Grant had been resident in this country the order would not have been asked without notice to him, but it was desirable to save time. [LORD YOUNG.—Intimating will not take long, but if you proceed without intimation you may lose a good deal of time, for when the Canadian Courts are told that the order has been pronounced behind the back of this gentleman, they may decline to act on it, and the whole thing will come back here and have to be begun again.] The liquidator had been advised by Canadian counsel to present this application, and he was willing that the order should run "subject to any rights of lien and retention which the said Allan Grant may have, as these may be ascertained by the Courts of Canada." Such an order would prevent any possible injustice, and

* Section 100 of the Companies Act (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 89) enacts,—
"The Court may, at any time after making an order for winding up a company, require any contributory for the time being settled on the list of contributories, trustee, receiver, banker, or agent, or officer of the company, to pay, deliver, convey, surrender, or transfer forthwith, or within such time as the Court directs, to or into the hands of the official liquidator, any sum or balance, books, papers, estate, or effects which happen to be in his hands for the time being, and to which the company is prima facie entitled."

would, besides, produce a material saving of time, for the question of lien here raised was one of Canadian law, and would have to be determined by the Canadian Courts sooner or later. Under such an order they would settle it at once, and the case would return here ready for final disposal.

No. 37.

Dec. 3, 1886.
British Canadian Lumbering
and Timber
Co. Limited.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—Had I been sitting alone, I must say I should have had no hesitation in pronouncing such an order as Mr Murray now asks. The qualification seems to me sufficiently to protect any rights which this gentleman may have.

LORD YOUNG.—I quite see the force of what Lord Rutherford Clark says, and think it highly probable that this gentleman would suffer no prejudice if such an order were pronounced; but then we are here proceeding ex parte, and speaking for myself, I cannot feel quite sure that this note discloses the only answer which may be made to this application, or that the Canadian Courts are the competent tribunals to consider all possible objections.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—At first I was inclined to take Lord Rutherford Clark's view, but especially after considering the English case to which Lord Young has referred, I have come to think that we should order intimation in the usual way.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I see no ground here for departing from our established practice.

The note further prayed for authority to the liquidator to sell by private bargain certain lots of growing timber in Canada belonging to the company, and stated that having failed to sell this timber by public auction, the liquidator had been advised that the usual way of selling such property was by private bargain, the buyer having a certain time for examining the subjects before closing the transaction, as possible purchasers were unwilling to incur the expense of making an examination of the subjects, which were in the interior of the country, except on a definite offer.

THE COURT ordered intimation to be made to Mr Grant, and, without giving any opinions, granted the second part of the prayer de plano.

GRAHAM, JOHNSTON, & FLEMING, W.S., Agents.

THE INCORPORATED SOCIETY OF LAW-AGENTS IN SCOTLAND, Petitioners.— No. 38.

C. J. Guthrie.

ANDREW CLARK, Respondent.—Lord-Adv. Macdonald—Rhind—Hay.

Dec. 3, 1886.
Incorporated
Society of Law-Agents
in Scotland v.
Clark.

Administration of Justice—Law-Agents (Scotland) Act, 1873, secs. 13 and 14—Removal of law-agent's name from roll.—In a petition by the Incorporated Society of Law-Agents praying the Court to direct the removal from the rolls of law-agents in the Court of Session and in the Sheriff Court of the Lothians and Peebles the name of a law-agent who had been convicted of an offence under the 11th section of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, and had been expelled from the Society of Solicitors before the Supreme Courts, the Court in the circumstances, and having regard to a representation signed by a large number of enrolled law-agents to the effect that he should not be removed, refused the petition.

UNDER the Law-Agents (Scotland) Act, 1873, secs. 11 and 12, a roll of 1ST DIVISION.
law-agents practising before the Court of Session is directed to be kept by a registrar appointed for the purpose, and by section 14, subsection 1, the name of any person may be struck off the said rolls "in obedience to the order of the Court, upon application duly made, and after hearing parties, or giving them an opportunity of being heard." By section 22 it is enacted that "every enrolled law-agent shall be subject to the juris-

No. 38.

Dec. 8, 1886.
Incorporated
Society of Law-Agents
in Scotland v.
Clark.

diction of the Court in any complaint which may be made against him for misconduct as a law-agent, and it shall be lawful for the Court in either Division thereof to deal summarily with any such complaint, and to do therein as shall be just."

On 5th May 1886 Andrew Clark, a law-agent whose name was upon the roll of law-agents practising before the Court of Session, and on the roll of those practising in the Sheriff Courts of the Lothians and Peebles, was convicted of an offence under the 11th section of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, in consequence of which he was expelled from the Society of Solicitors in the Supreme Courts, of which he was a member, by interlocutor of the First Division, dated 15th May 1886, upon a petition to the Court, founding upon the Society's private Act of Parliament (34 and 35 Vict. c. cvii.), (cf. 13 R. 1170).

The Incorporated Society of Law-Agents now presented a petition praying the Court "to direct the registrar of law-agents and the keepers of the rolls of law-agents made up under the provisions of the Law-Agents Act, to strike the name of the said Andrew Clark off the said register and rolls." They founded upon the previous case at the instance of the Solicitors in the Supreme Court.

Clark lodged answers, in which he pleaded, inter alia, that the Society had no title or interest to present the petition. He further founded upon a representation which was made to the Court, and signed by 166 enrolled law-agents, to the effect that "Mr Clark has been sufficiently punished, and that his name should not be struck off the roll."

When the case came on for hearing, the Lord Advocate, for Clark, waived all the pleas stated in the answers, and founded solely upon the representation in question.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Lord Advocate, on behalf of the respondent, withdrew all the objections to the title of the petitioners, and accordingly it is not necessary for the Court to dispose of the points raised in the answers affecting the title. But I think it right to say that I should be very slow indeed to reject the title of any person having an interest to make an application of this kind to the Court. The jurisdiction of the Court in this matter is not created by the Law-Agents Act. It is altogether independent of it, and the title to make a complaint of this kind is sufficient if the person making the complaint is himself an enrolled law-agent, and has an interest to see that the roll is kept pure.

As regards the merits of the application, and the statements made in answer, the duty of the Court is undoubtedly a delicate one. We have had to consider the effect to be given to a statement which has been put into process, signed by 166 gentlemen known to the Court as practitioners. In some cases—in a certain class of offences—I do not think the Court would be inclined to listen to any such statement, because there are offences of such a description as would completely disqualify a person committing them from acting in the profession of a law-agent in future; and no concurrence of opinion or sympathy with the party complained of could be allowed to interfere with the duty of the Court in putting an end to the connection between it and the person so offending. But the offence of which the respondent was convicted here is of a peculiar kind; and seeing that so many gentlemen who are practising in the Court, or at least following the profession of a law-agent within this district of country, are desirous that the punishment already inflicted upon the respondent should be held as sufficient, and imply, although they do not expressly state it, that they are willing to associate with him in future as a professional brother, the Court has come to be of opinion that in the circumstances they will not strike the respondent's name off the roll, and further, that they will make no order in the matter of expenses.

LORD MURE and LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD SHAND was absent.

THE COURT accordingly refused the petition.

CARMERT, WEDDERBURN, & WATSON, W.S.—PARTY—AGENTS.

No. 38.

Dec. 3, 1886.
Incorporated
Society of Law-Agents
in Scotland v.
Clark.

HONEYMAN & WILSON, Pursuers (Respondents).—Scott—Gardner.
MRS ELIZABETH JAMES OR ROBERTSON, AND OTHERS, Defenders (Reclaimers).—A. S. D. Thomson.

No. 39.

Dec. 7, 1886.
Honeyman &
Wilson v.
Robertson, &c.

Husband and Wife—Donation—Revocation by creditors.—A husband purchased certain heritable property, taking the title in favour of himself and his wife in conjunct liferent for her liferent use allanarly, and their children in fee, but under reservation of power to the husband at any time during his life, and without consent of his wife or children, "to sell, burden, wadset, and affect with debt, or even gratuitously dispone the subjects as if he were absolute proprietor of the same." There was no provision made for the wife by antenuptial contract or otherwise, and there was no allegation that the husband was not solvent at the date of the purchase. In an adjudication at the instance of a creditor of the husband, raised after his death, held that as the provisions for the wife and children were revocable by the husband at any time the subjects were not protected from his creditors.

In 1872 James Robertson, lodging-house keeper, Wemyss Place, Edinburgh, bought from John Dick, spirit-dealer there, certain heritable subjects, taking a disposition in favour of himself "and Elizabeth James or Robertson, his spouse, in conjunct liferent for the said Elizabeth James or Robertson, her liferent use allanarly," and to their children nominatim, their heirs and assignees in fee, but under a reservation in favour of James Robertson "at any time of his life, and without the consent of his then wife, the said Elizabeth James or Robertson, and his children . . . or any of them, to sell, burden, wadset, or affect with debt, and even gratuitously dispone the subjects as if he were absolute proprietor of the same" therein described. The investiture was in the following terms:—"In virtue of which precept I hereby give to the said James Robertson, senior, and Mrs Elizabeth James or Robertson, in conjunct liferent for the said Elizabeth James or Robertson, her liferent use allanarly, and to the said Jemima Robertson, James Robertson, junior, and Francis Robertson, equally between them in fee, saine of the shops, dwelling-houses, and others above described, consisting of the two halves or shares pro indiviso thereof respectively, but always with and under the whole burdens, conditions, and declarations before specified or referred to, and with and under the reservation, power, faculty, and liberty in favour of the said James Robertson, senior, before mentioned."

1st DIVISION.
Lord Kinnear.
B.

James Robertson died on 29th December 1884, leaving a trust-deed under which his widow and others were appointed trustees and executors.

On 25th January 1886, Messrs Honeyman & Wilson, merchants in Edinburgh, who were creditors of James Robertson, there being no executry estate out of which they could obtain payment of their debt, raised an action of declarator and adjudication against Elizabeth James or Robertson, and others, in which they sought to have the heritable property above mentioned adjudged to them in payment of their debt.

No. 39.

Dec. 7, 1886.
Honeyman &
Wilson v.
Robertson, &c.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The said deceased James Robertson having contracted the obligation sued on, and not having left estate to meet the same otherwise, the reservation and others in favour of the said deceased James Robertson libelled must be held to have been used and exercised by him, at least to the effect mentioned in the summons; and the pursuers are accordingly entitled to decree of declarator, as concluded for. (3) The pursuers are entitled to have the subjects and others mentioned in the summons adjudged to them for payment of the debt due to them by the said deceased James Robertson.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The present defender Mrs Elizabeth James or Robertson is entitled to vindicate her right of liferent under the investiture in her favour as against the pursuers' alleged rights or claims. (2) Being feudally vested in the subjects mentioned in the summons long before the pursuers' alleged debt was constituted or incurred, the defender cannot now be dispossessed by them. (3) In any event, if the subjects can be adjudged under this action, they must be burdened with the liferent right in favour of the defender. (4) The action is incompetent and irrelevant, in respect the liferent infestment in the present defender's favour, if reducible, can only be set aside in a properly libelled action of reduction. (5) The deceased James Robertson senior having died without having exercised the reserved faculty or power in his favour condescended on, the pursuers are not entitled to the decree concluded for.

It was admitted that there was no antenuptial contract of marriage entered into between Mr and Mrs Robertson in which any provision was made for her, and there was no allegation that Robertson was insolvent at the date when he bought the subjects.

On 31st March 1886, the Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having considered the cause, finds that the fee of the subjects libelled was vested in the deceased James Robertson, that the same are liable to be adjudged for payment of his debts, and that the liferent interest of the defender, Mrs Elizabeth James or Robertson, is not valid or effectual to her in competition with the creditors of the said deceased: Therefore repels the first five pleas in law for the defender, and continues the cause, reserving in the meantime all questions of expenses. Grants leave to reclaim."*

* "NOTE.—The title to the subjects in question is taken to the deceased James Robertson and his wife, the defender, in conjunct liferent, for her liferent use allanarly, and certain of their children in fee, but under reservation of power to the husband, at any time during his life, and without the consent of his wife or children, 'to sell, burden, wadset, and affect with debt, or even gratuitously dispoise the subjects, as if he were absolute proprietor of the same.' There can be no question that this leaves the absolute right of property in the husband, and that the interest of the wife and children is nothing more than a hope of succession to the rights of fee and liferent conferred upon them respectively.

"It is said that the wife's liferent ought to be sustained as a reasonable provision, since she is not otherwise provided for, and there would have been force in the contention, were it not for the absolute right of the husband to dispoise the subjects, either onerously or gratuitously, without the consent of the wife. But a widow cannot compete with the husband's creditors for a provision which may be revoked at the pleasure of the husband. The case appears to be a hard one, but I can find no sufficient reason for holding that the subjects are protected from the diligence of the husband's creditors.

"The case was argued on the assumption that there was a debt due, and that the only question was whether the defender's liferent could be affected by an adjudication at the pursuer's instance. But the amount is not proved by admission or otherwise, and decree of constitution cannot be given until this is done."

The defenders reclaimed, and maintained that the disposition of these subjects in favour of the widow in liferent was a reasonable provision for her, and was entered into when the husband was solvent. To provide for his wife was a natural obligation on a husband, and it would at most only be reduced quoad excessum. By the husband's death the right became effectual.¹

No. 39.

Dec. 7, 1886.
Honeyman &
Wilson v.
Robertson, &c.

The pursuers maintained that the provision was clearly revocable by the husband during his lifetime; his creditors were in exactly the same position as he was in regard to the gift, for it was purely testamentary, and could insist on its being revoked. Creditors could not be excluded without the interposition of a trust.² This could not be a provision for the wife. That was inconsistent with its being left under the husband's administration.³

At advising.—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case the Lord Ordinary says that the position of the widow is a hard one, and I quite agree with him, but, at the same time, we must take care that this hard case does not lead us into any bad law, as hard cases are proverbially apt to do. The deed on which the widow's right depends was taken by her husband from a third party. It is a disposition in favour of James Robertson and his spouse in conjunct liferent for her liferent use allenary and certain of their children and their respective heirs and assignees in fee. Now, that destination admits of different constructions according to circumstances, but the point in the present case depends entirely on the terms of a reservation in favour of the husband, reserving to him a power at anytime during his life, and without the consent of his wife or children, "to sell, burden, wadset, and affect with debt or even gratuitously dispose the subjects as if he were absolute proprietor of the same." Now, the Lord Ordinary has held that the effect of that reservation is to leave the husband just as free and unfettered in dealing with this property as if no attempt had been made to make a provision for his wife and children, in short, that this conveyance, so far as it regards the right of the wife and children, can have no effect other than a purely testamentary one. I agree with the Lord Ordinary in that view of the case. The cases with which it is sought to assimilate this one are all easily distinguishable, and I need not refer to them at length. To go no further back than the well-known case of Rust v. Smith, Jan. 14, 1865, 3 Macph. 378, in which Lord Deas delivered the opinion of the Court, I find there a very good example of how such a provision may be made effectual against the husband's creditors. There the husband purchased a house, and took the disposition from the seller directly to his wife. The wife was not infert therein, but, nevertheless, in the husband's bankruptcy the circumstances were such that the Court held that there being no allegation that the husband was insolvent at the date of the disposition, it was a reasonable provision for the wife, and not revocable by the husband or by anyone else in his right. Now, it is that element of revocability which distinguishes this case from Rust v. Smith, and other cases of the same nature. It is quite impossible to say that this provision was not revocable. The husband could give ¹ Sharp v. Christie, Jan. 19, 1839, 1 D. 396; Wright v. Harley, June 2, 1847, 9 D. 1151, 19 Scot. Jur. 500; Galloway v. Craig, July 17, 1861, H. of L., 4 Macq. 267; Dunlop v. Johnston, April 2, 1867, 5 Macph. (H. L.) 22, 39 Scot. Jur. 382; Boustead v. Gardner, Nov. 4, 1879, 7 R. 139.

² White's Trustees v. Whyte, June 1, 1877, 4 R. 787.

³ Bell's Prin. sec. 1944.

No. 39. away the property gratuitously, or he might sell or burden it so as to render the provision quite inoperative when the time came for it being carried into effect, and, therefore, I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that it is not effectual against the husband's creditors.

Dec. 7, 1886.
Honeyman &
Wilson v.
Robertson, &c.

LORD MURE.—I regret that I have not been able to come to any other conclusion than that at which your Lordship and the Lord Ordinary have arrived, as I concur in thinking that this is a hard case for the defender Mrs Robertson. I have carefully examined all the cases to which we were referred to see whether any of them afforded sufficient ground for coming to a different conclusion, but my examination of them has resulted in this, that I am of opinion that to entitle the wife to maintain this case against her husband's creditors it would be necessary for her to establish three things, as set forth in the Lord Chancellor's opinion in Galloway v. Craig, July 17, 1861, 4 Macq. 267, viz., (1) that there was no antenuptial contract where a suitable provision was made for her; (2) that the husband was solvent at the date of the deed; (3) that it was the intention of parties that the disposition should act as a provision, and not as a gift merely. As regards the first two points there is no difficulty. There was no antenuptial contract, and there is no averment that the husband was insolvent at the date of the deed, but the difficulty of the case lies in this, whether the deed was intended to operate as a provision for the wife. I am sorry to say that I have been unable to come to any other conclusion than that it was not, and that the husband having preserved his right to dispoise or burden the property, the deed was revocable, and not good against his creditors.

LORD SHAND.—I think the ground of judgment is very well stated in the note of the Lord Ordinary. If the provision here stood simply on the conveyance of the house in the terms of the disposition without the clause of reservation, it might have been effectual against the husband's creditors. The husband conveys the property to himself and his wife in conjunct liferent for her liferent use allanarly, and to the children in fee, and a provision of that kind being reasonable, and the husband being solvent at the time it was made, the provision would have received effect. Unfortunately, however, for the widow, the husband qualified the disposition by a reservation to himself of a power to sell, burden, or gratuitously to give the property. It is impossible to represent that as an irrevocable provision in favour of the wife, and if it is not then the creditors are exactly in the same position with regard to it as the husband was, and are entitled to revoke the gift. The only effect of the deed was that the granter made a settlement which would take effect at his death, if it was not revoked, or if he had not during his lifetime incurred debt so as to entitle his creditors to insist on its revocation.

LORD ADAM.—In this case the husband retained the full benefit and enjoyment of the property during his life. He had a reserved power to sell or burden it, or to give it away gratuitously. That being so, it seems to me that this is an attempt to put the property extra commercium, and yet to retain the full benefit and enjoyment of it. That the law does not allow, and I think, therefore, that the disposition is simply a revocable provision, meant to come into operation at the time of the husband's death if it had not already been revoked.

THE COURT adhered.

FINLAY & WILSON, S.S.C.—D. TODD LEES, S.S.C.—Agents.

FINDLAY'S TRUSTEES, Pursuers and Real Raisers.

HARRY CHEYNE (Jane Findlay's Curator ad litem), Claimant.—G. R. Gillespie.

No. 40.

Dec. 7, 1886.*
Findlay's
Trustees v.
Findlays.GEORGE FINDLAY AND JESSIE FINDLAY, Claimants.—Pearson—Baxter.

Parent and Child—Succession—Conditio si sine liberis testator decesserit—Implied will.—A father executed a holograph will in 1878, when he was a widower, leaving his whole estates, heritable and moveable, to his two children nominationem. In 1884, before entering into a second marriage, he executed a marriage-contract in which he assigned £3000 to trustees to secure payment of an annuity of £150 to his second wife should she survive him, with directions to the trustees on her death, should she survive him, to divide the trust funds among his children of both marriages equally, and, in the event of his wife predeceasing him, to restore the fund to himself, the marriage-contract, in that event, containing no provision for children of the second marriage. He died six months after this marriage, survived by his widow, who subsequently gave birth to a posthumous child. This child claimed a share of the provisions made for the other children in the holograph will in addition to a share of the trust fund. The Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) repelled the claim.

GEORGE FINDLAY, hatter in Aberdeen, died on 15th May 1885, leaving a holograph will, dated 9th March 1878, in the following terms:—"I, George Findlay, with the full intention if spared to make a proper will fully detailed, do hereby appoint Mr George Findlay Shirras, my nephew, and Mr Patrick Morgan, 11 Richmond Terrace, to be trustees on my estate, and my son George to be trustee when the age of twenty-one, but to be present at all meetings till then but not to vote only to express his wish but to have full power @ twenty-one. The trustees to give my sister Ann Findlay the sum of forty pounds per annum during her lifetime, George Findlay, my son, and Jessie Ann Findlay, my daughter, to have share and share alike both of heritable and moveable, or the survivor of them. GEORGE FINDLAY. P.S.—The trustees to have a gift of nineteen guineas each."

OUTER-HOUSE
Lord Kinnear.

At the date of the will the testator was a widower, his wife having died in 1875, and the two children named in it were his only children. In 1884 he contracted a second marriage, and by an antenuptial contract he bound himself to make payment of an annuity of £150 to his second wife in case she should survive him, and in security of the annuity he assigned to trustees certain stocks and shares of the value of £3000 or thereby. In the event of the wife surviving, the trustees were directed on her death, leaving issue, to realise the trust funds, and divide the proceeds among all the children of both marriages equally, share and share alike; and it was declared that the provisions of the contract, so far as in favour of the children of the marriage, should be in full satisfaction of legitim, executry, and everything else they could claim through the father's decease, goodwill excepted. In the event of his wife's predecease, the trustees were to refund the stocks and shares so handed to them, and that whether there were any children of the marriage or not.

Findlay died about six months after his second marriage, survived by his wife. She gave birth a few months after her husband's death to a posthumous daughter, and shortly thereafter died.

Findlay's moveable estate was worth about £5066. He had two heritable properties, the title to the first of which, a house in Victoria Street, Aberdeen, was taken in 1867 in favour of him and his first wife in conjunct fee and liferent, but for her liferent use only, and, after the death of

No. 40.

Dec. 7, 1886.
Findlay's
Trustees v.
Findlays.

the longest liver, of the children procreated or to be procreated between them, equally, share and share alike, in fee. The title to the other, a house in Aberdeen, let to tenants, and which was purchased in 1874, was in favour of Findlay, the testator, and his heirs and assignees whomsoever.

Findlay's trustees raised a multiplepinding to determine the rights of his children in his estate. Mr Harry Cheyne, W.S., was appointed curator ad litem to Jane, the posthumous daughter, and claimed a third of the estate, heritable and moveable. George and Jessie claimed share and share alike of the estate, to the exclusion of Jane.

Both parties founded on the holograph writing referred to, the curator ad litem for Jane pleading;—Upon a sound construction of the testamentary writing of 9th March 1878, in the circumstances which have occurred, the pupil defender is entitled to an equal share of the whole estate conveyed by the said testamentary writing along with the pursuer George Findlay and his sister, Jessie Ann Findlay, and the claimant, as curator ad litem to the pupil defender, is therefore entitled to be ranked in terms of his claim.

Argued for Jane;—The will was holograph, and in the form of a direction to trustees, and was therefore open to construction.¹ In proceeding to construe the will, it could not be disputed that, in cases where a father had died before any child was born to him, a will in which no provision was made for the event of the birth of a child could be reduced by a post natus,² on the principle of the conditio si sine liberis decesserit.³ The law shewed favour to the child's claim, and it must be made "as plain as a pike-staff that the testator did not intend the succession to go to the child"⁴ before a right so deeply founded could be disappointed. The same reasoning covered the case of a child in the position of the claimant here, and authority had sanctioned such a claim.⁵ It was said that that authority, resting as it did on the case of Anderson,⁶ which had been reversed in the House of Lords, carried no weight. But although Lord President Campbell, in deciding Oliphant's case, had referred to Anderson's case as an analogy, the judgment in Oliphant's case rested on entirely different grounds, the claim in Anderson's case being a claim to share in a contract provision made by a father who was still alive at the date of the claim, the claim in Oliphant's case being a claim to participate in a succession, as here. The remedy, it was said, open to a posthumous child was reduction; that was so where there were no other children, and no means of ascertaining the father's mind to his children. Here his mind was plain, namely, to divide his whole estate equally among his children. Nor was the provision for children in the contract on the occasion of his second marriage a good ground for exclusion. In that contract all children—of both marriages—were equally favoured, and it was not a provision for all events, but only for the event of the father predeceasing the mother.

Argued for George and Jessie;—(1) The authority of Oliphant's case had been denied; and (2) the principle to which the other claimant appealed, viz., that a father could not be presumed to intend to leave a

¹ Per Lord Young in Mitchell's Executor v. Smith, &c., July 7, 1880, 7 R. 1090.

² Colquhoun v. Campbell, June 5, 1829, 7 S. 709; A's Executors v. B and Others, 1874, 11 S. L. R. 259.

³ Cod. vi. 42, 30.

⁴ Lord Glenlee in Colquhoun's case.

⁵ Oliphant, Dec. 10, 1794, Bell's Foll. Ca. 126, cited ad longum in the opinion of the Lord President in Spalding v. Spalding's Trustees, Dec. 18, 1874, 2 R. 247.

⁶ Anderson v. Anderson, 1729, M. 6590, rev. H. of L., 1 Craigie, 136.

child unprovided for, was inapplicable in a case in which he had provided for the child. In Spalding's case¹ Lord President Inglis had pointed out that Oliphant's case had been rested on Anderson's, and that the reversal in that latter case could not have been known when the judgment in Oliphant's case was pronounced. His Lordship and the other Judges of the First Division in Spalding's case spoke of Oliphant's case as being therefore of no authority. Whatever might be the result in a case where a posthumous child was left destitute, the presumption of parental affection on which the whole case of the other claimant was founded could have no existence when, as here, the father had considered the possibility of his having more children, and had made provision for them if they should be born. That the posthumous child got less than the others was of no moment, for there was no presumption for an equal provision to all children. There was thus no ground for the application of the doctrine of implied will. If, again, the claimant pleaded the conditio si sine liberis decesserit, the result of that would be to reduce the will. The other claimant could cite no authority (unless Oliphant) for admitting the posthumous child to a share in the provision made nominatim for the others. If she had any remedy it must be by way of reduction.

The Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the claim for Harry Cheyne, W.S., curator ad litem to Jane Elmslie Henderson Findlay: Sustains the claim for the other claimants, and ranks and prefers them in terms thereof, and decerns."*

THIS judgment was acquiesced in.

MACKENZIE & KERMACK, W.S.—STUART & STUART, W.S.—Agents.

¹ Supra, p. 168, note 5.

* "OPINION.— . . . The curator ad litem maintains on behalf of this posthumous daughter that, by an implication founded on the pietas paterna, the will may be so construed as to entitle her to share in the general estate along with her brother and sister. The only authority cited in support of this claim is the case of Oliphant (Bell's Fol. Ca. 125), where the claim of a posthumous child was sustained to a share of a bond of provision destined to two elder children nominatim. But no weight can be attached to that decision, because, as was pointed out in the case of Spalding (2 R. 247), it proceeded upon the supposed authority of a previous case of Anderson, which was reversed in the House of Lords. The case of Anderson is perhaps distinguishable, because what was proposed in that case was not to extend a will, but to extend a contract by implication. But if the judgment of the House of Lords cannot be taken as a direct authority against the present claim, it is at least sufficient, as was held in the case of Spalding, to displace the only authority which can be cited in support of it.

"The argument founded on implied will, therefore, would be unsupported by authority even if there had been no other provision for the ward. But it is a material consideration that she is, in fact, provided for by the marriage-contract. It is impossible to say, therefore, that the testator did not advert to the possibility of his having children by his second marriage. But if he has provided, whether by the will or by marriage-contract, for the contingency of such children coming into existence and surviving him, that appears to me to displace the assumption upon which alone they could be admitted to participate in an estate bequeathed nominatim to elder children."

No. 41.

Dec. 7, 1886.*

Stirling v.
Mackenzie,
Gardner, &
Alexander.JAMES HUTCHISON STIRLING, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Mackay—C. S. Dickson.

MACKENZIE, GARDNER, & ALEXANDER, Defenders (Respondents).—

D.-F. Mackintosh—Jameson.

Agent and Client—Reparation.—Circumstances in which the Court held that a firm of law-agents were not bound to make good to a client a sum invested by their advice on a heritable security which turned out to be insufficient.

Opinions that law-agents in lending a client's money on heritable security are bound to take all reasonable care in seeing to the sufficiency of the security, and are not responsible merely for the validity of the bond.

2D DIVISION.

Lord Fraser.

I.

DR JAMES HUTCHISON STIRLING had for many years been on terms of intimate friendship with Mr Mackenzie, the senior partner of the firm of Mackenzie, Gardner, & Alexander, writers, Glasgow, and was in the habit of consulting him and other members of the firm from time to time as to investments which he contemplated. In February 1878 Dr Stirling sold United States Funded Bonds to the amount of £5651, and this sum he was desirous of reinvesting. A correspondence followed, in which different investments were suggested. On 28th February 1879 Dr Stirling wrote Messrs Mackenzie, Gardner, & Alexander as follows:—"The enclosed letter (which please return) will suggest to you that I am again seeking an investment for some money. When I transferred the sum in question last year to Edinburgh I had some prospect of the purchase of some apparently advantageous feus; but I found myself in the end temporarily entrusting my funds to the company in allusion which, as then new (and with a friend at the board) I persuaded to allow me 5 per cent for a year. The same company are willing—rather manager proposes—to allow me (as a 'special') still the same terms on deposit for say four years. I intimated to them some time ago, however, that in view of the existing depression, and with the hope of investments that would rise, I should not this year renew my deposit. These are my views still. I cannot but observe, however, that, unless in the case of banks, the relative failure and general depression have rather tended to render good investments dear. I shall not meddle with banks, but still it may be possible to find stocks at once with a fair yield and a fair prospect of improvement on the improvement of business—a prospect, however, which as yet evidently only recedes, so far as business is concerned. Still, Government wants money, companies want money, and it is possible there may be a fall in prices in good stocks even by the 29th proxo. There was a depression in gas lately, which, taken advantage of, would have yielded large profits. The London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company is evidently the favourite just now, but, like the N. B. sometime ago, it may be only a calculated cry, and a friend of mine in London, financial editor of a financial paper, is not at all warm about it. He favours the Metropolitan District. You see my desire is to redeem a certain loss the 'silver scare' (!) caused me. It is possible, in want of money, that a good company might allow even a 5 per cent for a term of years on such a sum as £5700. In fact, failing the possibility of depressed railway purchases, I must seek the best more permanent investment I can. They say property—I mean house property—is in a very bad way with you in Glasgow, and that great caution is necessary in regard to it. You see, then, that my idea is to do the best I can with the money, divided or undivided, and just in any way. I should be glad and grateful did you afford me the assistance of your advice, information, No. 41.

and negotiation on this occasion."

On 14th March 1879 Messrs Mackenzie & Company replied:—"We were duly favoured with your letter of the 28th ulto. When your letter came to hand we had arranged that our Mr Alexander should write you with a proposal for investing at least £3000 of the amount you had coming out of investment, but unfortunately he was laid up almost immediately afterwards with influenza cold, and he has only recently got out and found time to write you. By this time you may, however, have completed your arrangements for reinvesting, without waiting longer to hear from us, and if so, you need not disturb them. What we had to propose to you was a loan on heritable property in Glasgow, bearing 5 per cent interest, which we consider a perfectly safe investment, and which is now available only because of the holders requiring for temporary purposes some funds. The bond in question is for £4000 over a property in Stirling Square, east end of Ingram Street, all let, rental of which is £581, 17s., and ground rent £214, 17s. The property belongs to a client of our own, and the bond is held by the Property Investment Company of Scotland, for whom we act. The loan was got when money was dear, and with the big ground rent was only given at 5 per cent interest. As we have said, the bond is for £4000; but as the company have occasion for the money, they are willing to give a preferable assignation of the bond to the extent of £3000 to anyone who would take that amount of it up, the result of the arrangement being that the £3000 would become a first security, and the remaining £1000 postponed to it over the property. The property was recently valued at £6500 over and above the ground-annual, and we know that the proprietor, about a year ago, refused £6000 for it. We are quite satisfied that the property is ample security for the £3000, and as the interest is a-half per cent more than usual, the opportunity is a good one, both as regards return and permanency of investment. In case you might still be open to think of the proposal, we send you a detailed rental and valuation of the property, and if you should think the matter worth consideration, you can let us hear from you regarding it. The company holding the loan is an Edinr. company of the same kind as the North Albion. The interest on the loan has been always paid regularly, and the company wish the money for financial purposes, and are in no way dissatisfied with the loan."

Dec. 7, 1886.
Stirling v.
Mackenzie,
Gardner, &
Alexander.

The valuation referred to was made by Mr J. D. Smellie, and bore the date of 25th May 1875.

Dr Stirling closed with the proposal by return of post, and the Property Investment Company of Scotland executed an assignation, dated 21st March 1879, in favour of Dr Stirling of the bond to the extent of £3000, it being provided and declared that the assignee should rank primo loco for the £3000 and interest.

The interest upon the £3000 so lent was paid up to and including the term of Martinmas 1882, but after that date no interest was paid, and Mr Findlay, the proprietor, had allowed his ground-annual to run into arrear.

In March 1880 Mr Alexander died, and in December 1885 Mr Mackenzie retired from business.

On 28th October 1885 Dr Stirling raised an action against Messrs Mackenzie & Company, concluding for payment of £3000, with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent from Martinmas 1882.

The pursuer stated;—(Cond. 8) "The defenders accepted of and acted on the pursuer's employment as his agents in the transaction in question,

No. 41.

Dec. 7, 1886.
 Stirling v.
 Mackenzie,
 Gardner, &
 Alexander.

and the pursuer relied, and was entitled to rely, on their exercising due professional care and skill on his behalf as a lender. It was the duty of the defenders as agents of the pursuer to make inquiries into and satisfy themselves of the sufficiency of the security subjects for the amount of the said loan, but they failed to do so. In particular, they failed to procure or to submit to the pursuer accurate information as to the reletting of the security subjects at the then ensuing term of Whitsunday 1879; they obtained no valuation of these subjects as at the date of arranging the loan; and they did not explain to the pursuer, who was unacquainted with business matters, and relied entirely on the defenders as his agents, what they themselves were well aware of, but the pursuer was ignorant of, that subsequent to the date of the said valuation of 1875 there had been a great fall in the value of property in Glasgow, and, in particular, of the property in question. They further took, as security for the pursuer's loan, a property which in fact was at the time, and which the defenders knew, or but for gross negligence or want of skill ought to have known, was utterly inadequate for the protection and safety of the pursuer. Moreover, what was assigned to the pursuer in security of his loan was a portion only of the bond and disposition in security for £4000, and he is thus not in a position to realise the security subjects without at all events risk of further loss and expense; and the defenders likewise failed, as was their duty, to explain to the pursuer that this would be the result of acquiring only a portion of the security. Their failure in all these respects, as set forth in this and the preceding articles, was a failure in their duty to the pursuer as his law-agents, and the defenders were thereby guilty of gross negligence and want of skill."

The pursuer pleaded;—(2) The omission of the defenders to make or cause to be made all due inquiries as to the value and rental of the said subjects and their sufficiency as a security for the said loan, and their failure to inform the pursuer thereon, and as to the fall in the value of heritable property in Glasgow, amounted in the circumstances to gross negligence and failure of duty towards the pursuer, for the consequences of which the defenders are liable. (3) The defenders having, while acting as the pursuer's agents, been guilty of gross negligence and want of skill in taking as a security a property which was and still is, and which by ordinary care they would have known to be, utterly inadequate, they are liable to make good to the pursuer the whole amount of the loan, and the interest thereon, as concluded for.

The defenders stated,—“They have acted as law-agents for the pursuer only when he specially employed them. The pursuer was in the habit of writing to them as friends to ask about investments, and no charge was made or paid for correspondence of this kind, the pursuer having for a long time been on terms of friendship and intimacy with the senior partner of the defenders' firm.”

They denied that there had been any misrepresentation, concealment, or neglect of duty on their part.

The defenders pleaded;—(4) The defenders having submitted to the pursuer a true statement of all the essential facts regarding the security subjects in question at the date of the transaction being entered into, they are not chargeable with misrepresentation. (5) The pursuer having taken the matter of judging of the soundness of the investment in question into his own hands, and, separatim, having led the defenders to believe that he had taken the matter into his own hands and was satisfied on the subject, he is not entitled to insist in the present action. (6) The defenders not having been guilty of negligence or want of skill in any professional duty undertaken by them on the employment of the pursuer, or paid for by him, they are entitled to absolvitor, with expenses. (7) No. 41.

A law-agent not being liable as guaranteeing the soundness or sufficiency of investments made by his client, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor, with expenses.

Dec. 7, 1886.
Stirling v.
Mackenzie,
Gardner, &
Alexander.

On 27th January 1886 the Lord Ordinary (Fraser) allowed a proof.

The import of the evidence is given by the Lord Ordinary in his note.

On 14th May 1886 the Lord Ordinary assolizied the defenders from the conclusions of the action.*

* "OPINION.—The pursuer seeks, by the present action, to make the defenders, his law-agents, liable for loss sustained in connection with a heritable security which they negotiated on his behalf. The ground of action alleged is gross negligence and want of skill, and also the non-communication of material facts.

"The pursuer and the senior member of the defenders' firm had been on terms of friendly intercourse for a number of years, and in consequence of this the pursuer exercised the privilege of consulting the defenders at various times as to investments of his funds. This correspondence has been produced, and certainly shews perfect intimacy with and knowledge of the Stock Exchange on the part of the pursuer. He asks for suggestions from his correspondents, the defenders, and he receives them. He judges of such suggestions with perfect good sense, great sagacity, and prudence, having at the same time a keen desire to get a security that would yield him 5 per cent. When examined as a witness the pursuer protested that he was not a business man—a protest, however, which cannot be accepted in the face of the letters which he wrote. In January 1876 he turns his attention to mortgages on house property, and requests information as to whether or not such an investment would be advantageous, and the defenders reply to him,—‘We think we might be able to place £3000 as a first mortgage on a good house and shop property in Ardrossan, which has just been purchased by public roup for £4015.’ On the 14th February 1876 the pursuer writes,—‘I find it difficult to come to a decision in any of the references, for which I have to thank you, in your letter of the 8th.’ The pursuer, in February 1878, sold United States Funded Bonds to the amount of £5651, which money he desired should be invested, and the mode of investment (hinted at at a personal interview between him and Mr Alexander, a member of the defenders' firm) is stated thus by Mr Alexander,—‘What has now to be done is to secure investments for this money, and I think I gathered from you that you would like to have bonds on house property to yield 4½ per cent. At present it is somewhat difficult to negotiate investments of that kind with a due regard to safety and eligibility.’ On 28th February 1879 the pursuer was again seeking investments, and in his letter of that date he says,—‘In fact, failing the possibility of depressed railway purchases, I must seek the best more permanent investment I can. They say property—I mean house property—is in a very bad way with you in Glasgow, and that great caution is necessary in regard to it. You see, then, that my idea is to do the best I can with the money, divided or undivided, and just in any way. I should be glad and grateful did you afford me the assistance of your advice, information and negotiation on this occasion.’ This letter produced an answer from the defenders, dated 14th March 1879, which is said to contain misrepresentation of material facts. But before referring particularly to this letter it will be convenient here to state some of the facts in connection with the security ultimately taken.

"John Findlay, a wright and builder in Glasgow, was proprietor of heritable property situated in Stirling Square, Glasgow, which consisted of a store, three shops, and a common lodging or dwelling-house above the shops. This property belonged to the City of Glasgow Improvement Trustees, and was sold by them to William M'Culloch. M'Culloch sold the property to Findlay on 12th January 1875, and in part payment of the price Findlay on the same date granted a bond for £4000 in favour of M'Culloch over the subjects. This bond M'Culloch assigned to the Property Investment Company of Scotland, Limited,

No. 41.

Dec. 7, 1886.
Stirling v.
Mackenzie,
Gardner, &
Alexander.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued ;—(1) The defenders had made false representations by stating that the property was a safe investment ; that on the 28th May 1875. That company continued creditors down to March 1879, when they executed an assignation in favour of the pursuer of the bond, 'but that only to the extent of the sum of £3000 sterling of principal, with the interest thereof from the date hereof. . . . Providing and declaring, as it is hereby expressly provided and declared; that the sums, principal, interest, and penalties hereby assigned shall be ranked and preferred primo loco on the said subjects and others, and the rents thereof.' . . . This assignation is dated 21st March 1879, and was recorded on the 25th. Thus the pursuer became the preferable bondholder to the extent of £3000 ; and the Property Investment Company were made to hold, and still hold, a postponed security for £1000.

"Interest was paid upon the bond to the pursuer down to Martinmas 1882, but since that date he has received no return in the shape of interest. The whole of the rents have been swallowed up in the payment of a heavy ground-annual of £214, 17s., payable to the City of Glasgow Improvement Trustees, and which Findlay, the owner of the property, allowed to run into arrear to a very large extent. The amount of the arrear at present owing is £192. Owing to the depression in trade which is common to the whole country, the rents of this property have fallen, and its value consequently has been diminished. What its real value is, could, of course, only be ascertained if it were put up to auction—which has been already once done at the pursuer's instance, but no offerer appeared. James Sellars, an architect in Glasgow, one of the pursuer's witnesses, says,—'I consider the value of the property at present is about £2500 to £2800,—that is, over and above the ground-annual.' There can be little doubt that if the property were sold to-day, it would not bring a price to repay to the pursuer his principal sum of £3000 and unpaid interest ; and therefore he now claims payment from the defenders of £3000, with interest at 5 per cent from Martinmas 1882.

"The letter of the defenders, on which the pursuer mainly relies as evidence of negligence, misrepresentation, and non-disclosure of facts, dated 14th March 1879, says as follows:—'What we had to propose to you was a loan on heritable property in Glasgow, bearing 5 per cent interest, which we consider a perfectly safe investment, and which is now available only because of the holders requiring for temporary purposes some funds.' The letter then goes on to state that the bond referred to 'is for £4000 over a property in Stirling Square, all let, rental of which is £581, 17s., and ground rent £214, 17s.' Now, it is perfectly true that at the time when this letter was written all the property was let, and that the rental then was £581 ; but it is also the fact that one of the tenants had intimated that he would cease to be a tenant at the following Whitsunday, which he did ; and further, that another of the tenants had obtained a reduction of his rent from £300 to £250, and these facts were not disclosed. I do not, however, consider that there was misrepresentation here, nor that there was withheld information that ought to have been given. The property was let ; and if one of the tenants intimated that he would give up his lease at the following Whitsunday, there was no reason to suppose the part of the property so left would remain unlet. The letter further states that 'the property was recently valued at £6500 over and above the ground-annual, and we know that the proprietor, about a year ago, refused £6000 for it. We are quite satisfied that the property is ample security for the £3000, and as the interest is a-half per cent more than usual, the opportunity is a good one, both as regards return and permanency of investment. In case you might still be open to think of the proposal, we send you a detailed rental and valuation of the property, and if you should think the matter worth consideration you can let us hear from you regarding it.' The statement that the property was 'recently' valued is giving a very wide meaning to the word 'recently.' The valuation which was sent to the pursuer was one made by Mr J. D. Smellie in 1875, on behalf of the Property Investment Company of Scotland, when they

it was all let; that the proprietor had been offered £6000 for it about a year before the proposed loan; and by referring the pursuer to a valuation—

No. 41.

Dec. 7, 1886.

became creditors in the bond for £4000 over it. This valuation, however, carries along with it its date, and the pursuer had thus the opportunity of seeing when the valuation was made—25th May 1875. Now, on the following day after that valuation was made, viz., 26th May 1875, Messrs Mackay & Ferguson, who were tenants of the store and offices, constituting part of the property, wrote to Mr John Findlay, the proprietor, a missive offer for a lease at a rent of £300, and in this missive offer they state as follows:—‘Further, we are to have the option of purchasing said stores and buildings, all as shewn on allocated feuing plans, being plot No. 1 of same, containing 871½ square yards, with a feu-duty of £214, 17s. 10d., at any time before 2d February next (1876), at the sum of £6500 sterling.’ The rental which accompanied the valuation was returned by the pursuer to the defenders along with his letter of 15th March 1879, and has been lost; but it is proved that the sum in the rental was, at the date of the defenders’ letter, as stated by them. The further statement that the proprietor Findlay had refused £6000 for the property is also proved by Mr Findlay, the proprietor, who at first did not remember the fact, but he finally gives it as his evidence,—‘I have no doubt I got a verbal offer of £6000 for the property, but I don’t know from whom.’

“Along with these statements of fact the defenders give an expression of very confident opinion. They state that they consider what they offer a perfectly safe investment ‘and ample security for the £3000.’ This opinion may have been right or wrong; but I see no ground for holding that it was not honestly given and believed. The defenders, no doubt, stood in the delicate position of acting both for the lender and the borrower. They were agents in Glasgow for the Property Investment Company of Scotland, who were creditors in the bond for £4000, and they were also agents for the proprietor Findlay. The Property Company were very desirous of obtaining money in order to meet calls upon them by depositors, and hence they gave instructions to call up this bond for £4000. Mr Couper, the manager of the Property Company, says,—‘I don’t think our fears were particularly excited about that loan. We were merely desirous of getting money to meet depositors that were coming in upon us.’ It was in consequence of the instructions to call up the bond that the defenders were induced to suggest this, as a security to the extent of £3000 to the pursuer. Now, at the time when this suggestion was made, the evidence is all to the effect that it was a good security for £3000. The fall in the value of property which began, by reason of the insolvency of the City of Glasgow Bank, was not felt to any great extent in March 1879; and it was only when the depression in trade went on continuing—and to get worse—during the subsequent years that all securities even upon the best sites, became materially depreciated. The property in question is in the centre of Glasgow, in a good business quarter, and altogether an eligible subject for a security. Mr Thomson, an architect and valuator in Glasgow, says of it,—‘It is a capital site. I think there is a value in it other than the mere old buildings.’

“The unexpected fall in the value of property, and the consequent depreciation of securities, is a notorious fact, to which all the witnesses speak; and the continuance of which they all also equally affirm to be unexpected. Findlay speaks of the matter thus:—‘I think the property in question was good security for £4000 at 15th March 1879. At that time neither I nor any other person anticipated that the depression of trade would be so great or so lasting as it has been. Property was at its highest point about the end of 1877 or beginning of 1878; after that it began to go down. I don’t think there had been any serious fall up to March 1879.’ This particular property also, in the estimation of some of the witnesses, had special advantages. Mr Smellie says,—‘We have been all very much disappointed since the crisis took place, as to the expectations we had formed of this locality. I would not, in 1879, have expected property in this locality to remain long depreciated. I would have expected the crisis to pass off within a few years.’ And he goes on to make

Stirling v.
Mackenzie,
Gardner, &
Alexander.

No. 41.

Dec. 7, 1886.
Stirling v.
Mackenzie,
Gardner, &
Alexander.

tion, which they spoke of as recent, but which had really been made in 1875, and even at that date was a high valuation. (2) The defenders had further explanations of an encouraging nature which, however, the continued depression has not confirmed. Mr Thomson says,—‘Property in that neighbourhood has been depreciated by the railway company having cleared away a great many premises and erected large stores. That cause has been operating, I should say, for eight years, but it did not develop a depression of other properties until about three years ago. I don’t think it had developed a depression in 1879. If the property in question was rented in 1879 for £581, 17s., that would represent a rate of 13s. 4d. per square yard. That was a very moderate rental in 1879, looking to the situation of the property. If I had been asked to value the property in March 1879, the rental being £581, I would very likely have taken a discount of between 10 and 15 per cent, say 12½, from the rental, and then valued it at so many years’ purchase. I would have made that deduction because of the risk of that rental not being maintained. Striking off £72,—12½ per cent from the rental would leave £509. I would have taken that at seventeen years’ purchase at that date, which would bring out a valuation of £8653. From that I would have deducted the ground-annual £214, capitalised at twenty years’ purchase £4280, leaving £4373 as the nett value. I think that would have been sufficient to secure a loan of £3000. If the loan had been at 5 per cent I think that would have been a good and satisfactory security. I would have advised such an investment even at 4½ per cent. If this property had been good security for £4000 in 1875, no reason occurs to me why it should not have been good security for £3000 in the spring of 1879.’

“But it is said that the defenders, instead of sending a valuation of the year 1875, ought to have got a new valuation in 1879, before suggesting the matter to the pursuer. In reference to this matter of the valuation, the peculiar circumstances of this case must be kept in view. The defenders were not asked to invest £3000 upon good security for the pursuer—leaving to them the selection of the security. In such a case it would have been their professional duty to have obtained a valuation as at the date when they made the investment. The agent in such a case stands in the position of a trustee, and would be responsible for the sufficiency of the security—(See Smith v. Pococke, 23 L. J. Chan. 545). But their position was not so. They were asked by a man who was studying the markets himself, to suggest some investment; and the correspondence shews that they made many suggestions, which the pursuer critically considered, and all of which he rejected, except the security over the Stirling Square property. He asked for advice and he got it; and the defenders laid before him all the materials that were in their possession. For these letters of suggestion, recommendation, and advice, no charge was made, and no commission was obtained from the pursuer for negotiating the transaction. Now, when the correspondence proceeded upon this footing, there was no neglect of professional duty on the defender’s part in not obtaining a new valuation—which they were not authorised to get,—it being doubtful, moreover, whether their suggestion in this case might not have the fate of their previous rejected suggestions. The valuation which they did send disclosed its date, and the pursuer took the matter into his own hands. He had, in a previous letter, expressed his opinion of the bad state of Glasgow property. The peculiarity of it was distinctly in his mind. It is impossible to read the correspondence without seeing that the pursuer here was judging for himself as to the nature and character of the security he was taking, and in this respect the case resembles one decided in the Chancery Court of England, the rubric of which is as follows (Chapman v. Chapman, L. R. 9 Eq. 276):—‘Although relief may be given at the suit of a client against his solicitor for loss sustained by gross negligence, yet where the loss was in respect of a matter of conduct as to which the advice of the solicitor was founded on the opinions of competent surveyors as to the value of the property, and those opinions submitted to the judgment of the client, the Court dismissed the bill; and as fraud and improper motives were charged without evidence to support those charges, the bill was dismissed concealed material facts from the pursuer, e.g., that reduced rents had been accepted for some of the premises; and that some of the tenants had given

No. 41.

Dec. 7, 1886.

with costs.' In giving judgment Vice-Chancellor Stuart said (p. 296),—'In a question between solicitor and client as to loss from negligence, there must be negligence of a gross and palpable kind to give a right to relief. But where, as in this case, the conduct complained of is more properly to be described as imprudent or indiscreet than as negligent, and every transaction was referred to the judgment of the client himself, who concurred in it, there seems to me to be no right to equitable relief. The advice which the defendants gave was founded on the reports of surveyors communicated to the plaintiff, and whatever may be said of the prudence or imprudence of the course advised by the defendants, I can see no reason to doubt the honesty of the advice. It was upon a matter which did not require professional skill, and the grounds upon which the advice was given were submitted to the plaintiff's judgment, and approved by him.'

Stirling v. Mackenzie, Gardner, & Alexander.

"The most recent case in our own Courts upon this subject is that of Ronaldson and Others (Gray's Trustees) v. Drummond & Reid, 7th June 1881, 8 R. 767, which was pleaded as an authority for the doctrine that a law-agent is responsible not merely for the validity of the title, but also for the sufficiency of the security. That case, however, is no authority for such a doctrine; and none of the Judges carried the responsibility of a law-agent to such an extent. There was in that case omission upon the part of the law-agent—who was himself one of the trustees who were the lenders—to give to his co-trustees such needful information about the nature of the property and the burdens upon it as was necessary to enable them to form a judgment as to the propriety of the intended loan. He possessed this information, but withheld it,—a circumstance that cannot be said to exist in the present case, and which induces me to hold that the one judgment cannot be regarded as a precedent for the other. It cannot be said that in the month of March 1879 the loan of £3000 was an imprudent transaction, far less an act of gross carelessness, and the pursuer must bring it up to a case of that kind before he can fix down an agent's responsibility simply for a suggestion. A broker or a law-agent is the kind of person to whom people who have a little money to invest, almost necessarily—at least, naturally—resort for information and advice, and although the investment turn out to be unfortunate which they have suggested, there is no legal liability for the consequences resting on the professional man. He may, perhaps, from his knowledge of business, more readily forecast the future; but his skill in this respect is very limited after all. No one in 1879 could have anticipated the tremendous fall in the value of property which took place at the end of that year and in the following years, and has continued ever since. If a law-agent were to be made responsible for giving a suggestion to his client, the result would be that no suggestions would ever be made, and a great part of the usefulness of an agent or broker would be destroyed. If an agent is liable, there is no reason why a stockbroker should escape; and, to quote the language of Lord Stair as to the responsibility of a Judge for the soundness of his decision, 'no man but a beggar or a fool' would be an agent, if he answered inquiries as to investments with such responsibility for the consequences.

"I have not followed the course adopted by the Lord Ordinary in the case of Ronaldson and Others v. Drummond & Reid in delaying judgment until it be seen by a sale whether there be any loss. It is clear from the evidence that a sale at the present time would be a very imprudent proceeding, and would result in a loss. The rents of houses in the district have fallen off, and many of the houses and shops round about are unlet. Whether the hope expressed by some of the witnesses of recoverable value shall be realised, must in the meantime be treated merely as a hope which may or may not come to pass. In some streets, such as Sauchiehall Street, there has been an increased value in house property since 1879; and as Stirling Square is in the very heart of the business portion of Glasgow, it may also take a start. But of the prudence of retaining his security and losing his interest in the meantime till the arrear of ground-annual

No. 41.

Dec. 7, 1886.
Stirling v.
Mackenzie,
Gardner, &
Alexander.

notice of an intention to leave. (3) The defenders were guilty of negligence. They knew the property thoroughly, as they had been Findlay's agents. This knowledge they were bound to disclose.¹ It was part of their duty to make allowance for the falling market, and to acquaint themselves with the value of the security,² and the fact that the client desired an investment to yield five per cent of interest did not absolve them of this duty.^{1 & 2} Besides, a knowledge of special facts might impose a special duty upon those possessing that knowledge.³ Here the defenders took upon themselves a greater than a law-agent's duty.

Argued for the defenders;—(1) The relations which subsisted between the parties were not those of agent and client. In these friendly communications as to investments there was no employment of the defenders as law-agents. Besides, the pursuer was always the judge of his own investments. (2) But assuming that the defenders were the pursuer's law-agents, all the statements made by them were true. At the date of their letter the property was let. The valuation sent by them bore its date, and the offer to buy the subjects from Findlay for £6000 was proved. Even supposing the rental was reduced and the property partially untenanted as alleged, there was an ample margin. (3) The responsibility of the defenders as law-agents was confined to liability for defect in the titles, or for gross negligence in making investments.⁴ An inquiry into the value of securities was not part of a law-agent's duty.

At advising,—

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—In 1879 the pursuer invested £3000 on house property in Glasgow. The defenders were his agents in the transaction. The security has proved to be insufficient, and by this action the pursuer seeks to make the defenders responsible for the loss.

The grounds of action are, first, that the defenders made false representations to him; second, that they concealed from him material facts; and, third, that they were negligent.

The note of the Lord Ordinary gives a very full detail of the circumstances in which the case was entered into, and it is unnecessary to go over the same ground a second time. It is sufficient to consider the several grounds of action on which the pursuer relies.

1. I do not think that the defenders made any false representations.

The pursuer says that the defenders stated that the property was all let, when in point of fact it was not all let. But the statement of the defenders was true. The property was all let down to Whitsunday 1879, and I must take the statement of the defenders as referring to the period of time of which they were speaking. Their statement was made in a letter, dated 14th March 1879, and at that time the property was all let.

be cleared off, the pursuer himself must be the judge. The pursuer's case is no harder than that of the many thousands who invested in stocks and shares, and in house property and land property, during the period of prosperity of the country nine years ago; and he must submit, like all these people who invested at the prices of those days, to the consequences of an unfortunate investment."

¹ Stewart v. M'Clure, Naismith, Brodia, & Macfarlane, July 7, 1886, 13 R. 1062.

² Ronaldson v. Drummond & Reid, June 7, 1881, 8 R. 767.

³ Raes v. Meek, &c., June 29, 1886, 13 R. 1036; Craig v. Watson, April 28, 1845, 8 Beavan, 427; Green v. Dixon, March 6, 1837, 1 Engl. Jur. 137.

⁴ Chapman v. Chapman, Jan. 20, 1869, L. R., 9 Eq. 276.

The pursuer charges the defenders with having represented to him that the property was "recently" valued, when in point of fact it had not been valued since 1875. But the charge falls to the ground when it is considered that the defenders sent to the pursuer the valuation which was referred to in their letter. It bore the date 25th May 1875.

No. 41.
Dec. 7, 1888.
Stirling v.
Mackenzie,
Gardner, &
Alexander.

The defenders stated in their letter that they knew the proprietor had refused £6000 for the property. It was urged in the argument before us that this was a false statement to the knowledge of the defenders. I do not find any such allegation on record. But be this as it may, I do not think that the allegation has been proved. Mr Findlay, the proprietor, says,—“I have no doubt I got a verbal offer of £6000 for the property, but I don't know from whom.” That he should, after so great a lapse of time, have forgotten the name of the proposing buyer is not at all surprising.

These are all the alleged misrepresentations.

2. The concealment of material information. This consists in the fact that at the time of the proposal for the loan some of the tenants had given notice to quit, and that the current rents had been considerably reduced for the future. But it was not maintained to us that these facts were within the knowledge of the defenders. Indeed, no charge of dishonesty was made against them, and if made, no such charge could have been substantiated. But in the absence of such a charge the allegation of concealment is of no relevancy. The agents were of course bound to communicate to the pursuer every material fact within their knowledge, but they could not be guilty of any fraud in not revealing what they did not know. They might have been negligent in not acquiring the knowledge, but not fraudulent.

3. I come now to the last ground on which the pursuer relies,—the alleged negligence of the defenders,—and here there is room for more consideration and discussion.

The defenders maintained that they had no responsibility except as conveyancers, and that as no fault had been imputed to them in that respect they were entitled to our judgment. I cannot adopt this view. I think, on the contrary, that they were bound to take all reasonable care in seeing to the sufficiency of the security which they recommended to their client. The pursuer alleges that they failed in this respect, and it is on this question that the chief difficulty exists.

The subjects over which the loan was to be taken yielded a rental for the year ending at Whitsunday 1879 of £581 or thereabouts, but they were burdened with a ground-annual of £214, 17s. If that rental were maintained there was a surplus of £366 to meet the interest of the loan of £3000, and this would of course be amply sufficient. But the pursuer contends that if the defenders had made due inquiry they would have found that the rental of the following year would be materially reduced, and that there was a probability of a part of the subjects being unlet, as turned out to be the case.

The pursuer urges that the defenders were bound to make inquiries into the chances of the existing rental being reduced, and that they could readily have obtained the requisite information by going to the landlord or tenants, but I do not think that they were under a duty to enter into such an investigation. It is not usual for the agents of a lender to do so, and I do not see that the defenders were bound to follow an exceptional course. They had ascertained that the property was all let, and that the margin was a very ample one. They were entitled,

No. 41.

Dec. 7, 1886.
Stirling v.
Mackenzie,
Gardner, &
Alexander.

I think, to conclude that the property in its actual state furnished a good security, and in consequence were justified in recommending the loan to their client.

In my judgment they were not guilty of negligence because they did not prosecute their investigation further. It is said that property in Glasgow was then falling in value. So it was. But the defenders saw that there was a large margin to cover contingencies, and were entitled to rely on it as sufficient to cover the risks to which a security of this kind is necessarily subject.

But there is another fact of great importance. The subjects were already burdened with a loan of £4000, and the transaction with the pursuer took the form of an assignation of £3000 of this loan under the condition that it was to be preferable to the remaining £1000. The property had been taken as sufficient for a loan of £4000, and the defenders were recommending it as sufficient for £3000 only. It is said that the creditors in the existing bond wished to call it up. That is true. But it is in evidence that this desire was not due to any misgiving as to the sufficiency of the security, but to the fact that they required the money. It is further urged by the pursuer that the defenders were agents for the existing creditors and for the proprietors of the subjects. So they were, but this of itself cannot be a ground of liability. It will lead us to scrutinise the conduct of the defenders, and to inquire narrowly whether they omitted any reasonable precaution for the safety of their client. I am bound to say that I do not think that they did. The security seemed a very ample one, though, of course, subject to those risks which the pursuer was willing to incur.

Considering therefore that the property shewed an ample rent to cover the loan and to meet contingencies, I am of opinion that the defenders were justified in recommending the loan to the pursuer, and that they were not guilty of negligence.

The security was one of a speculative nature. The pursuer desired such a security in order to obtain a high rate of interest. He has lost money because the security became insufficient. That was just the risk he voluntarily undertook. That he should lose is not the uncommon result of such an investment. He must blame himself for desiring to obtain a large return from a hazardous security. At least he cannot, I think, with justice blame the defenders, who, in my opinion, failed in no duty which they owed to him.

I think, therefore, that the interlocutor should be affirmed.

LORD YOUNG.—I think this is a difficult case—at least I have had great difficulty about it. I think it very much on the border-line between such negligence (for I think there was negligence) as infers liability, and such negligence as is merely to be characterised as not good or zealous agency in the interests of the client. I do not think the interests of the client here were well protected. I think the reverse—that the interests of the client were not well protected; but then, as I have indicated, the conclusion that there is legal liability for such negligence is another matter. I should not have been greatly surprised if the result arrived at by your Lordships had been otherwise—if it had been to the effect that there was legal liability for the loss sustained by the client on account of the want of these inquiries and communications which I think it was the duty of the agent to have made. But with the judgment of the Lord Ordinary in favour of the agent against liability, and the decided and clear views to the same effect entered and expressed by my brother Lord Rutherford Clark, I could not bring to the conclusion that liability ought to attach to the agents. Therefore,

I may be held as concurring in the judgment. But I repeat that it is with difficulty, and with the conviction that there was not good agency here, and that the client has severely suffered in consequence.

No. 41.

Dec. 7, 1886.
Stirling v.
Mackenzie,
Gardner, &
Alexander.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I share in the doubts Lord Young has expressed, but I think that in a case of this kind, where there is an attempt to make a law-agent responsible for negligence, the matter should be clearly established. I am of opinion with Lord Rutherford Clark, if your Lordships will allow me to repeat his opinion, that that has not been established, and therefore I concur in the result of that opinion.

LORD CRAIGHILL was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

DAVIDSON & SYME, W.S.—F. J. MARTIN, W.S.—Agents.

WILLIAM FRASER, Pursuer (Respondent).—D.-F. Mackintosh—Murray.

No. 42.

ALEXANDER MACDONALD, Defender (Appellant).—Balfour—Low.

Dec. 7, 1886.
Fraser v.
Macdonald.

Lease — Crofter — Diligence — Jurisdiction — Statute — Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. cap. 29), sec. 6, subsec. 5.—Held, on a construction of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886, particularly sec. 6, subsec. 5, thereof, that the jurisdiction of the ordinary Courts of law to grant decree for payment of arrears of rent is not suspended by the presentation of an application to the Commissioners under the Act to fix a fair rent and to deal with arrears.*

Question (per Lord Rutherford Clark), whether the landlord is entitled to do instant diligence on such a decree for recovery of the full sum named therein, or whether his remedy, pending the determination of the Commissioners, is limited to diligence in security.

On 9th October 1886 Colonel Fraser of Kilmuir, in Skye, brought an action in the Debts Recovery Court at Portree against Alexander Macdonald, a crofter on his estate, for payment of the sum of £30, 17s. 6d., being the amount of the rent of his croft alleged to be due by the defender for the five half years ending Whitsunday 1886, with interest.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Inverness-shire.
I.

Decree in absence was pronounced on 21st October. The decree ordained "instant execution by arrestment, and also execution to pass hereon by poinding and sale and imprisonment, if the same be competent, after a charge of ten free days."

On 11th November the defender applied for a rehearing, and lodged a certificate by the principal Clerk to the Crofter Commission, bearing that the said Clerk had on that date received an application from the defender asking the Commission "to fix a fair rent for the holding occupied by him, and to deal with the matter of arrears."* The defender

* The following provisions of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. cap. 29), were founded on in argument:—

"1. A crofter shall not be removed from the holding of which he is tenant except in consequence of the breach of one or more of the conditions following (in this Act referred to as statutory conditions), but he shall have no power to assign his tenancy. (1) The crofter shall pay his rent at the terms at which it is due and payable. . . . (6) The crofter shall not do any act whereby he becomes notour bankrupt within the meaning of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, and the Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880, and shall not execute a trust-deed for behoof of creditors."

"3. When one year's rent of the holding, but less than two years' rent, is

No. 42.

Dec. 7, 1886.
Fraser v.
Macdonald.

also offered "to find security that the amount of arrears, as fixed by the said Commission, under the said application, will be duly paid at the dates fixed by the said Commission."

The defender pleaded;—That the defender has made an application to the Commissioners appointed by the Crofters Holdings Act to fix a fair rent, and to deal with the matter of arrears, and that until these Commis-due and unpaid, the crofter shall be liable to be removed in manner provided by section twenty-seven of the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883.

"When two years' rent of the holding is due and unpaid, or when the crofter has broken any other of the statutory conditions, he shall forfeit his tenancy, and shall be liable to be removed in manner provided by the fourth section of the Act of Sederunt anent removing of the fourteenth day of December one thousand seven hundred and fifty-six."

"4. The rent payable, as one of the statutory conditions, shall be the present rent,—that is to say, the yearly rent including money and any prestations other than money, payable for the year current at the passing of this Act, unless and until the present rent is altered in manner provided by this Act.

"5. The rent may be altered by agreement between the landlord and the crofter to such amount and for such period as may be agreed on; and the rent so agreed on shall be the rent payable by the crofter so long as such agreement subsists, and after the expiry thereof so long as no different rent shall have been fixed by the Crofters Commission upon the application of the landlord or the crofter, and so long as no new agreement between the landlord and the crofter shall have been made.

"6. (1) The landlord or the crofter may apply to the Crofters Commission to fix the fair rent to be paid by such crofter to the landlord for the holding, and thereupon the Crofters Commission, after hearing the parties and considering all the circumstances of the case, holding, and district, and particularly after taking into consideration any permanent or unexhausted improvements on the holding and suitable thereto which have been executed or paid for by the crofter or his predecessors in the same family, may determine what is such fair rent, and pronounce an order accordingly.

"(2) The rent fixed by the Crofters Commission (in this Act referred to as the fixed rent) shall be deemed to be the rent payable by the crofter as from the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas next succeeding the decision of the Crofters Commission, and shall come in place of the present rent, and, save by mutual agreement, the fixed rent shall not be altered for a period of seven years from such term.

"(3) Where the Crofters Commission shall fix a rent which shall be less in amount than the present rent, the crofter shall be entitled, at the next payment of rent, to deduct from the amount of the fixed rent such sum or sums as he may have paid over and above the amount of the fixed rent in respect of the period between the date of the notice of application to fix the fair rent and the date when such rent was fixed.

"(4) When an application is lodged with the Crofters Commission to fix a fair rent, it shall be in the power of the Crofters Commission, either under the same or under another application of the crofter, to sist all proceedings for the removal of the crofter in respect of non-payment of rent till the said application is finally determined, upon such terms as to payment of rent or otherwise as they shall think fit.

"(5) In the proceedings on such application the Crofters Commission shall take an account of the amount of arrears of rent due or to become due before the application is finally determined, and may take evidence of all the circumstances which have led to such arrears, and shall decide whether, in view of such circumstances, the whole or what part of such arrears ought to be paid, and whether in one payment or by instalments, and at what dates the same should be paid, and the amount and dates so fixed shall be deemed to be the total amount of such arrears due by the crofter, and the terms at which the same become payable."

Commissioners have pronounced an order on that application, and the same has been presented to the Sheriff, it is incompetent for him to give the decree asked in the case, and offers by minute lodged in process to find security for sum which may be fixed by Commissioners.

No. 42.

Dec. 7, 1886.
Fraser v.
Macdonald.

The pursuer pleaded;—The present action not coming within the provisions of the Crofters Act, the rehearing should be dismissed, with expenses.

The pursuer also stated by minute that, provided the defender consigned before the 15th October, or paid two-thirds of the arrears of rent sued for, the pursuer would take no further proceedings for the balance of the arrears until the Crofters Commissioners should have had an opportunity of considering the question of arrears.

Neither the defender's offer of security nor the pursuer's to take consignment was accepted.

On 15th November the Sheriff (Ivory) dismissed the rehearing, and affirmed the original decree, with expenses.

The defender appealed, and argued;—The remedy which the appellant here asked for was that the action should be sisted until the Commissioners had pronounced judgment in his application to them. He offered to find security for the amount of arrears, as fixed by the Commissioners. That was a reasonable offer, though not one which he was by statute obliged to make. The leading object of this part of the statute was to convert customary year-to-year tenants into tenants in perpetuity, upon certain reasonable conditions. The first of these statutory conditions was that the crofter should pay his rent. That made it necessary to determine what his rent should be. It might be the old rent—sec. 4, or a new rent fixed by agreement—sec. 5, or lastly, a new rent fixed under an application to the Commissioners—sec. 6. It was only in the last case that the Act gave power to deal with arrears. But in that case the measure of liability for arrears was what the Commissioners fixed it to be. They were to "take account of the amount of arrears of rent due or to become due before the application is finally determined." That meant that they were to take account, first, of the arrears due when the application was presented, and, secondly, of arrears becoming due pending its determination. The Act swept away the arrears under the old contract, and substituted what the Commissioners thought the fair amount of arrears. Consequently, until the Commissioners had determined the quantum of the debt no arrears could be sued for. The action, therefore, was incompetent, or, at least, must be sisted. If all diligence was open to the landlord except removal, the tenant might be made bankrupt, and that would be a breach of the 6th statutory condition, and would in effect be the same as removal. [LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I should like you to consider this: Assume that the amount of the debt is certain, and that there is nothing in the Act inconsistent with decree for that amount being pronounced now—may you not nevertheless argue that to allow anything else than diligence in security to proceed on that decree, pending the determination of the Commissioners, would be inconsistent with the whole purpose of the Act?] That was the defender's alternative position if he failed on his main ground of defence. The landlord's interests in competition with the tenant's other creditors would thereby be sufficiently protected, and the injustice of allowing the landlord to carry off the whole arrears when the Commissioners, had they chanced to come to this district first, might have determined that half only ought to be paid, would be prevented.

The arguments for the pursuer sufficiently appear from the opinions of the Judges.

No. 42.

Dec. 7, 1886.
Fraser v.
Macdonald.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case is in itself important and interesting, and I shall state shortly the grounds on which, not without difficulty, I come to the conclusion that we ought to adhere to the judgment of the Sheriff, and repel the pleas urged on us by the appellant.

It is not necessary for me to resume the facts at length. In the month of October 1886 the respondent, Colonel Fraser, obtained a decree in absence against the appellant, who is his tenant, before the Sheriff of Inverness, for certain arrears of rent. After this decree had been pronounced, and in the month of November thereafter, the tenant presented an application to the Commissioners under the recent Crofters Act for the purpose of having a fair rent fixed in terms of that statute. That application has not yet been considered or disposed of by the Commissioners. In the meantime, the decree which had been pronounced in absence was appealed by the tenant to the Sheriff, and was affirmed by him, and that judgment has now been brought before us by appeal.

The ground on which that judgment is challenged does not rest on any allegation that the debt for which decree was given was not due when it was pronounced. But it is maintained by the appellant that the provisions of the Crofters Act, sec. 6, subsection 5, operate as a suspension or sist from the date of the application of all legal proceedings for the recovery of rent, until the Commissioners have considered and determined all questions in regard to arrears, under the powers conferred by that statute. There is thus raised a very large and extensive question.

It will not escape observation that if the presentation to the Commissioners of an application under the statute has the effect of rendering all further proceedings incompetent until the application is disposed of, one effect of the principle would be to make the appeal to the Sheriff, and to us in this case, incompetent, seeing that the decree in absence was pronounced before any application was made to the Commissioners. But that is a technical view. The broad question which has been argued, and which I think we must decide, is whether on a sound construction of the terms of this statute the presenting of an application to the Commissioners has the effect contended for. It is needless and inconclusive to say that this construction would involve interference with proprietary rights. To leave the landlord without the ordinary remedies of a creditor for an indefinite period is an interposition by the Legislature not to be presumed or inferred, which even under this statute might, in possible cases, strike against the tenant also. But I can quite understand that the ends of public policy may require the subordination of private rights to important public objects. This statute, by overriding private contracts between landlord and tenant, proceeds, to a certain extent, on that principle, nor should I have been surprised if it had contained a clause regulating the rights of the parties concerned for the period during which the application remained undetermined.

But, while it is no part of our province to discuss the policy of the statute, and while we assume that the public ends in view justified its provisions, I draw one conclusion from the fact that the statute is meant to be in some degree in derogation of private right. I feel that I am not entitled to extend the plain words of the statute by inference to matters which are neither expressed nor clearly implied, and that all the more that the nature of the provision which we are asked to imply is one which, had it been intended, would natunly have been expressed. In this instance, I think, the legitimate inference is that it was not intended to make any provision on the subject. No. 42.

Dec. 7, 1886.

Fraser v. Macdonald.

I give weight to the argument that when a Court of law, or other tribunal, is authorised to decide between debtor and creditor, ordinary legal procedure should be stayed until judgment. I see also that if it were not so here the object of this statute might in some cases fail. On the other hand, to adopt the view of the appellant would be to do certain injury. There are three results which might follow from the Commissioners' consideration of the arrears. First, they might find that none of them should be paid; secondly, they might find that a certain proportion of them should be paid; and lastly, they might see no reason at all for interfering with the amount. Now, in the two last cases, according to the construction now put upon subsection 5, the landlord is left wholly without remedy. Assuming that the Commissioners are of opinion that the arrears should be paid in full, before that opinion is given effect to by the Commissioners' judgment all chance of recovery on the part of the landlord might have come to an end. And the same thing may be said of the proportion which possibly the Commissioners may find ought to be paid, supposing that they did not find that the whole was due. Now, my Lords, that is a great hardship. I cannot assume that it was so intended. But it must be kept in mind that the Commissioners have no statutory power to stay proceedings, or to attach conditions on which they should be stayed. They are not authorised to deal with any such matter. In reference, and in contrast to this, I may refer to the precise power which is given in this statute to the Commissioners to interpose to stay removals, and to attach such conditions as they think fit, in the 4th subsection of section 6. I think I may also, without impropriety, refer to an analogous case—we have but few cases of such statutes—in the Irish Arrears Act, 1882; and I find in that statute that the two things which are in question were dealt with by that statute—I mean the power of removal on the one hand, and the power to take proceedings for the recovery of arrears on the other. The Act to which I refer is chap. 47 of 45 and 46 Victoria, 1882. Section 13 provides that “where any proceedings for the recovery of the rent of a holding to which this Act applies, or for the recovery of such holding for non-payment of rent on account of the rent in respect of the year expiring as aforesaid and antecedent arrears, have been taken before or after an application under this Act in respect of such holding, and are pending before such application is disposed of, the Court before which such proceedings are pending shall, if the provisions of section 1, subsection a, have been complied with, and on such terms and conditions as the Court may direct, postpone or suspend such proceedings until the application under this Act has been disposed of.” That is an express power given. Now I should have looked—if the construction put upon the Crofters Act was intended—for words of that kind. And I think reasonably, because, although it may have been a perfectly justifiable policy to suspend or limit the landlord's right, this should be expressly stated in words. Therefore my impression is that under this statute the presenting of an application to the Crofter Commissioners does not necessarily suspend or sist procedure on the part of the landlord for the recovery of his rent.

I to a large extent agree with the view that has been suggested by Lord Young, that the word “arrears” means the arrears due, and that in the provisions of the Act they mean arrears due when the Commissioners come to consider an application to fix a fair rent, thus necessarily implying that

No. 42.
—
Dec. 7, 1886.
Fraser v.
Macdonald.

the landlord may take all ordinary remedies for his rent in the meantime. Then it has been suggested on the part of the tenant that the landlord is not without his remedy, because he may, if he pleases, propose to remove the tenant for non-payment of rent for two years, and that will let in the dispensing or discretionary power of the Commissioners to annex conditions. That is a very clumsy way of arriving at a result which is not expressed in words. I do not think, upon the construction of the statute, I could give that effect to its provisions. I think the provisions about removing were intended to apply to removing and nothing else, and that if they were intended to apply also to the recovery of arrears that only makes the observation stronger—why was that not expressed? I think the statute said all which it was intended to say, and that it was left to the common law to construe those words of subsection 5, and give them their proper and due effect. I must say for myself I should have been perfectly satisfied to have recalled or sisted procedure if consignment had been made. I think that would have removed those apprehensions of the landlord, and would sufficiently have satisfied the statute. As that has not been done, we must decide the case, and I have expressed my opinion upon it.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion, and if I add anything to what your Lordship has said it is not because I think the case is attended with any difficulty, but because we have been told that it is a case interesting to a number of people, having been selected as a specimen case in order to determine a variety of others depending upon the same considerations, and I make the observations which I am going to make only to shew to those who are interested, as clearly and distinctly as I can, the grounds upon which my opinion rests.

The action, which originated in the Sheriff Court of Inverness, is by a landlord against his tenant for payment of two and a-half years' rent of his farm. No defences were given in, and decree in absence was pronounced on 21st October last. An application was then made to the Sheriff to re-hear the case, and determine it otherwise upon this, the defender's, plea, which is the only plea that was ultimately disposed of by the Sheriff, and the only plea now before us,—“That the defender”—that is, the tenant against whom the decree for the amount of the rent had been pronounced in absence—“has made an application to the Commissioners appointed by the Crofters Holdings Act to fix a fair rent, and to deal with the matter of arrears, and that until these Commissioners have pronounced an order on that application, and the same has been presented to the Sheriff, it is incompetent for him to give the decree asked in the case.” I do not read the offer of security any more than the offer on the other side to take consignment. These are really of the nature of extrajudicial communings between the parties with the view to a settlement, and if they come to nothing we have no concern with them. And they have come to nothing. Now, it is not said that the rent was overstated, or that it had been paid in whole or in part. There is no defence to the action, except only this plea that the action was incompetent, an application to the Crofters Commission having been made. The Sheriff repelled that plea, and the case having been brought here upon appeal, the only question before us consequently is whether the Sheriff was right in repelling that plea or not. I am of opinion that he was.

The rent sued for is for the two and a-half years terminating at Whitsunday 1886, the term immediately preceding the passing of the Act. Therefore it is rent due before the Act passed. Consequently the question comes to this: Is the landlord by the statute precluded from suing a crofter to whom the statute applies—and it is not disputed that the statute does apply here—for rent due to him prior to the passing of the Act? Now, I think there is a rule of the common law, with which we are very familiar, and constantly apply, sufficient for the decision of this question. It is the legal right of the landlord to whom his tenant is owing money, as it is of any creditor to whom a debtor is owing money on any ground, to sue him for payment. If this Act of Parliament deprives the landlord of that legal right which he has at common law of suing his tenant for rent due to him before the passing of the Act, then this plea is well founded, and otherwise not. Now, here, again, in the construction of the Act, we have a rule of common law, with which we are quite familiar, which is sufficient for the determination of the matter, and that rule is, that the legal right of a party at common law shall remain to him unless it is expressly taken away. It is according to the practice of the Legislature when a distinct familiar legal right at common law is meant to be taken away from an individual, or class of individuals, that it is done in terms expressly. I do not say that it is impossible to do it by implication—that is, by some provision which is manifestly inconsistent with the continued subsistence of that legal right; but the custom of the Legislature is, where a familiar legal right at common law is intended to be taken away, that that is done in express terms. Now, I think all will agree that in this Act there is no express provision saying that a crofter's landlord shall be deprived of his common law rights of proceeding by an action against the crofter who, as his tenant, is owing him money for rent. Then is there any provision which is inconsistent with the continued existence of that most familiar legal right of the landlord to whom his tenant is indebted? There is none, unless it be subdivision 5 of clause 6.

Now, on this point I notice first of all that the statute provides that the rent which the crofters are to continue to pay is the "present rent," subject to that present rent being altered by agreement or by the Commissioners appointed under the Act. Until there is an agreement altering it, or a judgment of the Commissioners under the Act altering it, the "present rent" is to continue—that is, the rent payable before the Act passed. It is then provided by clause 5, somewhat superfluously, that the parties may alter by agreement. I should not say "superfluously" perhaps, because the statute does make somewhat free with agreements, I do not doubt, upon considerations satisfactory to the Legislature, in regard to which I express, and, indeed, have no opinion. But the parties interested are nevertheless, by clause 5, left at liberty to make such new agreements as they please with respect to the rent. Either party however—either the crofter or his landlord—may apply to the Commissioners to fix fair rent, and this subsection 5 of clause 6 provides that "in the proceedings on such application the Crofters Commission shall take an account of the amount of arrears of rent due, or to become due, before the application is finally determined, and may take evidence of all the circumstances which have led to such arrears, and shall decide whether, in view of such circumstances, the whole or what part of such arrears ought to be paid, and whether in one payment or by instalments." This undoubtedly gives the Crofters Commission power to deal with arrears due when the application is finally determined. What, then, is the meaning of this expression "arrears of rent." We had an argument on the one side to the effect that it includes, to begin with, all rent due by the tenant

No. 42.
Dec. 7, 1886.
Fraser v. Macdonald.

X

No. 42.

Dec. 7, 1886.
Fraser v.
Macdonald.

at the passing of the Act, which is not to be exacted by the landlord, and is not payable by the tenant until the application—which, I suppose, the tenant would delay as long as he could—is disposed of by the Commissioners. It is a perpetual Commission. I had an impression that it was limited to five years. I see that it is only their power with reference to the enlargement of the crofters' holdings that is so limited. While the Commission continues to exist, either the landlord or the tenant may make an application, and that will be an application to which this subsection refers, and in every application the Commissioners may deal with arrears of rent due. When an application is disposed of, the determination of the Commissioners is to continue in force for seven years; but there may be renewals by the one party or the other, and in every application there is a power to deal with arrears. Now, "arrears of rent" is an expression with which we are quite familiar. We are not so familiar with the notion of restraining landlords from suing for rent due to them, or from using the diligence which the law allows to recover payment out of their tenants' property. But the argument upon the one side here is that this provision that the Commissioners may deal with the matter of arrears signifies that the landlord is to be deprived of his remedies for recovery, and that during a period of years. The argument upon the other side is that the arrears here dealt with are those which the tenant's circumstances have not enabled him to pay voluntarily, or enabled the landlord to recover after using all his ordinary legal remedies. That is the familiar idea of arrears, and the Commissioners, the argument is, are authorised to remit these or to reduce them, being satisfied that it is really the tenant's poverty and want of property, whether in money or goods, that have left these as arrears, so that the arrears may not be a burden upon his prosperity. That is the argument upon the other side, and it is the argument which I prefer. I cannot read this provision as being inconsistent with the landlord having the right to bring an action to ascertain what arrears are due to him, if any, and to get an order by the Court upon the party indebted to pay them. The plea before us goes to this, that the action is incompetent—that the Sheriff cannot even inquire what is the amount of rent due under the contract between the landlord and tenant; that he cannot inquire whether any part of this rent has been paid, or whether there is a balance unpaid. Now, that approaches the extravagant—indeed, encroaches upon it, and is extravagant. Therefore the action is competent, and the decree is competent, which ascertains that a sum in name of rent is due to the landlord, and orders the tenant to pay it.

I may add that I see no reason at present—but this is matter merely of opinion, the question not being properly before us—why the decree should not be enforced, as the common law of the land allows, against the tenant's property. It cannot be enforced if he has no property, if he has property why it should not be enforced does not occur to me. It was stated that it might be enforced cruelly, so as to ruin him. But the common law right of all creditors may be enforced cruelly and in an ill-hearted manner. It is the common law right of using diligence, and if the crofter has cattle or money, is the landlord to be precluded for an indefinite period from attaching one or other of these for the rent legally due him? I can see no reason for that. I think the common law principle which I have stated is sufficient for the determination of this matter also. Neither by express terms nor by necessary implication does the statute take away the landlord's common law right of using his decree in the ordinary way. I think, therefore, this and all similar actions are quite competent, and I think that this, or any similar decree which may be pronounced, is enforceable against the tenant's goods and money, like any ordinary decree for payment of a debt.

No. 42.

Dec. 7, 1886.

Fraser v.
Macdonald.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I am of the same opinion. I confess that at one time I felt some difficulty in regard to the interpretation of the 5th subsection of section 6, but in the end any difficulty I have experienced has been displaced. It is admitted that there is no express provision in the Act by which the rights which a landlord has at common law in regard to the recovery of arrears of rent have been taken away or restrained. If such a provision exists at all, it exists by implication merely, and the implication must certainly be very clear before we can give effect to such a construction as that for which the defender contends. According to the defender's reading of the Act the landlord is not to be entitled to put himself abreast of the tenant's other creditors until after the determination of the Crofters Commissioners has been pronounced. That would be quite an exceptional hardship to which to subject the landlord. He would be deprived of the power which all the other creditors of his tenant enjoy of doing what he could to protect his own interests by securing the property of his tenant. Of course, if there had been a positive enactment to this effect we must have given effect to it. But there is no such positive enactment, and I think it is the fair inference from the 5th subsection, read along with the previous subsection, that the landlord may sue for his rent for the whole period, even although an application has been presented to the Crofters Commissioners. No doubt the tenant is protected, and very properly protected, according to the view of those by whom the Act was framed, from suffering any hardship in consequence of the landlord's proceedings. It is at least a question whether the old contract rent will be found to be more than the fair rent, and after an application has been presented, while there is nothing to prevent the landlord from suing for his contract rent between the date of the application and the date of the determination of the Commissioners, still the tenant is to be entitled to recover what he may have overpaid according to the rent fixed by the Commissioners when the next rent becomes due to the landlord. Then provision is made for the case of a removing. An action of removing is not made incompetent—in itself it remains competent, but on an application being made to the Commissioners they are empowered to consider whether the remedy shall be followed up, and if they think it ought not to be followed up, they are to fix the terms on which the sist asked for by the tenant is to be granted. It is important to observe that the sist is not to be granted unconditionally. Then we come to the last case in which, in the proceedings on an application to them, the Crofters Commissioners are to "take an account of the amount of arrears of rent due or to become due before the application is finally determined." Now, there is an alternative here, but I think that the true reading is not that there are to be two inquiries,—one as at the date when the application is presented, and the other when the Commissioners come to consider the application,—but that there is to be one inquiry only. The thing, and the one thing to which the consideration of the Commissioners is to be given, is the amount of arrears due when the application is disposed of, although the alternative is not without importance. The tenant may be able to pay the arrears, and if he can pay it is the intention of the statute, as I read it, that he ought to pay. When they take up the application the Commissioners have a duty to perform; they have to inquire into the whole circumstances of the case, and decide

No. 42.

Dec. 7, 1886.
Fraser v.
Macdonald.

whether the whole or only a part of the arrears then existing shall be paid, and whether the payment is to be by instalments, and at what dates payment is to be made. That is the protection which the statute gives to the tenant, and I think it is a protection against any evil consequences which may happen to the tenant from the course pursued by his landlord. The Commissioners look back to the time at which the application was presented to see what the tenant has paid in the interval. They see that all the payments have been on the scale of the old rent, and taking that among other circumstances into account they settle what the tenant ought to pay for the future. Here there is a debt due by the tenant, and he ought to pay it if he can. If he has the means and does not pay it, then I think diligence ought to be used against him for the recovery of the debt.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I have had some difficulty in this case, and I confess my difficulty has not been entirely removed. At the same time I think I see my way clearly enough to be able to concur with your Lordships in the judgment you are now about to pronounce. It is matter of concession on both sides that the right to raise an action and use diligence for the recovery of rent is not taken away from the landlord in express terms, but it is said that it is taken away by necessary implication, because the existence of that right or the use of that right would frustrate and render inoperative the 5th subdivision of the 6th section of the Act. Now, it was pleaded that in consequence of that statute the rent ceased to exist as a debt, because the landlord was only entitled to recover of that rent so much as the Commissioners thought it proper or right that the tenant should pay. Up to that point I cannot agree with the argument of the appellant. I do not think that the statute has any effect on the legal quality of the landlord's right, and therefore the rent remains, necessarily remains, a debt due under the lease by the tenant to the landlord. At common law, therefore, it is plain enough that he can raise an action for the purpose of obtaining decree for that debt, and I do not think that in pronouncing a decree for that debt we are doing anything which frustrates or renders inoperative the 5th subdivision of section 6. So far, therefore, I am clear enough that your Lordships are right in affirming the interlocutor of the Sheriff which is now under review. But a further question remains behind—namely, to what use that decree may be put without frustrating or rendering inoperative the section of the clause of the statute to which I have referred, and on that question I prefer to say nothing, because it may possibly, though I hope it may not, come again before us. I am concerned with this question, and with this question alone—whether the decree shall stand? For the reasons which I have stated, I think the decree ought to stand.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel for the parties on the appeal, dismiss the same, and affirm the judgment of the Sheriff appealed against: Find the pursuer entitled to expenses, and remit to the Auditor to tax the same and to report: Of new ordain the defender to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £30, 17s. 6d., being the sum of rents and interest thereon concluded for, and also the sum of £1 of expenses found due by the Sheriff, and decern."

PROVOST, MAGISTRATES, AND TOWN-COUNCILLORS OF DUNDEE, Pursuers
(Respondents).—D.-F. Mackintosh—Gloag—Hay.

JOHN MITCHELL KEILLER, Defender (Appellant).—*Pearson—
C. J. Guthrie—Macfarlane.*

No. 43.

Dec. 7, 1886.
Keillar v.
Magistrates
of Dundee.

JOHN MITCHELL KEILLER, Pursuer (Reclaiming).—*Pearson—
C. J. Guthrie—Macfarlane.*

Scott v.
Magistrates
of Dundee.

PROVOST, MAGISTRATES, AND TOWN-COUNCILLORS OF DUNDEE, Defenders
(Respondents).—D.-F. Mackintosh—Gloag—Hay.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (as representing Her Majesty's Commissioners of Woods and Forests) AND OTHERS, Defenders.

MRS JANE SCOTT, Pursuer (Reclaiming).—Pearson—C. J. Guthrie—Macfarlane.

PROVOST, MAGISTRATES, AND TOWN-COUNCILLORS OF DUNDEE, Defenders
(Respondents).—D.-F. Mackintosh—Gloag—Hay.

Property—Burgh—Foreshore—Title of Magistrates to resist declarator of property of foreshore.—In an action raised in 1885 against the magistrates of a burgh (and also against the Crown, which did not defend) by the proprietor of lands within the burgh for declarator of property in the foreshore ex adverso of these lands, the pursuer produced as his immediate title a disposition from a subject to the foreshore dated in 1884. Held (1) that as the inhabitants of the burgh had been in use from time immemorial to resort to the foreshore for purposes of recreation, that was sufficient to give the magistrates a title to challenge the disposition of 1884; and (2) that as the prior titles produced shewed that the disposition of 1884 flowed a non habente potestatem, the defenders fell to be assoilzied.

Property—Burgh—Foreshore—Jus spatiiandi—Act to extend the royalty of Dundee, 1831 (1 and 2 Will. IV. cap. xlv.)—Held that the above Act did not transfer the property of the foreshore ex adverso of the extended royalty of the burgh of Dundee from the Crown to the Magistrates as representing the burgh.

A proprietor of land within the extended royalty of the burgh of Dundee held a conveyance from the Crown, dated in 1853, "of all right, title, and interest of Her Majesty, her heirs and successors," in a portion of the foreshore ex adverso of his property, lying between high-water mark and a line of railway formed along the foreshore. Held, in a declarator at his instance against the Magistrates (1) that the pursuer had a right of property in this piece of foreshore; but (2) that, as the inhabitants of Dundee had used it from time immemorial for purposes of recreation, he had no right to exclude them from resorting thither for such purposes.

Process—Interlocutor—Appeal—Findings in fact—Appeal from Sheriff Court of possessory judgment and declarator in Court of Session.—A possessory judgment granting interdict was pronounced by a Sheriff after a proof. Pending an appeal against this judgment the defender raised a declarator of property, in which he was ultimately unsuccessful. The pursuer having stated that in the event of an appeal to the House of Lords his case might be prejudiced by findings of fact in the interdict process, the Court pronounced an interlocutor dismissing the appeal in respect of the judgment in the declarator.

In 1846-7 the Dundee, Perth, and Aberdeen Junction Railway Company (afterwards incorporated with the Caledonian Railway Company), under authority of the Act 8 and 9 Vict. c. clvii. (1845), constructed a railway from Dundee to Perth along the north bank of the River Tay. After leaving Dundee the railway passed to the south of an open piece of recreation ground called Magdalen Green, over which the burgh had vindicated certain rights of recreation (Magistrates of Dundee v. Hunter, June 4, 1858, 20 D. 1067), and was then carried on an embankment below high-water mark

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of For-farshire.
Lord M'Laren.
I.

No. 43.

Dec. 7, 1886.
Keiller v.
Magistrates
of Dundee.

Scott v.
Magistrates
of Dundee.

for a considerable distance up the river, i.e., westward. The foreshore to the north of this embankment, although thus shut off from the rest of the foreshore, continued subject to the ebb and flow of the tide, at first by means of culverts, and afterwards (when the culverts had become filled up) by percolation through the embankment. A line of villa properties extended along the foreshore for some distance to the west of Magdalen Green, and, among others, the properties of Binrock and Binns, which were co-terminous, Binrock lying immediately to the west of Binns. By 1884 the boundary walls of Binrock and of the properties to the west thereof had been extended so as to include the portions of foreshore (down to the railway embankment) severally ex adverso of each property, thereby shutting off all public access to these portions of the foreshore. The corresponding portions of foreshore ex adverso of Binns, and the properties to the east of Binns, were not included within the boundary walls of these properties, but remained open to access by the public from Magdalen Green. The total extent of foreshore lying between the east wall of Binrock on the west and Magdalen Green on the east, and bounded on the north by the walls of Binns and the villas to the east thereof, and on the south by the railway embankment, was about three acres.

In 1884 Mr J. M. Keiller, who had shortly before bought the property of Binrock, acquired also that of Binns, and began to enclose the foreshore ex adverso of Binns down to the line of the railway embankment. The Magistrates and Town-Council of Dundee thereupon applied to the Sheriff of Forfarshire for interdict, alleging that the inhabitants of Dundee had, in virtue of their charter and otherwise, a right of way over this foreshore, and also rights of recreation, such as bathing and walking, or, at all events, that the uses they had had of the foreshore were such as to entitle them to a possessory judgment. On 17th October 1884 the Sheriff-substitute (Cheyne), after a proof, found the pursuers entitled to a possessory judgment in respect of the uses which he found that the public had had of the foreshore for purposes of recreation (the alleged right of way having been abandoned), and granted interdict. Keiller appealed to the Court of Session, but the Court, on 22d January 1885, superseded consideration in hoc statu, to allow him, if so advised, to bring a declarator.

Keiller accordingly, on 18th May 1885, brought an action against the Provost, Magistrates, and Town-Councillors of Dundee (who alone defended), the Caledonian Railway Company, William Crockatt, merchant in Glasgow (whose interest in the subjects is explained in the epitome of the proof, infra), and the Lord Advocate, on behalf of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, concluding for declarator "that the subjects following, namely, All and Whole that piece of ground bounded as follows, viz :— By the line, formerly of the Dundee, Perth, and Aberdeen Junction Railway Company, now of the Caledonian Railway Company, on the south, . . . which subjects above described comprehend (firstly)"—(Then followed a description of the grounds of Binns down to high-water mark, as to which there was no dispute)—"And (secondly) that area or piece of ground, extending to 2 roods and 30 poles imperial measure or thereby, lying between the said subjects 'firstly' above described and the line, formerly of the Dundee and Perth and Aberdeen Railway Junction Company, now of the Caledonian Railway Company, which area or piece of ground formerly formed part of the shore or alveus of the River Tay, but has since the formation of the said line been reclaimed, and now forms part of one common subject along with said subjects 'firstly' above described,—pertain heritably in property and belong exclusively to the pursuer, and that the defenders have no right or title in or to the said subjects, or any part thereof, or to exercise any right of property therein, and that the pursuer is entitled to enclose the same, No. 43.

 or any part thereof, at his pleasure"; and also for declarator "that neither the defenders, nor any of them, nor the inhabitants of the burgh of Dun- Dec. 7, 1886.
 dee, nor the public, have any right of way or of recreation, or bathing, or Keiller v.
 any other right, servitude, or privilege in, to, or over the said subjects, or Magistrates any part thereof"; and for interdict against the Provost, Magistrates, and of Dundee.
 Town-Council "obstructing or interfering with the pursuer in enclosing Scott v.
 the said subjects, or any part thereof, or in exercising his rights of pro- Magistrates perty therein." of Dundee.

The pursuer produced as his immediate title a disposition, dated May 1884, by the trustees of Hunter of Blackness, by which they conveyed to him, in express terms, (1) the piece of ground first described in the summons, and (2) that secondly described, and it was not disputed that this was an effectual conveyance, not only of the former, but of the latter piece of ground if Hunter's trustees were themselves in titulo to grant such a conveyance. On that point the pursuer made the following averments, and produced the titles referred to therein:—

(Cond. 4) "The pursuer's said property, including the foreshore of the River Tay ex adverso thereof, was and is part of the barony of Blackness. The subjects first described are part of 'All and Whole 7 acres and 5 falls of ground or thereby, together with the houses built thereon, being part of the lands and estate of Blackness, and commonly known by the name of the West Binns, . . . bounded . . . by the sea-flood on the south, . . . ' which were feued by David Hunter, Esq., of Blackness, to George M'Lagan, farmer and gardener at West Binns, near Dundee, by feu-charter dated 21st July 1807, on which the said George M'Lagan was infeft, conform," &c. (Cond. 5) "By virtue of the original crown grant, and of the immemorial possession which followed thereon, the rights of the proprietor of the lands and barony of Blackness extended to, and included the right of property in, the foreshore of the River Tay ex adverso of the estate, and the feu of the said subjects to the said George M'Lagan extended to, and included the right of property in, the foreshore ex adverso of the feu." (Cond. 6) "By missives of sale, dated 2d September 1847, the said subjects were sold by the said George M'Lagan to William Scott, on behalf of the Dundee and Perth and Aberdeen Railway Junction Company, who had statutory powers for the construction of the said line of railway between Dundee and Perth." (Cond. 7) "In 1854 the eastmost part or division of the said subjects, extending to 2 acres 3 roods and 15 poles imperial measure or thereby (being the subjects first described in the conclusions of the summons), was sold to the said David Hunter of Blackness by Charles M'Lagan, mason (grandson and heir-at-law of the said George M'Lagan), with consent of the said William Scott and the said railway company, conform to disposition by Charles M'Lagan, with consents therein mentioned, to and favour of the said David Hunter, dated 24th October and 22d November 1854. The said David Hunter was infeft therein, conform," &c. "Besides the said subjects, extending to 2 acres 3 roods and 15 poles, there was also conveyed by the said disposition 'my, the said Charles M'Lagan's, and our, the said The Dundee and Perth and Aberdeen Railway Junction Company's, rights to the shore or alveus of the River Tay ex adverso of said ground above disposed, extending south to the line of the Dundee and Perth and Aberdeen Railway Junction, and measuring 2 roods and 30 poles or thereby,' being the piece of ground second described in the conclusions of the summons. The pursuer is thus, by virtue of his titles, proprietor of the subjects described in the conclusions."

The Crown titles of Blackness, so far as produced, did not expressly include the foreshore in question, and the defenders denied that it formed part

No. 43.

Dec. 7, 1886.
Keiller v.
Magistrates
of Dundee.

Scott v.
Magistrates
of Dundee.

of the barony of Blackness, averring (what the pursuer did not dispute) that the earliest express description of it in the titles was that in the disposition of 1854; and they further made the following averments in their statement of facts :—

(1) By various ancient royal charters, and by Acts of Parliament specified, the defenders hold the burgh of Dundee and liberties thereof, with the salmon-fishings and other fishings on the north side of the River Tay, and, inter alia, ex adverso of the lands of Blackness, including the subjects in dispute. "They have, in virtue of said titles, from time immemorial appropriated and possessed the solum or shore of the river gained from the sea, and a large portion of the southern part of the town has been erected on solum ground so acquired. (2) By Act of Parliament 1 and 2 Will IV. cap. xlv. (23d August 1831), the territories of the royal burgh of Dundee were largely extended towards the western boundary, and by this extension the lands of Blackness opposite the river were included in the royalty.*

The defenders have since exercised various rights of property on part of the foreshore within the extended royalty. (3) From time imme-

* The following were the provisions of the Act 1 and 2 Will. IV. cap. xlv. founded on :—

Sec. 1.—"Whereas the town of Dundee has of late years greatly increased in size and population, and large suburbs, in which a great extent of trade and manufactures is carried on and great numbers of persons reside, have been formed beyond the boundaries of the ancient burgh, and beyond the territory over which the jurisdictions, civil and criminal, of the magistrates of the said ancient burgh extend: And whereas great advantage would arise, both to the ancient burgh itself and also to the suburbs and adjacent territory, if the whole were united and incorporated into one burgh, with proper regulations for the election of the magistrates and council thereof in place of those now in observance under the present sett of the ancient burgh, which has been found by experience to be the source of many questions and difficulties, and to be very defective and imperfect in its provisions; but the same cannot be accomplished without the aid and authority of Parliament: May it therefore please your Majesty that it may be enacted, and be it enacted by the King's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That, from and after the passing of this Act, all the territory situated beyond the boundaries of the ancient royalty of the said burgh, and locally comprehended within the limits following, . . . " southward along a march described "down to the River Tay and thence along the margin of the river eastward to" a point described, "shall be added and annexed to the territory composing the ancient royalty of the said burgh; and the said territory composing the ancient royalty of the said burgh, and the additional territory comprehended within the limits before described so added and annexed as aforesaid, shall be and the same are hereby united and incorporated into one royal burgh, under the name of the Royal Burgh of Dundee; and the burgh so enlarged shall be in the place of the ancient burgh, and shall enjoy in every respect the same rights and privileges as the ancient burgh now enjoys or is entitled to enjoy."

Sec. 3.—"Provided also, and be it further enacted, that the feudal tenure or tenures by which the respective parts and portions of the territory of the said burgh, as enlarged, are at present held shall not be altered by the operation of this Act, and all seisins, renunciations, and reversions of lands, and all other writs relating to heritage lying within any part of the said territory shall be taken, expedite, and registered in the same form and manner as if the present Act had not been passed."

Sec. 6.—"And be it further enacted that . . . the rights, powers, and privileges of the magistrates and council, acting under the authority of this Act, shall be applied to and extend over the whole of the enlarged burgh, including the ancient burgh, equally and in all respects to as full extent and effect as those morial the inhabitants and public of Dundee have used the river and foreshore opposite the said lands of Binns of Blackness, without objection, for purposes of passage, bathing, and recreation. The said foreshore has been a public place beyond the memory of man, and has been used and enjoyed by the public for time immemorial for the purposes of walking, bathing, and recreation. It adjoins and is entered from the streets of the burgh and the Magdalen Green, also a public place, and is within the burgh and under the jurisdiction of the municipal authorities." The defenders also founded on negotiations between the town and the railway company in 1845, which quoted in the provision of the railway Act quoted below.*

No. 48.

Dec. 7, 1886.

Keiller v.
Magistrates
of Dundee.Scott v.
Magistrates
of Dundee.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) In virtue of the titles and of the possession which has followed thereon the pursuer is proprietor of the subjects in question, including the whole ground southward to the railway company's property. (2) There being no right of way, and no right, servitude, or privilege in the defenders or the inhabitants of Dundee or the public in or over the pursuer's property, or any part thereof, he is entitled to have decree of declarator and interdict as concluded for.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The averments of the pursuer are not relevant to support the conclusions of the summons. (2) The pursuer having no right or title to the foreshore of the River Tay wherever the sea ebbs and flows, or to reclaim or enclose the same to the exclusion of the defenders and the inhabitants of Dundee, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor. (3) The defenders have by their charters and Acts of Parliament, and possession and use following thereon, a sufficient title and interest to oppose the conclusions of the summons. (4) The defenders and the inhabitants of Dundee having from time immemorial used the said foreshore for the purposes specified, the pursuer has no right to the interdict craved in the summons.

A proof was allowed, at which the foregoing titles were put in. The parole evidence was to the following effect:—The pursuer proved no acts of possession of the ground in question, either by himself or his authors.
 The defenders, on the other hand, proved that, like the foreshore generally in the neighbourhood of Dundee, the portion enclosed by the railway had been from time immemorial used by the inhabitants of the town as a place of recreation—for walking, being practically a continuation of Magdalen Green, and also for bathing—though the fair result of the evidence was that it had latterly become a somewhat undesirable place for such purposes, sewage and rubbish of all sorts having collected in it. It still however, according to some of the defenders' witnesses, continued to be considerably used for bathing at high tide, though mainly by children. Mr Hay, the town-clerk, spoke to the great want of places of public recreaof the magistrates and council, ordinary or extraordinary, of the ancient burgh extended over the territory thereof: And the magistrates and council acting under the authority of this Act shall, under the exception hereinafter mentioned, respectively have the same jurisdiction, powers, and authorities over the enlarged territory as are at present or might have been enjoyed or exercised by the magistrates and council, ordinary and extraordinary, of the ancient burgh within the same, whether at common law or under any Act or Acts of Parliament, local or general, royal charters, or otherwise."

* The Railway Act of 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. clvii.), sec. 26, provided that the railway company should be bound to construct the embankment "so as to admit of the water ebbing and flowing every tide within the space to be left by the company to the north of the line of the said railway, and for that purpose to leave such openings in the said embankment as shall be agreed upon between the company and the Magistrates and Town-Council of Dundee," and failing such agreement, as should be determined by the Sheriff.

No. 43.

Dec. 7, 1886.
Keiller v.
Magistrates
of Dundee.

Scott v.
Magistrates
of Dundee.

tion near Dundee, and stated also that the ground here in question was a much safer bathing place than that outside the embankment, where the shore was steep and the current strong. There was a public bathing pond. The wall of the pursuer's other property of Binrock made it impossible to pass westward from the ground in question without crossing or going along the railway, and there was no other direction in which a right of way could exist. Mr Hay also gave evidence, and produced documents in corroboration of his evidence, to shew that the magistrates had treated the foreshore ex adverso of the old royalty as burgh property. Mr Hay deponed that he had, from the burgh records, traced the history of (with a single exception) every portion of this foreshore, and had found that it had either been appropriated by the magistrates to public purposes, e.g., streets, or had been disposed by the magistrates to private persons, who had reclaimed what they thus acquired and had built upon it. Their holding was burgage. In one case the Board of Customs, took a disposition from the magistrates of a piece of this foreshore. There was little similar evidence of the exercise of proprietary rights by the magistrates over the foreshore ex adverso of the royalty as extended under the Act of 1831 (to which the present question related), but the Dundee Harbour Trustees took conveyances from the magistrates of subjects which included foreshore partly ex adverso of the old royalty and partly of the new; the North British Railway did the same for the purposes of their Tay Bridge Line; and in 1868 the Caledonian Company paid the magistrates £4000 for a confirmation of the crown grant of the foreshore on which their line was built. This also was partly within and partly without the old royalty. The railway company had paid the Crown £1500 for this grant, and it included the whole rights of the Crown in the foreshore between Dundee and Perth, so far as required by the railway company. The Crown had, from about 1853 onwards, made grants of its rights in the portions of foreshore ex adverso of several villas adjoining the pursuer's property of Binns, including that immediately adjoining on the east belonging to Mrs Scott, as explained in the action to be narrated infra. The defender Crockatt was a predecessor of the pursuer in the property of Binns, which he held on a personal title about the year 1851. He had entered into negotiations with the Crown for a grant similar to those just mentioned, but these negotiations were allowed to lapse. They were resumed by the pursuer, but the Crown authorities when they heard of the pursuer's dispute with the burgh refused to go on. The draft conveyance signed by the pursuer and Crockatt when tendered in evidence was rejected by the Lord Ordinary.

On 2d February 1886 the Lord Ordinary (M'Laren) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer has not established a title to the foreshore, being the subjects second described in the conclusions of the action: Finds that the defenders do not dispute, and have not disputed, the pursuer's title to the subjects first therein described: Therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action, so far as applicable to the subjects second described, and decerns: Quoad ultra dismisses the action, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses: Allows an account thereof to be given in, and remits to the Auditor to tax the same and to report."*

* "OPINION.—The pursuer, Mr Keiller, has instituted this action of declarator in consequence of having been interdicted at the suit of the Magistrates of Dundee from enclosing the portion of the shore of the Tay which is situated ex adverso of his villa at Dundee. The subject in dispute is insignificant in extent, and I should imagine of no value to anyone except the pursuer. Its enclosure would not stop the way to any place, because the proprietors lying to

The pursuer reclaimed, but on the case being put out for hearing, stated that a similar action of declarator at the instance of Mrs Scott, his

No. 43.

Dec. 7, 1886.

Keiller v. Magistrates of Dundee.

Scott v. Magistrates of Dundee.

the west,—that is, in the direction leading from the town,—have already enclosed their portions from high-water mark to the embankment of the railway, which skirts the shore, and have thus completely barred all passage to the west. The subject in dispute, although called the foreshore, has no frontage to the sea, because the railway embankment lies between it and the estuary. While, in a sense, it is land over which the tide ebbs and flows, it appears that the tidal waters get access to and from it only by percolation through the stones of the railway embankment; and between this embankment and mean-tide there is a deposit of several feet of sewage and other mud, which is doubtless left by the receding tide, and accumulates there in consequence of its flow being obstructed by the railway embankment. Between mean-tide and high-water there is a narrow belt of shingle or gravel over which the public have been in use to walk; but, as I interpret the evidence, this particular corner of the seashore is much less in request as a place of public recreation since it has been hemmed in between the embankment and the walls of the adjacent property in the manner described. One of the witnesses described it as a ‘dirty hole’; and no one speaking to the property in its present condition has said anything to the contrary. I think that the pursuer’s wish to enclose and embank this ugly corner is very natural, seeing that the Magistrates of Dundee, who claim a right in it, have utterly neglected it, and have allowed it to become a receptacle for rubbish and a place offensive to the eye and senses. I should therefore very willingly have given decree in favour of the pursuer if I could have found any legal ground for a decision in his favour, because it sometimes happens that zeal for public rights is in excess of the occasion for its display, and I am inclined to think it is so on this occasion.

“I am, however, of opinion, that the pursuer is not entitled to the declaratory decree which he is seeking, because the titles which he produces give him no right to the foreshore.

“The original grant, which is dated 21st July 1807, describes the property as bounded ‘by the sea-flood on the south,’ and this bounding characteristic is repeated in the subsequent investitures. The disposition in favour of the pursuer also contains a conveyance of 2 roods and 30 poles (being the ground in dispute), which, it is said, formerly was part of the shore or alveus of the Tay, but has since been reclaimed. The deed is dated May 1884, and unless the granters of the deed had a right to the 2 roods and 30 poles, their insertion of the subject in the title-deed is of no value whatever. Evidently they had no such right. They are the trustees of Mr Hunter of Blackness, who feued out the property in 1807, and afterwards reacquired it. But Mr Hunter’s crown title does not give him the foreshore, and it is as clear as possible on the evidence that neither he nor his feuar have acquired it by prescriptive possession, because the possession or use (such use as the seashore admits of) has all along been on the part of the public. There is evidence that the pursuer has sought a title from the Crown. But the officers of the Crown, on it being brought to their knowledge that the town claimed a right in the seashore, very properly declined to proceed further until the question should be settled, and the draft conveyance was rejected when tendered in evidence. It will thus be seen that I look upon this declaratory action as the assertion of a heritable right by a person who has not a title to the property which he claims.

“I am not satisfied that the defenders (the Magistrates of Dundee) have a title to this bit of seashore. Their case stands thus: The ancient royalty of Dundee is vested in the Magistrates by charters dated before the Union, which, besides containing express grants of the harbour and pertinents, contain expressions importing a concession of liberties and privileges of a wide and undefined character over the waters of Tay. Under those charters the Magistrates have, without dispute, prescribed or acquired the property of the foreshore ex adverso of the ancient royalty, and have formed a part of it into a public promenade.

“By an Act of Parliament of the present reign the royalty was extended;

No. 43.

Dec. 7, 1886.
Keiller v.
Magistrates
of Dundee.

Scott v.
Magistrates
of Dundee.

immediate neighbour on the east, was pending in the Outer-House, and moved the Court to delay the hearing in his action until Mrs Scott's action should have been brought up by a reclaiming note. The Court granted the motion.

Mrs Scott's action, which was raised on 18th June 1885, had conclusions with reference to her property above high-water mark (as to which there was no dispute), and as to the foreshore ex adverso of that property, similar, mutatis mutandis, to those of Keiller's action, but it was directed against the corporation of Dundee only.

Like Keiller she averred that her property, including the foreshore, was part of the barony of Blackness; that it had originally been feued out by Hunter of Blackness in 1785 to William Chalmers, and that "by virtue of the original crown grant and of the immemorial possession which followed thereon, the rights of the proprietor of the said lands and barony extended to and included the right of property in the foreshore of the river Tay ex adverso of the estate; and the feu of the said subjects to the said William Chalmers extended to and included the right of property in the foreshore ex adverso of the said subjects." She also made the following specific averments of possession,—“The pursuer's said husband had acquired all the said subjects in 1869, and in the course of that year he enclosed part of the said subjects second described [i.e., the ground in dispute], by building a substantial retaining wall, which still exists. The part of the said subjects so enclosed on the south, east, and west parts was twenty-three feet in width or thereby, and this was thereby thrown into the subjects first above described, and has ever since been possessed as part thereof. The tide at high water of ordinary spring tides rises about eighteen inches on the said retaining wall, and before the wall was and with respect to the extended royalty the Act of Parliament makes a concession of the like liberties and privileges which had previously been given in connection with the ancient royalty. The defenders say that this is to be interpreted as a title to the foreshore.

“If I were considering the argument founded on this title in a question with the Crown, I should most probably have to consider along with it certain adverse arguments which would be pleaded with more effect by the Crown than by the present competitor. It would be said that the acquisition of the foreshore of the ancient royalty was either by prescription, or by usage explanatory of the meaning of an ancient grant. Neither of these grounds would apply to the Act of Parliament extending the royalty. Nevertheless, I am of opinion that a burgh title, whether constituted by charter or by Act of Parliament, is a title ejusdem generis with a barony title. It is a sort of barony or regality, flowing from the Crown, and as such is a good title on which to prescribe a right to foreshore. It is in evidence that the burgesses have been using the foreshore of the extended royalty exactly as they have used the other foreshores within their domain; and while I am not in a position to decide that they have acquired it, because there is no declarator at the instance of the burgh, I am of opinion that the Magistrates have produced something which they may reasonably represent to be a title, and which, whether it is or is not a valid title, is at least sufficient to entitle them to be heard on this question.

“The case is indeed reduced to this narrow issue. The pursuer's action for want of a title must fail, unless he can shew that the defenders have no title to contest his conclusions. There are cases, no doubt, where the pursuer of a declaratory action may prevail in respect of the mere want of interest on the part of the defender. But in this case, so far as I see, the defenders have the better title of the two. They have their Act of Parliament and the possession of the seashore. The pursuer has nothing. I am therefore of opinion that the pursuer has failed in his case, and that the defenders are entitled to be assolized.”

built it flowed over the said space of twenty-three feet or thereby. A door was left in the wall when the same was built, which has been used exclusively by the pursuer and her predecessors for access to and from their remaining subjects. There is also a sewer led from the house and offices to the said wall which carries all the pursuer's domestic sewage, and discharges it through the wall upon the subjects second described." No. 43.
Dec. 7, 1886.
Keiller v. Magistrates of Dundee.

Chalmers' titles had a "sea-flood" boundary on the south.

Scott v. Magistrates of Dundee.

Mrs Scott further founded—and in this her case was distinguished from that of Keiller—on an express crown grant of the foreshore in question, as contained in a disposition by the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, in favour of one Lithgow, a predecessor of Mrs Scott in the subjects originally feued out to Chalmers. This disposition, which was dated 5th November 1852, and was recorded 9th February 1853, bore that "I, the Right Honourable Thomas Francis Kennedy," the Commissioner having charge of the Crown Revenues in Scotland, "in consideration of the sum of £12, 19s. paid" to the said Commissioners by Lithgow, "have sold, alienated, and disposed, as I by these presents, on behalf of Her Majesty, sell, alienate, and dispose to and in favour" of Lithgow, "All and Singular the right, title, and interest of Her Majesty, and her heirs and successors, of, in, to, and over that piece of ground, shore, or alveus of the River Tay, now either wholly or partially under water, or as the same may be embanked or filled up, containing 74 poles or thereby, according to a measurement furnished by the said" Lithgow, "and extending from the ancient high-water mark ex adverso of the present property of the said" Lithgow "southwards to the north limit of the Dundee and Perth Railway Company's embankment on the south, and bounded as follows, viz., on the north by the said" Lithgow's "present property. . . . To be holden and to hold the whole space hereby disposed by the said" Lithgow "of Her Majesty and her successors in free blench, farm, fee, and heritage for ever: Giving therefor a penny Scots money at Whitsunday yearly if asked only."

The pursuer's immediate title to the whole subjects described in the summons was a conveyance to her by her deceased husband's trustees, dated in 1881, and duly recorded, which proceeded on a conveyance, dated and recorded in 1869, to her husband by Lithgow of, first, the whole subjects above high-water mark claimed by her, and secondly, "All and Whole that piece of ground, shore, or alveus of the River Tay, now either wholly or partially under water, or as the same may be embanked or filled up, containing 74 poles or thereby, according to a measurement." Then followed the description and boundaries as in the crown grant,— "Together with . . . all and singular the right, title, and interest of Her Majesty, and her heirs and successors, or of me, as now having right under conveyance from Her Majesty of, in, to, and over the said piece of ground, shore, or alveus of the River Tay hereinbefore disposed."

The pursuer's pleas were in the same terms as Keiller's.

The defenders denied the alleged possession, and otherwise made generally the same defence as in Keiller's case.

In addition to pleas in the same terms as those stated by them in Keiller's action, the defenders pleaded;—(5) The alleged grant by the Commissioners of Woods and Forests does not affect, and, separatim, is incompetent to prejudice or affect the rights and uses of the public and of the inhabitants of Dundee over the said foreshore.

A proof was allowed. The evidence was in substance to the same effect as that led in Keiller's case, but in addition the pursuer substantially instructed her averments of possession of the foreshore.

On 2d June 1886 the Lord Ordinary (M'Laren) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer has not established her averments to

No. 43.

Dec. 7, 1886.
Keiller v.
Magistrates
of Dundee.

Scott v.
Magistrates
of Dundee.

the effect that the defenders and the inhabitants of Dundee have not a right of way, or of recreation, or bathing in or over the subjects second described: Assolizies the defenders from the last declaratory conclusion of the action, and from the conclusion for interdict, and decerns: Quoad ultra, finds it unnecessary to proceed further in the cause: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses.*

* "OPINION.—This case, like the previous action, Keiller against The Magistrates of Dundee, relates to the property and use of the foreshore ex adverso of the pursuer's residence, which is within the extended royalty of Dundee. I understand that the present case is to be considered by the Inner-House along with the case of Keiller, which is at present depending there on a reclaiming note against my interlocutor. It is therefore unnecessary that I should enter on a review of the evidence, which is substantially to the same effect as the evidence adduced in the case of Keiller.

"The chief distinction between the cases is that Mrs Scott, the present pursuer, is in a position to found upon a crown title to the piece of foreshore in dispute. Her title is a disposition by the Commissioners of Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues, dated 5th November 1852, and recorded in the Register of Sasines 9th February 1853. In the case of Keiller I held that the pursuer had no title, real or formal, to the foreshore in dispute, and that he was not in titulo to challenge the use of the shore by the public or the community of Dundee. In the present case the pursuer has a formal title flowing from the Crown. But prescriptive possession has not followed upon it, and it is for consideration whether the defenders, the Magistrates of Dundee, by prior grant followed by possession, have not acquired a right to the use of the shore within the royalty, which is inconsistent with the concession of the unqualified right claimed by the pursuer.

"In the former action I expressed the opinion that the community of Dundee, by their charters and possession, had acquired the right to all the foreshore ex adverso of the ancient royalty to which individual burgesses could not establish a patrimonial right. I see no reason to alter that opinion. In that case I did not offer a positive opinion on the questions whether a similar right existed in relation to the foreshores opposite the extended royalty, or whether a right less than property had been acquired by the community—I mean the right of using the shore as a place of public recreation for the inhabitants. In the present case it is necessary to consider these questions. The title of the community to the extended royalty is the Act of Parliament (Local and Personal) 1 and 2 William IV. cap. xlv., passed in the year 1831.

"It appears to me that the title acquired by the magistrates and council under this Act of Parliament is essentially an administrative title, and it is not necessary that I should enter on an analysis of its provisions to support this opinion. The royalty was extended because the area occupied by the inhabitants of this flourishing community had extended, and it was desirable that the authority of its magistrates and its governing body should be extended so as to embrace the whole of the actual town. In one respect the extension of the royalty is a title less favourable to the acquisition of foreshore than the crown charters by which the ancient royalty is constituted. The Act of Parliament does not contain a dispositive clause, or words vesting the royalty modo et forma in the magistrates and council. The royalty is extended, but only, as I understand, for administrative purposes, and I have difficulty in conceiving how a purely administrative title can be a foundation for the acquisition of a proprietary right in foreshore or waste land within the royalty as extended.

"I think, however, that it is a reasonable construction of the Act of Parliament that it transferred from the Crown to the community the right of administration and use of the shore within the royalty for public purposes, subject to the limitations which attach to the title of the Crown connected with the uses of navigation. It has been held that the title of the Crown to the seashore is an absolute title, and not a mere trust for the public, and it is convenient that it should be so treated, otherwise the Crown would not be able to give a title to railway companies, burghs, or other promoters of works of public utility. But the greater title

No. 43.

The pursuer reclaimed.

The arguments in the two cases were heard simultaneously, that of Scott being regarded as the leading case.

Argued for the pursuers;—I. Both the pursuers claimed (1) a right of property in the foreshore ex adverso of the rest of their respective properties; and (2) that that right of property was not burdened by any servitude or other right in favour of the magistrates, as representing either the community of Dundee or the public generally. Alternatively, they claimed that they were entitled to declarator of property burdened by such rights as the Court might think the defenders had proved.

I Scott's case.—(1) This pursuer's claim to the property of the foreshore in question was based on her crown title of 1853, and alternatively on her barony title from Hunter of Blackness. The crown title probably was not in strict feudal form,¹ but it was sufficient to bar any subsequent grant by the Crown. The terms of the Act of 1831, on which the defenders founded, were not habile to convey property. It contained no disposition nor anything that could reasonably be construed to imply a disposition of the foreshore ex adverso of the new royalty.² Further, the assent of the Crown to the conveyance of its property in the foreshore had not been expressly given, and that was fatal.³ If the defenders failed on their claim to the property includes the less, and it is always in the power of the officers of the Crown to allow the foreshore to be used as a place of public resort where the public interest points to this kind of use as the necessary and appropriate use in the locality.

"In the case of Smith v. The Officers of State, 8 Dunlop, 718, the title of the Crown was sustained as a good title to support the immemorial use by the public of the Portobello Sands in the vicinity of Edinburgh. Nor is there any instance, so far as I know, of the Crown asserting its right of property to deprive the inhabitants of a populous place of their customary use of the seashore. The extension of harbours may be said to be an exception, but it is one of those exceptions which prove the rule. In such cases, where the seashore has been immemorially used by the inhabitants of a town as a place of public resort, I think it may fairly be held that the Crown has abandoned the shore to the use of the public, retaining only the naked property, and possibly a right to resume for the uses of navigation. This is only applying to the title of the Crown the principle that has been often applied to the case of superiors who are held upon evidence of immemorial use to have dedicated to the use of the public unenclosed commons, links, or waste ground, which the community of feuars have been permitted to appropriate.

"In the present case there is evidence, to my mind clear and conclusive, of the use of the seashore within the extended royalty for the whole period subsequent to the Acts of Parliament—a period considerably exceeding that of the long prescription. The people who have used the shore are the community of Dundee, the grantees under the Act of Parliament. Taking this use into account as explanatory of the grant of the extended royalty, my view is, as I stated in the outset, that the Act of Parliament constitutes a good title of administration, enabling the magistrates and council to maintain and to regulate the use of the seashore by the inhabitants so far as the royalty extends.

"If the Act of Parliament does not confer that right upon the magistrates and council, then I am of opinion that the Crown, while retaining the property, has abandoned the use of the foreshore to the inhabitants of Dundee, and is thus disabled from granting anything more than a naked property to the pursuer, whose title will therefore not prevail against the use which the inhabitants have enjoyed for purposes of health and recreation."

¹ See 3 and 4 Will. IV. cap. 69, sec. 4.

² Scrabster Harbour Trustees v. Sinclair, March 19, 1864, 2 Macph. 884, 36 Scot. Jur. 442.

³ In re Cuckfield Burial Board, Dec. 14, 1854, L. J. 24 Chanc. 585; Maxwell on Statutes, pp. 161-7.

Dec. 7, 1886.
Keiller v.
Magistrates
of Dundee.
Scott v.
Magistrates
of Dundee.

No. 43.

Dec. 7, 1886.
Keiller v.
Magistrates
of Dundee.

Scott v.
Magistrates
of Dundee.

they had no title to challenge the pursuer's titles, which ex facie carried the property.¹ In point of fact, however, she had had such possession of the foreshore as its circumstances admitted of, and this brought her within the principle of the recent case of Young.² The circumstance that the Crown had granted dispositions of this foreshore was also important.³ It was said, however, (2) that the public had the right to use the foreshore here for the purposes of recreation although the pursuer might have the right of property. Now, the foreshore was not in the strict sense a public place,⁴ but even assuming that any member of the public had a right to recreate himself on any portion of the foreshore of the country to which he could legally get access, that was not so much an independent right which the public had or might acquire by prescription, as an accessory of the primary uses of the foreshore, e.g., fishing and navigation, of which the Crown was the guardian for the public. When any piece of foreshore ceased to be available for these primary uses and became private property—and it could not on the authorities be disputed that it might legally become so when the primary uses did not suffer thereby—the accessory rights, so called, disappeared too;⁵ no amount of use could fortify them. That was what had occurred here. Through the construction of the railway embankment this strip of foreshore had ceased to be available for fishing and navigation, and so had ceased in legal effect to be foreshore, and had become the pursuer's private property. The result here corresponded with this legal change of character, for, with the primary uses, the secondary had almost entirely disappeared as matter of fact. Some bathing was still carried on, but it was almost entirely confined to children, and people also continued to walk over this piece of ground, but rather in exercise of a supposed right of way, which was now given up, than because of the pleasure the place itself afforded, for it had become an eyesore rather than benefit to the public. No other uses were now made of it. The *Portobello*⁶ case and cases of that class therefore were not authorities for the present. The proposition of the defender came to this, that the magistrates of a burgh might vindicate a jus spatiandi over private property on behalf of the public, and also a right of bathing. There was no authority for that proposition in the law of Scotland. Most of the cases founded on by the other side to prove the existence of a jus spatiandi and of bathing related to something totally different—namely, the regulation of the common good of burghs, and the right of using the common good in particular ways, which the burgesses might acquire, and of which the magistrates could not deprive them.⁷ There was no such relation between ¹ See cases infra, note 8, p. 203.

² Young v. North British Railway and Lord Advocate, Dec. 8, 1885, 13R. 314.

³ Magistrates of Montrose v. Commercial Bank, June 11, 1886, 13 R. 947, per Lord President, p. 955.

⁴ Darrie v. Drummond, Feb. 10, 1865, 3 Macph. 496, 37 Scot. Jur. 245, and Scott v. Drummond, June 12, 1866, 4 Macph. 819, 38 Scot. Jur. 433, May 17, 1867, 5 Macph. 771, 39 Scot. Jur. 395 (Coldingham cases); Duncan v. Lees (Kinkell case), Dec. 13, 1870, 9 Macph. 274, 43 Scot. Jur. 107, June 20, 1871, 9 Macph. 855, 43 Scot. Jur. 503.

⁵ Bell's Princ. secs. 645-7.

⁶ Officers of State v. Smith, March 11, 1846, 8 D. 711, 18 Scot. Jur. 364, aff. July 13, 1849, 6 Bell's App. 487, 21 Scot. Jur. 534.

⁷ Sinclair v. Magistrates of Dysart, 1779, M. 14,519, aff. 2 Pat. App. 554; Cleghorn v. Dempster (St Andrews case), 1805, M. 16,141; Magistrates of Earlsferry v. Malcolm, Nov. 23, 1832, 11 S. 74; Home v. Young (Eyemouth case), Dec. 18, 1846, 9 D. 286, 19 Scot. Jur. 109; Kelly v. Magistrates of Burntisland, 1812, reported in the Lord Ordinary's note in Home v. Young, 9 the pursuer here and the magistrates, as existed between burgesses and No. 43.

the magistrates of their burgh. The only case which gave the semblance of authority in the defender's favour was that of Hunter,¹ relating to foreshore Dec. 7, 1886.
adjoining the present—viz., that ex adverso of the Magdalen Green; but that Keiller v.
case was the termination of a litigation, or series of litigations, extending Magistrates over nearly two centuries; and was really decided on a plea of res judicata of Dundee.
based on an ambiguous judgment pronounced in 1678. On the other hand, Scott v.
there were several authorities which distinctly negatived the possibility of Magistrates of a jus spatiandi,² and also of a right of bathing,³ of curling,⁴ and of trout-fishing.⁵ The circumstance that this foreshore was within the extended royalty, assuming it to be so, was of no importance unless on the assumption that all private property in a burgh was liable to become subject to a jus spatiandi.

II. Keiller's case.—This pursuer's title was not a direct crown grant—it was a disposition from Hunter of Blackness—a barony title. A barony title was presumed to carry foreshore ex adverso of the barony until the contrary was proved by some one in titulo to do so. Here Hunter had already established his right to the adjacent piece of foreshore ex adverso of the Magdalen Green,¹ and possession of part of a barony was possession of the whole.⁶ The original conveyance by Hunter in 1807 had a "sea-flood" boundary on the south. That carried the foreshore as in a question with Hunter, who could not interpose himself between his grantee and the sea.⁷ But if it did not that was really immaterial. The foreshore either remained in Hunter, or was re-conveyed to him in 1854. In any case he gave it off again per expressum to the pursuer in 1884. The Crown or a disponent from the Crown might challenge the disposition of 1884, but they alone had a title to do so.⁸ The Crown had been called as a defender and had not appeared, and no disponent of the Crown was suggested except the defenders—the magistrates—under their Act of 1831. If they failed on that Act, any use which they might prove the public to have had gave them no title to object to the pursuer obtaining declarator of property, however relevant a ground it might be for qualifying that declarator.

Argued for the defenders;—I. Scott's case.—Whether or not the defenders were proprietors of the piece of ground claimed by Mrs Scott, they, at all events, had a sufficient title as guardians of the public interests to

D. 293, and 19 Scot. Jur. 152; Sanderson v. Lees (Musselburgh case), Nov. 25, 1859, 22 D. 24, 32 Scot. Jur. 14.

¹ Magistrates of Dundee v. Hunter, June 4, 1858, 20 D. 1067, 30 Scot. Jur. 646.

² Dyce v. Hay, July 10, 1849, 11 D. 1266, 21 Scot. Jur. 506, aff. May 28, 1852, 15 D. (H. L.) 14, 24 Scot. Jur. 465, 1 Macq. 305; Magistrates of Edinburgh v. Magistrates of Leith, July 10, 1877, 4 R. 997; Rankine on Landownership, 2d edit. p. 294.

³ Blundell v. Catterall, Nov. 7, 1821, 5 Barn. & Ald. 268.

⁴ Harvey v. Lindsay, June 23, 1853, 15 D. 768, 25 Scot. Jur. 461.

⁵ Fergusson v. Shirreff, July 18, 1844, 6 D. 1363, 16 Scot. Jur. 581.

⁶ Lord Advocate v. Lord Blantyre, June 19, 1879, 6 R. (H. L.) 72, 4 App. Cas. 770; Lord Advocate v. Lord Lovat, Feb. 27, 1880, 7 R. (H. L.) 122, 5 App. Cas. 273.

⁷ Hunter v. Lord Advocate, June 25, 1869, 7 Macph. 899, 41 Scot. Jur. 513.

⁸ Pirie v. Ross, Feb. 1, 1884, 11 R. 490; Paterson v. Marquis of Ailsa, March 11, 1846, 8 D. 752, 18 Scot. Jur. 370; Cameron v. Ainalia, Jan. 21, 1848, 10 D. 446, 20 Scot. Jur. 130; Cuthbertson v. Young, Jan. 25, 1850, 12 D. 521, 22 Scot. Jur. 152, aff. Feb. 24, 1854, 17 D. (H. L.) 2, 26 Scot. Jur. 310, 1 Macq. 455; Colquhoun v. Paton, June 17, 1859, 21 D. 996, 31 Scot. Jur. 550; Young v. North British Railway and Lord Advocate, Dec. 8, 1885, 13 R. 314.

No. 43.

Dec. 7, 1886.
Keiller v.
Magistrates
of Dundee.

Scott v.
Magistrates
of Dundee.

resist the alternative declaratory conclusion, and the conclusion for interdict. There could be no reasonable doubt on the evidence that this piece of foreshore was largely used by the inhabitants of Dundee as a bathing place, and for purposes of recreation generally, like the Magdalen Green, of which it was a practical continuation, and that these uses went back beyond the memory of man. The construction of the railway, though it had cut this piece of ground off from the rest of the shore, had not made it cease to be foreshore, either legally or as matter of fact; the tide continued to ebb and flow over it; the railway was not in its nature a permanent change—it might be taken away—indeed, such an alteration was by no means improbable here; and lastly, the provisions of the railway Act carefully reserved the defenders' rights.¹ The case, therefore, was precisely within the Portobello case.² Except that, in addition, the Portobello sands were used as a militia parade ground, the uses of the foreshore by the public there were exactly of the same kind as those founded on here, and it was held that the Crown, on behalf of the public, was entitled to vindicate these rights of use against one who, in virtue of a feu of part of the barony, proposed to enclose part of the shore. That case did not—at least the fair reading of it was that it did not—proceed on the mere right which every member of the public had to walk about on any portion of the foreshore to which he could lawfully get access; it was rather a vindication of rights acquired by the public in a particular piece of foreshore, in virtue of the immemorial use of that piece of foreshore. Nor were the rights of use which were there vindicated what might be called the primary uses of the foreshore, such as navigation; they were solely uses of recreation such as were founded on here. The case of *Darrie*³ was not adverse to the defenders. It was there held, indeed, that a mere averment in a declarator of right of way that the alleged way terminated in the seashore would not sustain action, but it was clear from the leading opinion of Lord Deas that the Court would have sustained the action if there had in addition been an averment that the public had used the foreshore for purposes of recreation from time immemorial. In short, the law recognised that the public might by prescriptive use acquire a jus spatiandi over a specific piece of foreshore. *Dyce v. Hay*⁴ was said to establish that a jus spatiandi was not known to the law, but that case decided only that there could not be a servitude (in the strict sense) spatiandi, and the Lord Justice-Clerk (Hope)⁵ reserved the question whether the public might not acquire rights of recreation in the foreshore or in vacant pieces of ground lying along the shore; and in the case of *Hunter*⁶ the town of Dundee vindicated such a right over the Magdalen Green, as well as over the foreshore ex adverso. That case related practically to the same piece of foreshore as the present, and was a complete authority for the Magistrates' contention here—for their lesser contention of a jus spatiandi, that was to say; undoubtedly they did not there plead the higher right of property in the foreshore which they now said the Act of 1831 gave them. The defenders' case, on these authorities alone, would have been established, but it was greatly fortified by the

¹ See supra, p. 195, note *.

² Officers of State v. Smith, March 11, 1846, 8 D. 711, 18 Scot. Jur. 364, aff. July 13, 1849, 6 Bell's App. 487, 21 Scot. Jur. 534.

³ Darrie v. Drummond, Feb. 10, 1865, 3 Macph. 496, 37 Scot. Jur. 345.

⁴ Dyce v. Hay, July 10, 1849, 11 D. 1266, 21 Scot. Jur. 506, aff. May 28, 1852, 15 D. (H. L.) 14, 24 Scot. Jur. 465, 1 Macq. 305.

⁵ 11 D. 1269.

⁶ Magistrates of Dundee v. Hunter, June 4, 1858, 20 D. 1067, 30 Scot. Jur. 646.

fact that the foreshore here was part of the territory of the burgh—for that it was so was sufficiently plain from the following considerations. The case of *Smart*¹ decided that the foreshore ex adverso of the old royalty was within the burgh boundaries, and that it was burgh property. The case had been so understood,² and the magistrates had exercised their rights in that foreshore in the most ample manner, by appropriating parts of it to public purposes, and by granting dispositions of other parts—including a disposition to the Board of Customs, i.e., to the Crown. Then the Act of 1831, in defining the boundaries of the extended burgh on the south, used the words “margin of the River Tay,” which, if the foregoing conclusion was correct, necessarily included the foreshore quoad the old royalty, and must consequently have the same meaning quoad the added territory. Further, the expression the “River” Tay instead of the “Firth” of Tay pointed to the same conclusion, viz., that the foreshore ex adverso of the new royalty was added to the burgh territory, whether or not it had also become, like the old foreshore, part of the burgh property. The title of the magistrates to vindicate a jus spatiandi over ground so situated could hardly be doubted in principle, and was amply supported by the authority of the numerous cases in which the title of individual citizens to vindicate rights of golfing, &c. was sustained.³

No. 43.

Dec. 7, 1886.

Keiller v.
Magistrates
of Dundee.Scott v.
Magistrates
of Dundee.

The Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, therefore, was well founded, and the defenders did not desire to state their case higher—they had not brought a declarator of property—but if the pursuer insisted in her demand for a declarator of property—qualified, it might be, by a declaration that her right was under burden of such rights of use as the defenders might have established (a form of decree not within the letter at least of the summons)—then the defenders were driven to maintain that the property of the foreshore was theirs. Mrs Scott's alleged crown title was not a proper feudal disposition—it merely conveyed “all right, title, and interest” which the Crown might have in the subjects—which shewed that the crown authorities suspected that what they were conveying was of no value. But assuming that in form it was a valid disposition of the foreshore to Mrs Scott, it was dated long posterior to the Act of 1831, and consequently it could not compete with the title conferred by that Act. That the Act did confer a title of property in the foreshore on the magistrates appeared (a) from the terms in sec. 1, descriptive of the southern boundary of the new burgh, as already explained; (b) from the proviso in sec. 3 about tenure, which would be meaningless unless property, and not merely jurisdiction, were dealt with by the Act; and (c) from sec. 6, which gave the magistrates the same rights, powers, and privileges over the enlarged burgh as they had had over the old burgh; and the magistrates had acted on this view of their rights by granting dispositions of portions of the foreshore of the new ¹ Smart v. Magistrates of Dundee, Nov. 22, 1797, 3 Pat. App. 606, 8 Brown Parl. Cases, 119.

² Berry v. Holden, Dec. 10, 1840, 3 D. 205, 13 Scot. Jur. 79; Todd v. Clyde Trustees, Jan. 23, 1840, 2 D. 357, 12 Scot. Jur. 284, aff. June 8, 1841, 2 Rob. 333, 14 Scot. Jur. 509; Jameson v. Dundee Police Commissioners, Dec. 10, 1884, 12 R. 300.

³ Sinclair v. Magistrates of Dysart, 1779, M. 14,519, aff. 2 Pat. App. 554; Cleghorn v. Dempster (St Andrews case), 1805, M. 16,143; Magistrates of Earlsferry v. Malcolm, Nov. 23, 1832, 11 S. 74; Home v. Young (Eyemouth case), Dec. 18, 1846, 9 D. 286, 19 Scot. Jur. 109; Sanderson v. Lees (Musselburgh case), Nov. 25, 1869, 22 D. 24, 32 Scot. Jur. 14.

No. 43.

Dec. 7, 1886.
Keiller v.
Magistrates
of Dundee.

Scott v.
Magistrates
of Dundee.

royalty to the railway company and to the harbour trustees. The intention of the Act therefore was clear; but it was said that its effect failed because, first, it contained no disposition of the foreshore. The charter of erection of a burgh usually contained a dispositive clause, but that was not essential, and all land within burgh was presumed to be the property of the burgh until the contrary had been proved.¹ Secondly, it was objected that the consent of the Crown to the transference of the foreshore had not been expressly given. But in answer to that it was to be observed (a) that what was alleged to have been transferred here was foreshore, and foreshore over which the public had acquired so many rights of use as to leave merely the bare right of property, or little more, in the Crown. And (b) the disponees were the magistrates of a burgh, who, as regarded burghal property (the common good of the burgh was not here spoken of), were not so much grantees of property, in the strict sense, as commissioners for the Crown. They did not dispossess the Crown as a buyer dispossessed a seller. Considering, therefore, the nature of the subject transferred and the character in which the transferees acquired it, there was not the same reason as existed in ordinary cases for applying the rule that the Crown must assent expressly to the transference of its property by Act of Parliament. The Act here was fairly to be read as having the same effect as a charter of erection by the Crown of the new and enlarged burgh.

Mrs Scott also founded on Acts of alleged possession. Possession was unnecessary to fortify her crown title, which was unambiguous. It might avail her in so far as she placed her case on the foreshore being part of the barony of Blackness, but the possession here proved was quite insufficient in amount to bring her within principle of the case of Young,² on which she founded. She had by no means made every use of the subjects of which they were reasonably capable.

II. Keiller's case differed from Mrs Scott's in this, that he had no crown title. If Hunter of Blackness could convey the foreshore to him, then he had it in property, but his whole case depended on Hunter's right. Now, about this alleged barony of Blackness absolutely nothing had been proved beyond this, that there was such a barony. That it included the foreshore in question had certainly not been proved. There was neither express title nor possession from which that inference could be drawn. The title of 1884 was, no doubt, in itself express and unambiguous, but it plainly proceeded a non domino. The Magistrates were entitled to get behind it and shew that. In the first place, the pursuer could not with one hand call them as defenders in this declarator, and with the other deny their right to challenge the titles he produced; but apart from that, the rights of use which the defenders had proved gave them a title to challenge the pursuer's title of property, even if they did not allege a property title of their own. The magistrates of a burgh could not be regarded as mere trespassers, and it was necessary to shew that they were mere trespassers to bring them within the case of Pirie and cases of that class.³

At advising on 30th November,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Your Lordships have these cases of Keiller and Scott which raise analogous questions, and they may be considered at the same time.

¹ Bainbridge v. Magistrates of Rutherglen, March 10, 1886, 13 R. 745.

² Young v. North British Railway and Lord Advocate, Dec. 8, 1885, 13 R. 314.

³ See cases supra, note 8, p. 203.

In regard to Keiller's case, there are two actions, one an application for interdict at the instance of the Magistrates of Dundee against Mr Keiller, and the other a declarator at his instance of his alleged right. The subject-matter of this discussion really lies within a very narrow compass. The Dundee and Perth Railway obtained parliamentary powers for the construction of a line along the north bank of the Tay from Dundee, and in the operations following out that Act of Parliament they carried their line right through the foreshore at one particular point of the bank. They cut off a portion of the ground that had been covered only at high-water, but was cut off from the Tay by the line of railway. Whether by arrangement or otherwise, which seems doubtful, although there is now an embankment on the line of railway between this ground and the river, the tide still ebbs and flows over it, by percolation or openings. There are a variety of proprietors along the bank in front of whose properties the railway runs, and these proprietors have been ornamenting their residences, and in various ways endeavouring to make use of that old portion of the foreshore which lies between them and the railway. In the two actions that we have before us—namely, Keiller's case and Scott's case—the point is whether they have gone beyond their rights. Mr Keiller derives his right from Mr Hunter of Blackness. The rights granted by the Blackness estate have been more than once the subject of judicial examination in questions of this character. Keiller acquired his land since the date of the construction of the railway. He was proceeding with certain operations which would have intercepted any person going along the ground which I have described from Magdalen Green, when the Magistrates of Dundee raised the objection that the inhabitants of the burgh have had from time immemorial the right of going along that piece of ground for the purpose of recreation,—along this portion of the shore,—and that their right remains although the ground is cut off from the rest of the foreshore by the railway embankment. It is maintained that Mr Keiller had no right to perform any operations which should put an end to the recreation which it is said the public enjoyed, and so interrupt that enjoyment. Accordingly the Magistrates of Dundee brought a process of interdict against Mr Keiller, and in that process they prevailed, and the Sheriff granted interdict to a certain extent, not altogether to the full extent claimed. The Sheriff affirmed the right of the Magistrates, representing the community, to prevent those operations. That interlocutor has been appealed to this Court. In the meantime Mr Keiller raised an action of declarator for the purpose of having it declared that he has a right to this portion of the foreshore, and concluding that it should be found and declared “that neither the defenders nor any of them, nor the inhabitants of the burgh of Dundee, nor the public have any right of way, or of recreation, or of bathing, or any other right, servitude, or privilege into or over the said subjects or any part thereof.” The question is, which of these pleas is to prevail? Has Mr Keiller acquired a right to this portion of ground, consisting of former seashore, or are the Magistrates entitled to have their alleged right sustained, and thus prevent the destruction or interruption of the right of passage and recreation which they say has existed so long?

The Lord Ordinary has decided in favour of the Magistrates in the case of Keiller, and he has substantially found that Keiller has no title to the seashore, and that consequently he is not entitled to perform the operations in question, he not being the proprietor of the ground on which he proposed to

No. 43.

Dec. 7, 1886.

Keiller v.
Magistrates
of Dundee.Scott v.
Magistrates
of Dundee.

No. 43.

Dec. 7, 1886.
Keiller v.
Magistrates
of Dundee.

Scott v.
Magistrates
of Dundee.

construct works which would have prevented the continuance of the enjoyment which the public have had. I concur in that view. I think Mr Keiller has no right to the seashore. I think that he or his predecessors had none before the construction of this railway, and the construction of the railway does not seem to have in any way enlarged the right of the adjoining proprietors. Mr Keiller makes his claim upon two grounds. He says his title from Mr Hunter of Blackness describes his rights as bounded on the south by the sea-flood, which, he maintains, permits him to follow the waters of the Tay down to low-water mark. There is little doubt that such is the legal effect of a boundary by "the sea," but a boundary by the sea-flood excludes the grantee from going beyond high-water mark. That is laid down in many cases, and I think in a comparatively recent case,—the case of Hunter in 1869,—a very strong opinion was expressed that such was the effect of a boundary by the sea-flood, although it was found in that case, which related to titles worded very much like that in question, that Mr Hunter of Blackness, the grantor of the titles, had no right to get between his own disponee or vassal and the seashore. The second ground upon which the claim of Keiller is maintained is, that the ground is part of the barony of Blackness which had been disposed by Hunter's trustees to him. That may be. It is possible that it is part of the barony, although I see no evidence that it is so. But a barony title is of no service at all without possession, and it is clear in this case that neither Keiller nor his authors have ever had possession of the foreshore in any way. A barony title may have the effect of sustaining possession which has been enjoyed, even when not prescriptive. But the mere fact that this was part of the barony will not avail, and it is not said that the proprietor of Blackness ever had such possession of the foreshore adjacent to his land as would convey this right to the present disponee. I have come to the conclusion that Keiller has no right to the privilege which he claims here, and I quite concur with the Lord Ordinary in his view of the evidence. I think that the ground has been used for the purpose of recreation by the inhabitants of Dundee from time immemorial, and that the Magistrates are entitled, in this particular contention, to represent the community. Therefore, upon these grounds, I concur in the view that the Lord Ordinary has taken.

LORD YOUNG, LORD CRAIGHILL, and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In Scott's case the view I take depends entirely on facts in which it differs from the case of Keiller. Mrs Scott or her predecessors applied to the Woods and Forests, and obtained a crown right to the foreshore. To that extent, therefore, my observations in the last case would not apply. She has a title, but then, I think, that title is burdened with the established rights of the inhabitants, and that the Magistrates of Dundee, as representing the inhabitants, are entitled to exercise all the rights which they have previously enjoyed. I do not think the right of the magistrates under the Act of 1833 is a title to land or a title to real right. It is a title of administration solely. I refer to the Act by which this portion of the ground along the Tay was brought within the municipality, and the magistrates' right of administration was extended over it, subject to that right. I am inclined to sustain Mrs Scott's title as far as that ground is concerned. Only she must not limit or interrupt the rights acquired by the inhabitants. The form No. 43. of the interlocutor will be considered.

Dec. 7, 1886.

Keiller v.
Magistrates
of Dundee.

Scott v.
Magistrates
of Dundee.

LORD YOUNG, LORD CRAIGHILL, and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

The defenders moved for expenses in all the cases. Mrs Scott objected to being found liable in expenses, on the ground that she had been successful in getting decree of declarator.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—We find the Magistrates entitled to expenses, subject to modification, in Mrs Scott's case, and to full expenses in Keiller's case.

In the interdict case the draft of the interlocutor which it was proposed to pronounce, after a number of findings in fact, including " (3) that neither the defender nor his predecessors ever had possession of the said subjects, and no grant to him or them has been instructed," affirmed the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, and of new granted interdict.

On 7th December Pearson, for Keiller, moved the Court to delete the findings in fact, at least No. 3, above quoted, on the ground that, being final, they might prejudice him in the event of his successfully appealing the declarator.

THE COURT, holding that after the judgment in the declarator a possessory interdict was unnecessary, pronounced this interlocutor:—

"In respect of the judgment of this Court of the date hereof, pronounced in the action of declarator at the instance of the defender against" the Provost, Magistrates, and Town-Council of Dundee, &c., "dismiss the appeal: Find the defender liable in expenses," &c.

The interlocutors in the declarators had been signed at the date of this motion. They both simply refused the reclaiming note, and adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, finding the defenders entitled to additional expenses—in Mrs Scott's case "subject to modification."

Pearson, for Mrs Scott, moved that the interlocutor should be altered so as to include an express declarator of her right, and also that the modification of the expenses should be expressed so as to apply to the whole expenses, both Outer and Inner-House.

The defenders gave no consent to any alteration.

THE COURT refused the motion.

HENDERSON & CLARK, W.S.—DRUMMOND & REID, W.S.—Agents.

MRS NARCISSA AINSLIE AND OTHERS, First Parties.—C. J. Guthrie.

No. 44.

MISS JANE SUFFIELD AINSLIE, Second Party.—J. C. Lorimer.

Dec. 8, 1886.

Ainslie, &c. v
Ainslie.

Trust—Executor—Trusts Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. c. 84), sec. 1—Power to assume new trustees.—A testator in his will nominated certain persons as "executors," and directed them "to make and continue" certain annual payments to certain persons "till death or marriage," and to pay the liferent of his estate to his widow and a niece, and, on the death of the survivor of these two, to close their accounts at as early a date as practicable, and to divide the proceeds among specified persons. A "house, stable, and their fixtures," were to be sold soon after the testator's death. The executors were further directed to retain, or to realise for reinvestment, in their discretion, various securities, &c., held by him. There was no clause conveying any part of the estate to the executors. Held in a question between the co-executors, that though called

No. 44. "executors" in the deed, the executors were truly "gratuitous trustees nominated in a deed," and that therefore they were entitled to exercise the powers of assumption conferred on such trustees by sec. 1 of the Trusts Act, 1861.

Dec. 8, 1886.
Ainslie, &c. v.
Ainslie.

1st DIVISION.
B.

By holograph last will and testament, dated 7th March 1878, James Ainslie, Esq., Edinburgh, nominated his wife, Mrs Narcissa Ainslie, and Miss Jane Suffield Ainslie, as his "executrices," and Mr Clement Simpson, and Mr William Scott as "executors."

The will directed the "executors named hereafter to make and continue till death or marriage the following payments," viz., certain annuities to a niece, and another lady. The will then directed his "executors to divide whatever sum my estate may yield annually between" his wife and his niece, Miss Jane Suffield Ainslie, in certain proportions, "the survivor to have the liferent of the whole estate, and at her death my accounts to be closed at as early a date as possible, and the proceeds divided into" certain shares and apportioned as there directed, "house, stable, and all their fixtures to be sold soon after my death, but not a day before it quite suits the convenience of my wife."

The deed also contained this clause,—“I direct my executors to pay out of my estate the whole legacy and Government duties on the bequests in favour of my wife and my niece, Jane Suffield Ainslie, and also the whole expenses attending the executory and the annual expenses of management. I direct my executors either to retain and hold the various securities and investments on which my means and estate may be invested at my death, it being my wish, without however being imperative on my executors, that the investments and securities chosen by me should remain undisturbed as far as possible, or to realise the same, or such part thereof, as they may deem necessary or expedient, or to reinvest the same in such way and manner, and on such securities, heritable or personal, as they may deem best, including stock, funds, or securities of the Government of India, debentures, or debenture stock, preferential or guaranteed stock, declaring that my executors shall not be liable for any loss that may arise from their retaining and holding any securities or investments on which my means and estate may be invested at the time of my death. I leave to each of my executors £100 free of all taxes, for the trouble they have kindly undertaken on my account.”

There was no clause in the will conveying any part of the estate to the executors.

All the executors accepted, but in 1885 Mr Simpson died, and in 1886 Mrs Ainslie and Mr Scott, being a majority of the surviving executors, came to be of opinion that one or more persons should be assumed to act along with them in the administration of the estate of the deceased, if such assumption were competent under sec. 1 of the Trusts Act, 1861.*

Miss Ainslie objected to the proposed assumption, and a special case was, on 10th June 1886, presented for the opinion and judgment of the Court, Mrs Ainslie and Mr Scott being parties thereto of the first part, and Miss Ainslie party of the second part.

* Sec. 1 of the Act (24 and 25 Vict. c. 84) enacts,—“1, All trusts constituted by virtue of any deed or local Act of Parliament, under which gratuitous trustees are nominated, shall be held to include the following provisions, unless the contrary be expressed: that is to say, power to any trustee so nominated to resign the office of trustee; power to such trustee, if there be only one, or to the trustees so nominated, or a quorum of them, to assume new trustees; a provision that the majority of the trustees accepting and surviving shall be a quorum; and a provision that each such trustee shall only be liable for his own acts and intromissions, and shall not be liable for the acts and intromissions of co-trustees, and shall not be liable for omissions.”

In the case the foregoing facts were stated, and the following question of law was submitted to the Court,—“Whether, on a sound construction of the said last will and testament, the first and second parties are entitled to exercise the power of assumption conferred on trustees under the terms of the Act 24 and 25 Vict. cap. 84, sec. 1?”

No. 44.

Dec. 8, 1886.
Ainalie, &c. v. Ainalie.

The first parties maintained that the effect of the provisions of the deceased's will was to put them in the position of trustees, and therefore to invest them with the powers of gratuitous trustees conferred by the Trusts Act, 1861. The second party maintained that the parties to the case being only nominated executors by the will were not entitled to the benefits of the Act.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—This question rises on the 1st section of the Act 24 and 25 Vict. chap. 84, which applies to all trusts constituted by any deed or local Act of Parliament under which gratuitous trustees are nominated. There is in that section nothing as to conveyance of subjects to trustees, it is enough if the trustees be nominated. The question, therefore, comes to be whether the first and second parties to this case have been nominated as gratuitous trustees under this will. What they are called in the deed is “executors,” and if the idea of an executor was entirely exclusive of the possibility of the same person being at once a trustee and an executor, the Act would not apply; but that is far from being the case. All executors are in a certain sense trustees; they are charged with the realisation and distribution of the deceased's estate, and, though they are not properly speaking trustees, but mere debtors to the deceased's creditors, yet it is easy to engraft on them duties which no one but a trustee can carry out. We have therefore to have regard not to what they are called, but to what their duties really are. Now, the first thing to notice is that by this will the testator intended to dispose of heritable estate, because there is included in the estate a house, stables, and all the fixtures therein, and these things are directed to be sold. There is no conveyance of this property to the executors, but on the authority of several cases, and particularly the case of M'Leod's Trustees v. M'Luckie, 10 R. 1056, it is quite well settled that a direction to trustees to sell a part of an estate which includes heritage is equivalent to a conveyance of heritable property. In the second place, and perhaps this is more important, the testator contemplated a continuing management quite foreign to the duties of executors. An executor's duty is to administer the estate with a view to immediate distribution; he is bound to pay the creditors within a certain fixed time, and if he does not do so he is liable in interest. His liability, no doubt, is limited to the amount of the estate, but otherwise he is simply a debtor. Here the executors are directed to hold the estate for the purpose of paying the income thereof to his widow, and to another persona predilecta, viz., a niece, and that may involve holding the estate for a considerable length of time, and it is only after the death of the survivor of these two that the estate is to be divided. I think, therefore, that if this testator had called these persons trustees he would not have misnamed them, looking to the duties assigned to ¹ Authorities cited.—Ersk. Inst. ii. 2, 3, and iii. 9, 27; Jur. Styles, ii. 648; Act 34 and 35 Vict. c. 27; Lewin on Trusts, 6th edit. p. 555; Tochetti v. City of Glasgow Bank, March 7, 1879, 6 R. 789; Jameson v. Clark, Jan. 24, 1872, 10 Macph. 399, 44 Scot. Jur. 225; M'Leod's Trustee v. M'Luckie, June 28, 1883, 10 R. 1056; M'Leod's Trustees v. M'Leod, Feb. 28, 1875, 2 R. 481; Urquhart v. Dewar, June 13, 1879, 6 R. 1026.

No. 44. them, and is it to be said that because he has called them executors they are to be deprived of the benefits of the statute? That, I think, would be a very narrow construction of a beneficial statute, and therefore I think they fall under the description of gratuitous trustees nominated under a deed.

Dec. 8, 1886.
Ainslie, &c. v.
Ainslie.

LORD MURE, LORD SHAND, and LORD ADAM concurred.

THE COURT answered the question in the affirmative.

COWAN & DALMAHOY, W.S.—MITCHELL & BAXTER, W.S.—Agents.

No. 45. JAMES TWEEDIE (MacMaster's Curator Bonis), Petitioner.—J. Burnet.
THE ACCOUNTANT OF COURT, Compearer.—Low.

Dec. 8, 1886.
Tweedie.

Process—Judicial Factor—Curator bonis—Petition for recall.—Held (following Kyle, 24 D. 1083) that the appointment of a curator bonis made by the Junior Lord Ordinary may competently be recalled by him.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Trayner.
B.

JAMES TWEEDIE having presented a petition to the Junior Lord Ordinary for recall of his appointment of curator bonis to Miss Jane MacMaster, and for delivery of his bond of caution, the Lord Ordinary (Trayner), on 16th November 1886, being in doubt as to the competency of his dealing with such a petition, appointed it to be printed and boxed to the First Division.* The appointment had been made on 30th October 1885 in the Outer-House, and the application was now made as the ward had recovered her health.

The petitioner referred to the cases of Kyle,¹ Lockhart,² and Sinclair.³

Low, for the Accountant of Court, stated that in such petitions as the present the case of Kyle had been invariably followed.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The doubt which is raised by the Lord Ordinary is whether his Lordship has jurisdiction to grant the recall of a curatory. I entertain no doubt upon the question, and I believe your Lordships have none either, that in conformity with the case of Kyle the Lord Ordinary making the appointment has jurisdiction to recall it, and therefore that the whole subject-matter is competently before Lord Trayner.

LORD MURE, LORD SHAND, and LORD ADAM concurred.

THE COURT accordingly remitted to the Lord Ordinary "to recall the appointment of James Tweedie as curator bonis to Miss Jane MacMaster, and to proceed with the case as may be just."

KNIGHT WATSON, Solicitor—MACKENZIE, INNES, & LOGAN, W.S.—Agents.

* "NOTE.—It appears to me that this petition, in so far as it prays for the recall of the curatory, is one with which I cannot competently deal—(Kyle, 24 D. 1083; Lockhart, 24 D. 1086; Sinclair, 23 S. L. R. 737). I have therefore reported it to the Court. If the curatory is recalled I can dispose of the remaining part of the prayer of the petition."

¹ Kyle, June 10, 1862, 24 D. 1083, 34 Scot. Jur. 541.

² Lockhart, June 24, 1862, 24 D. 1086.

³ Sinclair, Petitioner, June 25, 1886, 23 S. L. R. 737.

THE BANK OF SCOTLAND, Nominal Raisers.

MARIE ISABELLE GUDIN (Baroness Gudin), Real Raiser and Claimant (Respondent).—Low—Moody Stuart.

No. 46.

THEODORE JAMES GUDIN (Baron Gudin), Claimant (Reclaimer).—*J. C. Thomson—G. R. Gillespie.*Dec. 8, 1886.
Bank of Scotland v. Gudin.

Foreign—Jurisdiction—Foreign decree—Prorogation.—A wife sued her husband in the English Courts under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and the action was compromised by an agreement between the parties, by which their respective rights in their properties were defined, and the husband undertook to make over certain property to his wife. The agreement bore that an order of Court should be taken to that effect. Thereafter the husband returned to France, where both spouses had been domiciled at the date of the marriage, and where he alleged he was still domiciled, and refused to implement the agreement. The wife raised an action in England to enforce implement, in which she obtained decree in absence. In an action in the Court of Session to enforce implement of this decree, held that the husband could not be heard to plead that the English Court had no jurisdiction, in respect that he had prorogated their jurisdiction.

Foreign—Forum non conveniens—Decree conform—Husband and Wife.—A wife raised an action in the Court of Chancery against her husband to have certain property deposited in a bank in Scotland declared to belong to her in virtue of an antenuptial marriage-contract in French form, executed in France, where the parties were domiciled at the time. For some time before the raising of the action the spouses had been resident in England. The action was compromised by an agreement, providing, inter alia, that the parties should execute a deed of separation, and that the property in question should belong to the wife. The husband thereafter raised an action in France to have the agreement declared null as being ultra vires of the spouses. The wife obtained from the Court of Chancery a decree in absence ordaining implement of the agreement, and in Scotland raised a multiplepounding in name of the bank in which she claimed the property deposited. The husband, a competing claimant, pleaded that the action should be sisted to await the result of the action depending in France, as a more convenient forum for determining the question between the parties. Held that the wife was entitled to be preferred de plano.

BARON AND BARONESS GUDIN were married in France in September 1882. At the date of the marriage they were both domiciled in France, and they entered into a marriage-contract in the French form by which they declared that they submitted themselves to French law. They adopted the principle of the "separation des biens" in that contract. It further provided,—(3) As matter of information merely, the future husband declares that he possesses at present in furniture, jewels, moveable effects and plate to the value of 35,000 francs, and in objects of art and curiosities, including pictures, armour, arms, bronzes, and old china, the value of 96,000 francs." (4) Presumption of Property.—"The effects and jewels for the use of the intended wife, the furniture belonging to her described in the statement hereto annexed, as well as all other goods, objects, and securities of which she may prove the property in her person, either by inscription in her own name, writings of the intended husband, invoices or receipts, shall belong to her; in regard to all other goods, moveable and immoveable, corporeal or incorporeal, they shall belong of full right to the intended husband, without any evidence."

In the contract the Baron was described as a British subject.

About six weeks after their marriage the spouses came to London. Failing, however, to find a place suitable for their permanent residence, they returned to Paris for the winter. On 1st April 1883 they came 1st Division.

Lord M'Laren.
B.

No. 46. back to London, bringing with them their furniture. Shortly afterwards they came to Scotland for some months, and at different dates between Dec. 8, 1886. 14th April and 10th August 1883 the Baron deposited with the Bank of Scotland in Glasgow bonds and securities payable to bearer to the value of £15,000, and placed two sums of £1000 on deposit there. On 23d June 1883 he acquired right to a lease for twenty-one years of a house in London.

Dec. 8, 1886.
Bank of Scot-
land v. Gudin.

The spouses continued to live in London, and on 25th September 1884 the Baroness raised an action against her husband under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, in the High Court of Justice, Chancery Division, to have her title to these securities, &c. declared. Before that action had proceeded far the parties compromised it by concluding an agreement, dated 5th November 1884, which was signed by themselves and their counsel. That agreement bore,—“(1) The parties shall execute a deed of separation, which shall contain all usual clauses, and override the terms of the marriage-contract. (2) The Baron, at the cost of the Baroness, shall immediately take all proper steps for vesting, in the sole name of the Baroness, all his interest, if any, in a sum of 15,000 francs, and interest, or thereabouts, alleged to be due from the Baron's mother, and also any property standing in the joint names of the Baron and Baroness, or in the name of either of them. (3) Pending the settlement of all matters in dispute, the injunctions shall continue. (4) All the property referred to in the affidavits and exhibits to be the property of the Baroness.” These affidavits included the bonds, &c. deposited in the Bank of Scotland, and the pictures, jewels, &c., referred to in the marriage-contract. Then followed various provisions as to letters, papers, and outstanding debts, as well as a provision of an annuity of £300 to the Baron, and the settlement of a capital sum of £8000 in the hands of trustees to secure this. The last article was in these terms:—“(12) By consent an order of the said Court to be taken to the above effect, and a stay of proceedings in ‘re Gudin’ to be taken on these terms.”

After concluding this agreement the Baron left England. He returned to Paris, and raised an action there against his wife for declarator that the pictures, jewels, &c., were his property, and for an order on his wife to restore them, pleading that the agreement was null by the law of France. Madame Gudin did not appear, and on 7th March 1885 decree in default was pronounced against her after counsel had been heard and the documents in the case considered. Madame Gudin subsequently applied to be reponed against this judgment, and on being reponed, pleaded as a preliminary plea that the French Courts were incompetent, her husband having lost his French nationality, and the suit therefore being a suit between foreigners. The Court of first instance sustained this plea on 4th November 1885.

Meantime on 16th December 1884, Madame Gudin had raised an action in England to enforce specific implement of the agreement. This action was served upon the Baron by leaving a copy of the writ of summons with his solicitor in Paris, but no appearance was made for him. Thereafter the Court decreed specific implement of the agreement, and, in pursuance of an order of the Court, the Chief Clerk of Court executed certain transfers, deeds and other documents, vesting the bonds, &c., deposited with the Bank of Scotland, partly in trustees to secure the Baron's annuity, and partly in the Baroness. A document of request and authority was also executed, requesting the bank to deliver to the trustees and the Baroness the property deposited with them.

The Baroness having demanded delivery of the property deposited with the bank, and the Baron having intimated to the bank that he had raised proceedings in France to set aside the English proceedings, the bank refused to pay without judicial authority, and the Baroness accordingly raised a multiplepounding in name of the bank.

No. 46.

Dec. 8, 1886.
Bank of Scot-
land v. Gudin.

The Baroness and the trustees appointed by the English Court to hold the capital of the Baron's annuity claimed the whole fund, setting forth the proceedings in England, and stating that it had been arranged before the marriage that the spouses should leave France and settle in England or Scotland, and that they had taken their London house as a permanent residence.

She pleaded;—In respect of the agreement between the spouses, and of the decrees of the High Court of Justice, conveyances and transfers in favour of the claimants following thereon, the claimants are entitled to be ranked and preferred in terms of their respective claims.

The Baron also claimed the fund in medio. With regard to the marriage-contract he stated;—"The meaning and effect of the said contract, and the powers and rights of parties under it, are all questions which can only be determined according to the law of France."

With regard to the agreement he stated;—"The said agreement is by the law of France null and of no effect; by that law no modifications could be made by the spouses upon the provisions of the marriage-contract stante matrimonio, and it was illegal for the spouses to enter into any voluntary contract of separation."

He also stated that he had raised further proceedings in the French Courts with reference to the fund in medio, and that it had not been included in the first action raised by him in France on account of the expenses of extract there, these being ad valorem. He admitted that the judgment decreeing specific implement of the agreement could have been appealed up to a date subsequent to the closing of the record in the present action.

He pleaded;—(1) In the circumstances set forth, the Court of Session is not a convenient forum for the determination of the questions raised between the parties. (2) The bonds, obligations, certificates, and sums of money, forming the fund in medio, being the property of the claimant, he should be ranked and preferred to the whole fund. (3) The claimant having right to the said bonds, obligations, certificates, and sums of money under the provisions of the marriage-contract between him and the real raiser, he is entitled to be ranked and preferred to the whole fund in medio. (4) The pretended agreement of 5th November 1884 being null and of no effect, the claimant is entitled to be ranked and preferred to the whole fund in medio. (7) The pretended decrees and orders of the High Court of Justice in England having been pronounced in the absence of the claimant by a Court not having jurisdiction, and proceeding upon a pretended agreement which is null, the rights of the claimant are not affected thereby.

The Lord Ordinary (M'Laren), on 20th May 1886, pronounced this interlocutor:—"In respect of the agreement, decrees, conveyances, and transfers referred to in their claim, No. 36 of process, ranks and prefers the claimants Marie Isabelle Gudin and others upon the fund in medio, in terms of their said claim."*

* "NOTE.— . . . I take for granted that deeds of judicial transfer, whether expressed in words of conveyance or in the form of a procuratory or authority to pay (the latter form being properly applicable to money in account), have the force of a decree of adjudication, although by English procedure they are signed by the chief clerk, and not by the Judge. There is indeed little difference in this respect between an English and a Scottish adjudication of property—

No. 46.

Dec. 8, 1886.
Bank of Scot-
land v. Gudin.

The Baron reclaimed, and argued;—The Court of Session was not the convenient forum for determining the questions between the parties. These must be determined by French law, as France was the Court of the domicile of the parties, and the spouses had elected that law as regulative of their contract.¹ Proceedings were pending in France, and the French Courts alone could determine them, for the questions were of a consistorial character, and such questions belonged to the Courts of the domicile.² That the questions were consistorial was plain, for the first article of the agreement provided for the execution of a deed of separation. The Court was bound to consider this question of jurisdiction all the more carefully in a multiplepinding where several parties were called, and should not entertain such an action unless all the parties were subject to its jurisdiction.³ The effect of sustaining the plea of forum non conveniens was not pressed to the effect of dismissing the action, but merely to the effect of sisting it to await the decision of the French Courts.

The Courts of England had no jurisdiction, for the decrees now sought to be enforced had been pronounced in an action to which the Baron had not been cited in any way that a foreign Court—and the Court of Session was a foreign Court—would recognise. The jurisdiction asserted proceeded on the footing that the Baron had executed an agreement in England. That was a good ground of jurisdiction, by the general principles of international law, if coupled with personal citation in the territory, but not otherwise.⁴ The English Courts no doubt had power by their own the actual decree in our practice being signed by the Extractor of Court, although proceeding on an interlocutor or order signed by a Judge. The only question is whether we are to give effect to the decree, transfer, and authority.

“On this question I have very little to say, because it does not present any difficulty to my mind.

“It may be, and I think is, the law of Scotland that a decree or judgment of the Superior Courts of England is examinable when founded on for execution in this part of the United Kingdom. But it is to be executed, if after examination it is found to be regular.

“By examination I do not understand to be meant a re-trial of the cause on issues of fact or of law. It is not necessary, nor in my view would it be altogether convenient, to attempt to define the kinds of irregularities in decrees which would make it the duty of this Court to deny effect to them.

“Instances of such irregularities, whether as to jurisdiction, form, or substance may be figured; and no doubt a superior Court may be imposed upon, so as to be induced to issue a decree which, when the truth came to be known, neither it nor any Court whose aid was sought would be willing to enforce. But nothing of the kind is suggested here. The case for the competing claimant is, that he was entitled to plead his own disability in the English High Court; and that, not having done so, he should be allowed to do so here. Why did he not maintain the plea of disability in England? or, if decree was given against him in absence, why did he not move to have the case opened up? No explanation is given on these points. The pursuer's case resolves into this, that he is to be allowed to re-try the case on its merits. On principle and authority, I conclude that he is not entitled to this indulgence. I accordingly prefer Baroness Gudin and others in terms of their claim.”

¹ Corbett v. Waddell, &c., Nov. 13, 1879, 7 R. 200.

² Per Lord Shand in Stavert v. Stavert, Feb. 3, 1882, 9 R. 519, Lord Shand at p. 534.

³ Per Lord Neaves in Thomson v. North British and Mercantile Insurance Co., Feb. 1, 1868, 6 Macph. 310, Lord Neaves at p. 316, 40 Scot. Jur. 170, Lord Neaves at p. 174.

⁴ Sinclair v. Smith, July 17, 1860, 22 D. 1475, L. J.-C. Inglis at p. 1481, 32 Scot. Jur. 671, L. J.-C. at p. 674.

municipal law (the Judicature Act) to cite defenders in such a case vis à vis et modis, but such citation was a mere nullity out of England.¹ The Lord Ordinary had said he might have pleaded this in England, but the English Courts would have been bound in England to apply their own rules of jurisdiction, although they would not be recognised elsewhere. It was said that by consenting that an order of Court might be taken to enforce the agreement, the Baron had prorogated the jurisdiction of the English Courts. That consent had reference to the first action, and could not be extended to the second, particularly as the agreement might have to be put in force long afterwards, and in a foreign country.

No. 46.

Dec. 8, 1886.
Bank of Scot-
land v. Gudin

It was averred that the agreement was null by the law of France. Proof of that might be ordered, but a reference to the Code² and to the decisions pronounced in France shewed that, prima facie, it was so. The question was one of capacity under the marriage-contract, and that must be determined by the law of the domicile,³ viz., of France.

Argued for the Baroness;—The question of the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery to pronounce the judgments in question must be left to that Court to determine. This Court would not interfere except in altogether exceptional circumstances. Any error in judgment could be set right by appeal, which admittedly was open to the Baron, and which he had failed to take.⁴ The Baron's claim was an attempt to set aside in this Court a judicial compromise of the action in the Court of Chancery without any proceedings having been taken to set it aside in that Court. He must shew that the judgments were bad, not merely in form but in substance, and would be bad even according to the law of England.⁵ Further, it was clear that the Court of Chancery had jurisdiction to adjudicate between the parties in regard to the fund in question. Assuming, contrary to what the Baroness averred, that the spouses were not domiciled in England, yet the Baron had prorogated the jurisdiction of the English Courts. Prorogation might be tacit or express, and was competent even in proper consistorial causes where no collusion was suspected.⁶ Here there was tacit prorogation of jurisdiction in the original action, as the Baron had not demurred to the jurisdiction, and express prorogation in regard to the second action, as he had consented to the agreement being made an order of Court.

As to the question of a convenient forum, there was no longer any question raised requiring foreign law for its solution. The rights of the spouses under the marriage-contract, according to French law, was the de quo queritur in the original action, which had been compromised by the agreement. What effect was to be given to the decree for implement of the agreement was now the question, and no aid on this point could be got from a French Court. Even if the agreement would have been treated as null by a French Court, the balance of authority was in favour of the view that the lex loci, and not the lex domicilii, was to be looked to.⁷

¹ Story, sec. 546.

² Code Civil, secs. 1394-5.

³ Wharton on the Conflict of Laws, sec. 199, and note; cf. also Westlake, sec. 35; Lord Brougham in Anstruther v. Adair, 1834, 2 M. and K. 513; and Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce in Guepratte v. Young, 1851, 4 De G. and S. 217.

⁴ Wilkie v. Cathcart, Nov. 19, 1870, 9 Macph. 168, 43 Scot. Jur. 88; Waygood & Co. v. Bennie, Feb. 17, 1885, 12 R. 651, per Lord Young, p. 657.

⁵ Whitehead v. Thomson, March 20, 1861, 23 D. 772, 33 Scot. Jur. 401; Gladstone v. Lindsay, Nov. 5, 1868, 6 S. L. R. 71.

⁶ Ersk. i. 2, 27; Murray v. Lindley, March 8, 1805, Mor. "Forum Competens," App. No. 5.

⁷ Fraser, Husband and Wife, vol. ii. pp. 1317 and 1299; Story's Conflict of

No. 46.

Dec. 8, 1886.
Bank of Scot-
land v. Gudin.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The fund in medio in this case consists of certain bonds, money, &c. lodged in the Bank of Scotland (who are the nominal raisers of the action) by the claimant, Baron Gudin, in April, May, July, and August 1883. What was the object of Baron Gudin or his wife, the other claimant, lodging these securities in the bank we are not distinctly informed, nor is it of great importance to inquire whether it was for safe custody or with any other object. It was not, however, till after they were lodged that any judicial proceedings took place. The first movement in the Court of Chancery was on 25th September 1884, when the lady raised an action against her husband, under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, to have her title to these investments and property declared. The Baron says that though he was then in England, and held a twenty-one years' lease of a house in London, yet he was not then subject to the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, being a Frenchman domiciled in France. That may be the case, but it is of little importance now, for he appeared in the suit as a defender, and took no objection to the jurisdiction, but pleaded on the merits, and therefore whatever might be said against the jurisdiction there certainly was jurisdictio in consentientes, for both parties went into Court and joined issue on the question whether this money, &c., did or did not belong to the lady. That case did not go to judgment, because it was settled by parties by memorandum of agreement, the import of which is not open to doubt. There is no doubt that under the terms of that agreement, which was signed by the husband and wife and by their counsel, the property was to be the property of the lady and not of the husband. That, however, was not all that was agreed, for it was further stipulated that the husband was to have an annuity of £300, and that £8000 was to be lodged in the name of trustees as security for that amount. In short, without going into detail, it is as distinct a case of settling an action in Court as can well be. Such a settlement is known to the law as a "transaction," and of all kinds of contracts that is the most difficult to set aside. It has often been said that there is scarcely any ground on which it is possible to set aside such a transaction except fraud pure and simple, or force and fear. We must therefore hold that up to this point there is no doubt of the binding character of the proceedings, for, first, the jurisdiction of Chancery was admitted by both parties, and its aid invoked by both, and secondly, the case which was before the Court was settled by the parties among themselves by a memorandum, one of the articles (the 12th) of which was that an order of Court should be taken "to the above effect."

According to what appears to be the practice of the Court of Chancery, the order of the Court confirming the agreement requires to be obtained in a separate action, and accordingly the lady raised a new suit to make it effectual, but in that suit the Baron did not think fit to appear. It was served on him, and he had opportunity to appear if he chose. For my own part, I do not think that it is of much consequence whether he appeared or not, for he had consented that the agreement should be confirmed by order of Court, and he thereby had subjected himself to the jurisdiction of the Court in a suit for that purpose. Accordingly, in the second suit, proceedings were taken effectually to enable the Baroness and the trustees for the Baron's annuity to take possession of the securities, &c., in the hands of the Bank of Scotland, and the object of this action is to authorise the bank to pay over the money and hand over the securities to the Baroness and the trustees respectively. The answer to this demand raises the question now before us.

Laws, sec. 102; Simonin v. Mallac, April 26, 1860, 2 Swab. and Tr. 67, 29 L. J. P. and M. 97; Sottomayor v. De Barros, Aug. 6, 1879, L. R., 5 P. D. 94, per Sir James Hannen, p. 100.

No. 46.

Dec. 8, 1886.
Bank of Scot-
land v. Gudin.

In the first place, it is contended that this is not a convenient forum for trying the question. But it seems to me that there is no question remaining to be tried, for any question has already been decided between the parties in the Court of Chancery, no objection being taken of want of jurisdiction, the full force of the judgment in the second suit being simply to give the Baroness and the trustees the right to get possession of the money and securities. It is further maintained that the whole proceeding of the agreement is totally inconsistent with the provisions of the marriage-contract, and that the Baron, being a Frenchman, was incapable in law of doing what he has done. I do not know how far that may be a possible ground for setting aside the agreement, but it meantime stands unreduced, and so long as it so stands I do not see how we can refuse to give effect to these decrees, and to prefer the Baroness and the trustees to the whole fund in medio.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND.—Although this case comes before us in the form of a multipointing it is really in substance an action by Baroness Gudin for delivery of certain securities, &c., the husband being merely a claimant for his interest to state any objection. The question is simply whether we are to give effect to the decision of the Court of Chancery which gives the Baroness a right to the securities, &c., and entitles her to delivery of them. She comes here with this decision, and asks decree conform, and the husband appears to oppose her. The question is, Has he stated reasonable grounds of objection? In the first place, he says that this is forum non conveniens, and what he maintains is that this Court should practically sist procedure, not to enable him to try any question in England, or to open up the decisions of the Courts there, but that he may go to France to see whether the Courts of that country will decide that the English decision should receive effect in Scotland. That is rather an extraordinary motion. I could understand it if it had been said that it was proposed to open up the English decision. He might have good ground for saying, "The proceedings in England were in absence, and I propose to open up that question, and it is more convenient to do so in England," but the proposal being to go to France, I cannot see how the French Courts can be regarded as a more convenient forum.

The question, however, remains, Is the decision of the English Court to receive effect? It is said that it ought not to do so, on the ground that that Court had no jurisdiction. If it appeared that a foreign Court had usurped jurisdiction to which they had no right, this Court would very likely interfere, but, on looking at the circumstances, it appears to me that the English Court had various grounds of jurisdiction. The parties had a long lease of a house in London. In the first action the Baron at once entered appearance, and, though he did not do so in the second action, we find in the agreement that it is stipulated that the terms of the agreement are to be confirmed by an order of that Court. Considering all those circumstances, it seems to me hopeless to suggest that that Court had no jurisdiction. The Baron did not in England plead want of jurisdiction, and I do not think he can be allowed to raise the point here.

No. 46. But is he to be allowed to get into the merits of the case? He says that by his marriage he acquired right to these securities and money, and that by the law of France no agreement could deprive him of it. He might, however, have raised that question in the English case, but he did not do so. That being so, I see no possible ground on which we can stop the decree in the English Courts to enable him now to raise the question, and therefore I think we must prefer the Baroness and the trustees to the fund in medio.

Dec. 8, 1886.
Bank of Scot-
land v. Gudin.

LORD ADAM.—Whether the Court of Chancery would have had jurisdiction other than that afforded by the Baron prorogating the jurisdiction, I do not know, but that he did prorogate the jurisdiction, and that he is bound by what happened in that Court, I have no doubt. The first action there ended in the agreement, by article 12 of which an order of that Court was to be taken in terms of the preceding articles. The second action was raised with a view to carrying out that 12th article, and there has been nothing said to satisfy me that the proceedings in that second action were not according to the ordinary practice in England when effect has to be given to such an agreement. The Baron knew all along of these proceedings, and if he had any objection to them he should have appeared and stated it, but, as he did not do so, I see no ground for refusing effect to the decisions of the English Court. The result of giving effect to them is to sustain the claim of the Baroness and the trustees. It has been suggested that the proper way would be for the Baron to go to the Court of Chancery, and get the proceedings set aside if he can. If a motion for delay to allow of that being done had been made, I do not know whether we should have acceded to it or not; but no such proposal was made, and I am not prepared to listen to a motion for a sist to enable the Baron to resort to the Courts in France.

THE COURT adhered.

MITCHELL & BAXTER, W.S.—DONALD MACKENZIE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 47. ENGLISH'S COASTING AND SHIPPING COMPANY, LIMITED, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—J. C. Thomson—Watt.

Dec. 10, 1886. BRITISH FINANCE COMPANY, LIMITED, Defenders (Respondents).—Darling.

English's
Coasting and
Shipping Co.
Limited, v.
British Finance Co.
Limited.

Foreign—Jurisdiction—Decree of foreign Court—Judgments Extension Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 54), sec. 2—Process.—Held that a certificate of a judgment of the "High Court of Justice, Queen's Bench Division, Liverpool District Registry," could be registered in the Books of Council and Session in terms of section 2 of the Judgments Extension Act, 1868.*

Held that to entitle a creditor who holds a judgment of the High Court of Justice in England to register the same in Scotland, under section 2 of the Judg-

* Section 2 of the Judgments Extension Act, 1868, enacts that "where judgment shall hereafter be obtained or entered up in any of the Courts of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, or Exchequer, at Westminster, . . . for any debt, damages, or costs . . ." on production at the office in Edinburgh for the registration of deeds, &c., registered in the Books of Council and Session, of a certificate of such judgment in statutory form, such certificate shall be registered in a book kept for that purpose, and "every certificate so registered shall, from the date of such registration, be of the same force and effect as a decreet of the Court of Session, and all proceedings shall and may be had and taken on an extract of such certificate as if the judgment, of which it is a certificate, had been decreet originally pronounced in the Court of Session. . . ."

ments Extension Act, 1868, to do diligence thereon, it is not necessary that the debtor should be subject to the jurisdiction of the Scottish Courts. No. 47.

Arrestment—Ship.—Observations (per Lord Fraser) on warrants for arresting and dismantling ships. Dec. 10, 1886.

English's
Coasting and
Shipping Co.
Limited, v.
British Finance
Co. Limited.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Fraser.
M.

(Vide ante, Jan. 13, 1886, 13 R. 430.)

On 4th November 1884 the British Finance Company, Limited, obtained a judgment against English's Coasting and Shipping Company, Limited, for a sum of £69, 2s., the amount of a debt found due to them, with costs, in an action raised in the High Court of Justice, Queen's Bench Division, Liverpool District Registry.

On 10th November 1884 the British Finance Company registered the judgment in the Books of Council and Session in Edinburgh, in terms of section 2 of the Judgments Extension Act, 1868.

The certificate on which the judgment was registered was granted by Mr Thomas Edmund Paget, District Registrar at Liverpool of the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice, and bore that the judgment was granted "in default of delivery of a defence by" English's Coasting and Shipping Company, Limited.

On 15th November 1884 the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Kinnear) granted "concurrence and authority for putting the within warrant of arrestment" (i.e., the warrant contained in the extract registered certificate of judgment) "into all due and legal execution so far as regards maritime subjects, and grants warrant to dismantle arrested vessels if necessary." English's Coasting and Shipping Company had no domicile in Scotland, and no steps had been taken to found jurisdiction against them.

Subsequently the ship "Magdala," in which English's Coasting and Shipping Company had a beneficial interest, was arrested and dismantled when lying at the port of Grangemouth.

On 16th February 1885 English's Coasting and Shipping Company raised an action in the Court of Session against the British Finance Company, concluding for reduction of the extract registered certificate of judgment, and the warrant of arrestment following thereon, and for damages.

The pursuers averred,—(Cond. 3) "The defenders, instead of following out the ordinary method of procedure in England, on or about the 10th day of November 1884, wrongously and illegally registered the said judgment in the Books of Council and Session at Edinburgh. The said judgment is not registrable under the Judgments Extension Act, 1868, or any other Act, and the registration thereof in Edinburgh, and whole proceedings of the pursuers thereon after mentioned were illegal. In any event, it was not registrable against the pursuers, who had no place of business in Scotland, and against whom no jurisdiction of a Scotch Court existed."

The defenders answered,—"(1) The allegations introduced in the 3d article of the condescendence for the pursuers are really arguments in law and not statements of fact, but the defenders aver and explain that there is now no Court of Queen's Bench, and no Court referred to in the Judgments Extension Act now sits at Westminster. By the Judicature Acts of 1873 and 1875 however, and relative Orders in Council, the Courts at Westminster were consolidated into the High Court of Justice; the Court of Queen's Bench became a Division of the High Court; district registries of the High Court were established, inter alia, at Liverpool, and district registrars were to be deemed officers of the High Court; proceedings in the High Court were to be deemed equivalent to proceedings in any Court whose jurisdiction had been transferred to the High Court; and the powers of district registrars are declared to be equivalent to those of a master of the former Superior Courts at Westminster."

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The said registration in the

No. 47. Books of Council and Session at Edinburgh of said judgment, and the arrestment and whole proceedings thereon, being incompetent, wrongous, and illegal, the pursuers are entitled to decree of reduction as craved.

Dec. 10, 1886.
English's
Coasting and
Shipping Co.
Limited, v.
British Finance Co.
Limited.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The defenders are not subject to the jurisdiction of the Courts of Scotland. (4) The whole proceedings of the defenders being orderly and legal, the action is unfounded in fact and in law, and the defenders are entitled to absolvitor from the conclusions of the summons, with expenses.

On 9th June 1886 the Lord Ordinary (Fraser) assoilzied the defenders.*

* "OPINION.—The 2d section of the Judgments Extension Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 54), provides that when a judgment of any of the English or Irish Courts therein mentioned has been pronounced, a certificate of such judgment, in the form annexed to the statute, may be registered at the office in Edinburgh kept for the registration of deeds, bonds, &c., 'in like manner as a bond executed according to the law of Scotland, with a clause of registration for execution therein mentioned; and every certificate so registered shall, from the date of such registration, be of the same force and effect as a decree of the Court of Session, and all proceedings shall and may be had and taken on an extract of such certificate as if the judgment of which it is a certificate had been a decree originally pronounced in the Court of Session on the date of such registration.' Thus the registered certificate is to be taken as having the same effect as a decree of the Court of Session. Everything can be carried out under it which could be done in virtue of a decree pronounced by the latter Court against a domiciled Scotsman. Now, let us see what such a decree authorises.

"It was long ago settled that an arrestment may be used upon a decree without a previous charge (Weir v. Falconer, 2d February 1814, F. C.), and the Personal Diligence Act, 1 and 2 Vict. cap. 114, sec. 1, gives effect to this law, and the schedule No. 1 attached to that statute states it thus:—'And the said Lords grant warrant to messengers-at-arms, in Her Majesty's name and authority, to charge the said A personally, or at his dwelling-place, if within Scotland,

[if to pay money, specify the sum, interest, and expenses], and that to the said B [specify the name of the person in whose favour the decree is pronounced] within [insert the appropriate days] next, after he is charged to that effect, under the pain of poinding and imprisonment, and also grant warrant to arrest the said A's readiest goods, gear, debts, and sums of money, in payment and satisfaction of the said sum, interest, and expenses.' The debtor's goods are not to be poinded, except after a charge; but arrestment may be laid on at once, on the decree being extracted. There was consequently no good ground of objection to the ship of the pursuers being arrested, without a previous charge. But then it is said that, in order to justify the execution of diligence, in virtue of the decree of the Scottish Court, the Court must have jurisdiction over the defender; and such jurisdiction, it is maintained, is not had merely because the foreigner is owner of moveables in Scotland. The objection thus stated is, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, untenable. The Court to whom any objection founded upon want of jurisdiction must be stated is the Court that granted the original decree (Wotherspoon & Birrell v. Conolly, 10th February 1871, 9 Macph. 510). That Court, in the present case, was the High Court of Justice, Queen's Bench Division, Liverpool District Registry. The Courts of Scotland, whose assistance is now invoked in order to carry out this decree, must proceed upon the footing that it was a decree granted by a Court having jurisdiction to make it; and such being the case, the only question that can be raised is, whether the ship could be arrested under a decree of the Court of Session, the ship belonging to a foreigner, but against whom a decree of the Court of Session had been competently pronounced. In these circumstances, it is out of the question to maintain that before this English decree can be put to execution in Scotland there must be an arrestment to found jurisdiction, as in the case where an action is to be intended against a foreigner. The Court, in such a case, can only entertain the suit upon jurisdiction being constituted by an arrestment. But such is not the present case, for the Court that enter-

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—No objection could be taken against the proceedings in the Court at Liverpool; that Court un-

No. 47.

Dec. 10, 1886.
English's
Coasting and
Shipping Co.
Limited, v.
British Finance
Co.
Limited.

tained the suit had jurisdiction ratione domicilii, and all that then requires to be done is to apply the forms of execution in use in the other part of the United Kingdom, where property of the defenders can be found.

"The extract certificate of judgment has appended to it an interlocutor by the Lord Ordinary officiating on the Bills in the following terms:—'Edinburgh, 15th November 1884.—The Lord Ordinary grants concurrence and authority for putting the within warrant of arrestment into all due and legal execution, so far as regards maritime subjects, and grants warrant to dismantle arrested vessels, if necessary.' In the event of the answer made by the creditor (the British Finance Company) to the objection of want of jurisdiction, stated by the pursuers of this action of reduction, not being sustained, the creditor maintains that this sanction or concurrence of the Lord Ordinary on the Bills to the arrestment of the ship, supplies any defect, if such existed. It is right, therefore, that this point should be considered. The concurrence of the Lord Ordinary on the Bills gives no additional force to the certificate and to the warrant appended to the extract, which is in these terms:—'And the said Lords grant warrant for all lawful execution hereon.' So far as the Lord Ordinary can see, the Bill-Chamber concurrence is without any legal authority, and was unnecessary. It has, no doubt, been the practice for a considerable time back to apply for the sanction or approval of the Lord Ordinary on the Bills; but this has arisen from misapplication of an old practice. When the Admiralty Court was in existence in Scotland it was necessary when arrestment was to be made of a ship, proceeding upon an extract registered protest or upon a horning, that the concurrence of the Judge Admiral should be obtained; and such concurrence was given in the terms of the concurrence of the Lord Ordinary on the Bills in this case (Smith's Maritime Practice, p. 59). The matter is thus noted in the Juridical Styles, vol. iii., of the edition of 1828, p. 993, published before the abolition of the Admiralty Court:—'The Judge Admiral must be applied to for his concurrence when the person or effects of any debtor to be apprehended or attached by the above diligence are aboard of the ship, or otherwise situated within the precincts of the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty. This is obtained, of course, upon production of a caption, or of a horning, or other letters containing warrant of arrestment, duly signeted; and a deliverance suited to the nature of the diligence is granted accordingly.' But all this is now unnecessary, because the whole powers of the Admiralty Court were transferred to the Court of Session and the Sheriff Court by the Act 1 Will. IV. cap. 69, secs. 21 and 22, and any decrees or warrants by them have the same effect as decrees or warrants of the Judge Admiral. Accordingly the ordinary warrant to arrest contained in a summons has been held sufficient for the arrestment of a ship, without any concurrence by the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Clark v. Loos, 17th June 1853, 15 D. 750). The ordinary summons in the Admiralty Court (which was in that Court called a 'precept'), contained, as a usual conclusion, one to arrest all ships, and 'to take the rudders and anchors from the said vessels (the same being always in a safe harbour), to remain under sure fence and arrestment at the instance of the said complainer aye and while sufficient caution and surety be found acted in the books of our said High Court of Admiralty, that the same shall be made forthcoming to the complainer, as accords of the law'—(Boyd's Judicial Proceedings, p. 13). Now, what the Judge Admiral's precept could do, without concurrence from anyone, the Court of Session, which has got all the Judge Admiral's powers, can also do; and it is very absurd to have an extract whereby 'the said Lords grant warrant for all lawful execution hereon' backed up and sanctioned by one of their number, and as a matter of course, too, the Lord Ordinary on the Bills. Perhaps the ordinary warrant to arrest may not include the further right to dismantle. The practice in the Admiralty Court was to insert a conclusion to that effect in the summons—a conclusion both to arrest and dismantle. Now, as already stated, it was enacted by 1 Will. IV. cap. 69, sec. 21, that 'the

No. 47.

Dec. 10, 1886.
 English's
 Coasting and
 Shipping Co.
 Limited, v.
 British Finance Co.
 Limited.

doubtedly had jurisdiction. But the judgment there granted did not fall under the 2d section of the Act of 1868. The judgments which were registrable were judgments of, inter alia, the Court of Queen's Bench "at Westminster." The order had under those words to be pronounced "at Westminster," and not when the Court was on circuit. The judgment was not even pronounced by the Court of Queen's Bench itself, but was a mere order pronounced by the Registrar; the case having gone by default never reached the Court itself; up to the very end it was wholly in the Registrar's office. On the assumption, however, that no objection could be taken to the judgment or the certificate and registration, the diligence which followed thereon was incompetent, as the reclaimers had no domicile in Scotland, and there had been no attempt to found jurisdiction against them. A registered certificate of a judgment was by the 2d section of the Act to have the same force and effect as a decret of the Court of Session. That meant of a decree which might have been taken in a similar action in Scotland. But no action for this debt could have been raised in Scotland, because the Court of Session had no jurisdiction.

Argued for the respondents;—The words "at Westminster" in the statute were not referable to the judgment, but were descriptive of the Court—the Queen's Bench "at Westminster." The Court of Queen's Bench at Westminster was now merged in the High Court of Justice, which had no special local habitation. The Registrar of the Liverpool District Registry was an officer of the Court, and was entitled to carry out proceedings in the Queen's Bench Division up to a certain point, when the cause came before the Court itself. It was merely for convenience that he was allowed to conduct formal proceedings to a conclusion. As regarded the argument against the diligence which had been executed, if given effect to, it would lessen the utility of the statute very largely,

High Court of Admiralty be abolished, and that hereafter the Court of Session shall hold and exercise original jurisdiction in all maritime civil causes and proceedings of the same nature and extent in all respects as that held and exercised in regard to such causes by the High Court of Admiralty before the passing of this Act.' In virtue of this enactment the Court of Session can issue all writs in the same way and manner as the former Admiralty Court could do, and there seems to be no good reason why the conclusions of a summons should not be as extensive in the Court of Session—now the Admiralty Court—as they were in the former Admiralty summonses or precepts,—that is, containing a warrant both to arrest and dismantle. Dismantling a vessel is simply completing an arrestment, and making it efficient.

"If no such conclusion be inserted in the summons, but merely a conclusion to arrest, and it should be sought further to dismantle, there might be some ground for applying to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills for a warrant to that effect, because, after the passage already quoted from the Act of Parliament, it is enacted that 'all applications of a summary nature connected with such causes may be made to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills'; and a warrant to dismantle, where such a warrant is not concluded for, might perhaps competently be asked for in virtue of this clause.

"But all this has reference merely to arrestment and dismantling on the dependence. It has no application to the case when final decree has been pronounced, and when execution of it is sought. In such a case the decree carries along with it full power to dismantle, and perform everything else that was competent, in virtue of a final decree of the Judge Admiral.

"The result of all this is that if the arrestment of the pursuers' vessel was invalidly effected in virtue of the warrant in the extract certificate, it was not made valid by anything that was done by the Lord Ordinary on the Bills. The pursuers are entitled to this expression of opinion by the Lord Ordinary."

because no one could obtain any benefit from it unless the defender was subject to the jurisdiction both of the country in which the judgment was obtained and also of the country in which it was to be registered. Further, the Registrar, when a judgment was brought for registration, would have to enter upon a long and possibly intricate inquiry whether the person against whom it was directed was subject to the jurisdiction of the Courts of the country. This could not have been consistent with the intention of the Legislature, which was to make judgments available to creditors in whatever part of the United Kingdom they might find their creditors or their creditors' property.

No. 47.
—
Dec. 10, 1886.
English's
Coasting and
Shipping Co.
Limited, v.
British Finance Co.
Limited.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The proceedings challenged in this action of reduction were taken under section 2 of the Judgments Extension Act, 1868. The first objection taken by the pursuers is that the certificate does not shew that the judgment intended to be enforced here is a judgment of any of the Courts specified in that 2d section. The provision is that “where any judgment shall hereafter be obtained or entered up in any of the Courts of Queen’s Bench, Common Pleas, or Exchequer at Westminster . . . respectively for any debt, damages, or costs,” a certificate of such judgment may be registered in Edinburgh; and “every certificate so registered shall from the date of such registration be of the same force and effect as a decree of the Court of Session”; and all proceedings may proceed thereon as if the judgment had been a decree pronounced by this Court. Now, the certificate in this case, of which an extract is produced, is made by Mr Paget, who is the proper officer to grant such certificates, and he certifies that the British Finance Company, Limited, on 4th November 1884, obtained a judgment against the pursuers of this reduction in the High Court of Justice, Queen’s Bench Division, Liverpool District Registry, for payment of a debt. Now, the High Court of Justice in England comes in the place of the superior Courts of Law and Equity, viz., Chancery, Exchequer, Admiralty, &c., and though we have no evidence before us of this transference of jurisdiction, it would be mere pedantry to ignore the fact. It therefore appears to me that when we find a certificate of a judgment bearing to be pronounced by the High Court of Justice, Queen’s Bench Division, we are bound to give to it the same effect as we should have given to a judgment by one of the Courts mentioned in the statute.

Objection was further taken that this was not a decree by the High Court of Justice itself, but by the District Registrar; in short, that it is not a judgment of the Court, but merely an entry in a book by the Registrar. I think we need not inquire into the particular regulations of the Queen’s Bench Division of the High Court of Justice as to the mode of entering up or extracting judgments; it is enough for us to know that this is a judgment obtained on a certain date before the High Court of Justice, Queen’s Bench Division, and therefore the objection fails.

But then a second objection is taken, viz., that the Court of Session had no jurisdiction as against the pursuers of this reduction, and that if the defenders had raised an action against them here, it would have been thrown out on the plea of want of jurisdiction, and that no proceedings were taken to found jurisdiction in Scotland. Now, that raises a question of some importance on the effect of the 2d section of the Statute of 1868. If the meaning merely is that an English or Irish decree may be enforced here against any domiciled Scots-

No. 47.

Dec. 10, 1886.
English's
Coasting and
Shipping Co.
Limited, v.
British Finance Co.
Limited.

man, or against anyone over whom we have jurisdiction, it would limit the utility of the Act very much, and in a way which has hitherto not been contemplated. The question therefore is, whether the effect of registering an English judgment here, or a Scottish judgment in England, is merely to enable the party obtaining the judgment to proceed against the person of the defender, or whether it is not also to enable him to proceed against any property of the defender which may be situated in the country where the judgment is registered. The policy of the statute points to the larger construction, viz., that if an Englishman or Irishman holds a judgment obtained in England or Ireland, he may use it and make it effectual against the person and property of his debtor, wherever he may find it within the United Kingdom, and therefore, though here the defenders in the English action had no domicile in Scotland, and the Scottish Courts had no jurisdiction over them, still the proceedings taken under the 2d section of the statute will be effectual to produce every known execution that would follow on a decree of this Court.

Some other matters relating to the mode in which the arrestments were used are noticed in the Lord Ordinary's note, but they were not pressed in argument, and it is unnecessary to say anything about them. I am therefore for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD MURE and LORD SHAND concurred.

LORD ADAM.—One of the objections urged here is that it is necessary that the judgment, the certificate of which is registered, must be obtained "at Westminster." My opinion is that those words "at Westminster," which occur in the statute, do not apply to the place where the judgment is to be pronounced, but are a description of the Court.

The second objection is that the Act does not come into force except where there is jurisdiction over the person against whom the judgment is pronounced in both countries. If that were so, it would greatly limit the usefulness of the Act, and I therefore agree that we should adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

THE COURT adhered.

CLARK & MACDONALD, S.S.C.—DALGLEISH & LUMSDEN, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 48.

Dec. 10, 1886.
Williamson v.
Williamson,
&c.

JOHN BURNETT WILLIAMSON, Petitioner.—Darling—Ferguson.
MISS MARY ANN WILLIAMSON AND OTHERS, Respondents.—H. Johnston.

Presumption—Presumption of Life Limitation (Scotland) Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 47), secs. 5 and 8.—Sec. 8 of the Presumption of Life Limitation Act, 1881, provides that, for the purposes of the Act, where a person has disappeared and "no presumption arises from the facts that he died at any definite date," he shall be presumed to have died on the day which will complete seven years from the date of his last being heard of.

Held that to exclude the statutory presumption of death on the day completing the seven years, the presumption arising from the facts must be such as would have been sufficient to overcome the presumption of life at common law.

Circumstances shewing the probability of an absent person's death at a date within the seven years after his disappearance, which were held not sufficient to overcome the presumption of life at common law.

Observations (per Lord Shand and Lord Adam) on the effect of the words "at any definite date."

ON 15th December 1885 John Burnett Williamson presented a petition to the Court under the Presumption of Life Limitation Act, 1881, in which he prayed for authority to make up a title as heir of provision to his brother, Arthur Stewart Williamson, and to enter into possession of, and enjoy, receive, and discharge the sum of £6000, forming the surrogatum for the estate of Arthur Seat which belonged to his said brother, with accumulated rents and interests "from and after the date when your Lordships shall hold that the said Arthur Stewart Williamson must be presumed to have died, in the same manner as if he were dead." The petitioner was not Arthur's heir-at-law.

No. 48.

Dec. 10, 1886.

Williamson v. Williamson, &c.

1st DIVISION.

B.

The petitioner stated, inter alia,—"The said Arthur Stewart Williamson left Scotland for Australia in 1857. He and the petitioner were partners in sheep transactions and in other business there, and were in constant personal intercourse and communication with each other down to the month of July 1865, when they parted at the Peak Downs Mines, in Northern Queensland, the said Arthur Stewart Williamson expressing his intention to proceed with horses overland direct to Sydney, and the petitioner proceeding to the same place by sea from Port Denison. The petitioner never saw or heard of the said Arthur Stewart Williamson again, nor has he ever since been heard of by any of his friends or relatives, although diligent inquiry was made for him at the time, and he has been advertised for both in Australian and New Zealand papers. He was about twenty-six years of age when he disappeared in 1865. . . . In the circumstances above mentioned a presumption arises from the facts that the said Arthur Stewart Williamson died in or about the month of July 1865, having been lost in the bush in the course of the journey on which he was setting out when the petitioner last saw him, or otherwise, for the purposes of the Presumption of Life Limitation (Scotland) Act, 1881, he must be presumed to have died not later than the month of July 1872.* The said Arthur Stewart Williamson having disappeared for a period of upwards of twenty years, and not having been heard of for twenty years, and having at the time of his disappearance been possessed of heritable estate in Scotland, the petitioner, as the person entitled to succeed to him in such heritable estate, presents this petition to your Lordships under the said Act."

Miss Mary Anne Williamson, her two sisters, and their brother, Dr Benjamin Williamson (who claimed their shares of the rents accumulated to the date of Arthur's death as his next of kin), lodged answers to

* Section 5 of the Presumption of Life Limitation Act, 1881, provides that "in the case of any person who has been absent from Scotland, or who has disappeared for a period of twenty years or upwards, and who has not been heard of for twenty years, and who at the time of his leaving or disappearance was possessed of or entitled to heritable estate in Scotland, or who has since become entitled to heritable estate there, it shall be competent to any person entitled to succeed to said absent person in such heritable estate to present a petition to the Court setting forth the said facts, and after proof of the said facts, and of the petitioner being entitled as aforesaid, and after such procedure and inquiry, by advertisement or otherwise, as the Court may direct, the Court may grant authority to the petitioner to make up a title to, enter into possession of, and enjoy and sell or dispose of the said heritable estate in the same manner as if the said absent person were dead."

Section 8 provides that "for the purposes of this Act in all cases where a person has left Scotland or has disappeared, and where no presumption arises from the facts that he died at any definite date, he shall be presumed to have died on the day which will complete a period of seven years from the time of his last being heard of at or after such leaving or disappearance."

No. 48.

Dec. 10, 1886.
Williamson v.
Williamson,
&c.

the petition, in which they stated,—“The respondents are the next of kin and representatives of deceased next of kin of Arthur Stewart Williamson (other than the petitioner), assuming him to have died at the expiry of seven years from the time of his last being heard of. The respondents admit generally the accuracy of the statements in the petition, except the statement that in the circumstances therein mentioned a presumption arises from the facts that the said Arthur Stewart Williamson died in or about the month of July 1865. The respondents aver that no presumption arises from the facts that the said Arthur Stewart Williamson died at any definite date, and consequently, that by virtue of the 8th section of ‘The Presumption of Life Limitation (Scotland) Act, 1881,’ it falls to be presumed that he died on the day which will complete a period of seven years from the time of his last being heard of, i.e., on some day in the month of July 1872.”

Proof was led on commission, from which it appeared that Arthur Williamson was well educated, and that after he left home in 1857, down to about 1863, he corresponded regularly with his relatives at home, with whom he was on good terms. When he and his brother parted on the Peak Downs in July 1865 he started for Sydney, via Brisbane, with a view to getting certain I O U's and cheques cashed. It was arranged that he should meet his brother, the petitioner, at Sydney. He started, riding one horse and leading another, the distance to Brisbane being about 500 miles across a very rough country. He was not a good bushman, and had no knowledge of the country through which he had to pass, and there were no roads through it. It was further proved that the “blacks were very bad” on the Bellyando River, which he had to pass, and that generally the state of the country was unsettled. No tidings of his having reached Brisbane or Sydney were ever got. The petitioner afterwards went to various places, but was not in Sydney till 1869. With regard to Arthur's correspondence with home, it was proved that it had ceased altogether two years before his disappearance, and that at about that date he had heard from home that no remittances would be sent to him for about two years, when the rents of his property would have accumulated.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—The general rule of the common law was that (within the limits of human life) a man was presumed to be alive until his death was proved, or until facts and circumstances were proved sufficient to raise a presumption that he died at some particular date. The object of the Act of 1881 was to limit the presumption of life, and the expediency of the statute has been very generally recognised, for the old law often kept property in neutral custody for so long a time as to deprive a generation from taking any benefit from a succession which had really opened up to them. The new statute says that after a lapse of a certain number of years a person who has disappeared shall be presumed to be dead. The periods vary under different circumstances, but all proceed on the same footing, viz., that, in the absence of any knowledge of a person being in life for the statutory period, he shall be deemed to be dead. But it was necessary to fix at what time the person is to be presumed to have actually died, for if he had not been heard of for twenty years it did not necessarily follow that he died twenty years ago, or last year, or a month ago, and therefore the Legislature found it absolutely necessary to fix some particular point at which the man is to be presumed to have died. Accordingly, it was fixed that where a person has been absent for twenty years without being heard of he shall be presumed to have died on the day which completed seven years since he was last heard of, or since he left or disappeared. That is a very reasonable provision, but the same section (the 8th) which raises that presumption also points to another, namely, that the Court may act on the presumption arising from the facts that the man died at some "definite date." Under these words "any definite date" this case arises. The petitioner says that it is proved that this man died in July 1865. Now, the presumption arising from the facts contemplated by the statute is, I think, such a presumption as would have been sufficient to overcome the presumption of life under the common law. Under the common law you might overcome the presumption of life by proving facts which raised a stronger presumption that the man died at or about some definite date. Now, is there evidence in the present case to raise such a presumption that this man died at any definite date? The conclusion we are asked to draw from the evidence is that he died in July 1865. He left Rockhampton for Brisbane and Sydney in that month, and undoubtedly the journey was a perilous one through a rough country; and nothing further was heard of him. He had valuable property in his possession, and it is not at all improbable that he was murdered on his journey, but that is not sufficient to raise the presumption I have spoken of; that is merely a general probability. We do not know for certain that the absentee did not arrive in Sydney—he was not known there, and indeed so little importance did his brother attach to not meeting him in Sydney, as arranged when they parted, that he does not seem to have made any special inquiries as to whether he had been seen in the town or district. Suppose that Arthur Williamson did reach Sydney in safety, and that, being unknown, he passed through it unobserved, he may have died elsewhere, and long after the date fixed by the petitioner.

¹ Authorities as to presumption of life at common law.—Rhind's Trustees v. Bell, Jan. 15, 1878, 5 R. 527, and cases there cited.

Such a case as this does not rest on a mere balancing of probabilities. We must be satisfied that he died on that journey, and I am therefore very clear that the facts proved are not sufficient to have overcome the presumption of life under the old law.

It may be said that this 8th section leaves us to say which is the most reasonable of the presumptions there mentioned,—the presumption arising from the facts or the statutory presumption. I think, however, that the statute gives the preference to the seven years or statutory presumption, unless there is such proof of death at a definite date as to overcome the presumption of the common law.

I do not attach any importance to the correspondence or want of correspondence in this case. The cessation of correspondence is often of importance in such cases, but here it had ceased two years before Arthur Williamson disappeared. We are further informed of one reason which may explain that discontinuance, viz., that it was not likely that he would succeed in getting any more money from home for some time, and that the obtaining remittances from home was his reason for keeping up the correspondence as long as he did.

On the whole matter I think we are bound to hold that the presumption is that this man died on the day corresponding to a period of seven years after he left Rockhampton.

LORD MURK concurred.

LORD SHAND.—Both parties here have appealed to sec. 8 of the statute. Now, before that statute became law there was at common law a very strong

No. 48.

Dec. 10, 1886.
Williamson v.
Williamson,
&c.

No. 48. presumption of life, and the Court rigorously exacted satisfactory proof to overcome that presumption even where the party had been unheard of for a long period, and it may be that in the light of that statute rather less rigorous evidence would now be held to be sufficient to overcome the presumption of life.

Dec. 10, 1886.
Williamson v.
Williamson,
&c.

However that may be, the true construction of the words "where no presumption arises from the fact that he died at any definite date," is, in my opinion, that the Court must be satisfied on the evidence that it has been by presumption established that death occurred at or near some definite time. A mere balancing of one date against another will not do, the presumption must amount to this, that the evidence has displaced the presumption of life. The words "at any definite date" do not, I think, tie the Court down to any definite day, week, or even month, for, for instance, where a vessel leaves one port for another, and never reaches its destination, it would be impossible in many cases to fix the death at any absolutely precise date, but the evidence must be sufficient to leave no doubt that the death occurred before the seven years had elapsed.

In the view your Lordship has taken of the facts I concur, and therefore I think the petitioner must take the benefit of the statutory presumption that this man died on that day which completed seven years since he was last heard of.

LORD ADAM.—The statute says that when a person has disappeared for twenty years, if there is no presumption arising from the facts that he died "at any definite date," he shall be presumed to have died seven years after he was last heard of.

In this case Arthur Williamson disappeared twenty years ago, and therefore the statute draws a presumption of death thirteen years ago, unless it is shewn that he died before that. The date here sought to be fixed as the date of death is July 1865. Now, I concur in what your Lordship has said as to the character of the evidence upon which an earlier date than the end of the seven years can be determined. It must be shewn beyond reasonable doubt that death occurred at that date. If that is shewn, then the presumption may be drawn, but it is a totally different thing to say that it is "more probable" that he died then than at any other time. It is, I think, "more probable" in this case that Williamson died in July 1865, than that he survived to get to Sydney and died sometime thereafter, but he may have reached his destination and died there, or merely passed through and died elsewhere—the very possibility of that excludes us from saying that there is any presumption of death at that date.

It is not necessary in this case to interpret precisely the words "at any definite time," but I think what may be sufficiently definite in one case may not be in another, and that the words will be interpreted with reference to the circumstances of each case as they arise.

On the whole matter I concur.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Grant authority to the petitioner to make up a title to, enter into possession of, and enjoy, receive, and discharge the consigned money of £6000 forming the surrogation of the heritable property of Arthur Seat, with the whole free accumulated rents of the said properties, and interests of the said sum from and after 31st July 1872, the date when Arthur Stewart Williamson is to be presumed to have died, in the same manner as if he were dead, and decern."

JAMES ROSS FARQUHARSON, Petitioner (Reclaimer).—C. N. Johnston.
 PATRICK BLAIR (A. H. Farquharson's Curator ad litem), Respondent.—
Sol.-Gen. Robertson—Blair.

No. 49.

Dec. 15, 1886.
 Farquharson
 v. Farquharson's Curator
ad litem.

*Entail—Disentail—Value of next heir's expectancy—"Proper security"—Entail Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. c. 61), sec. 5, subsec. 2 (b).—*Sec. 5, subsec. 2 (b) of the Entail Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1875, provides that, in the case of a disentail, the Court shall direct the value in money of the next heir's interest in the estate to be disentailed to be paid into bank in name of the heir, "or that proper security shall be given over the estate which is the subject of application for the amount so ascertained in favour of the heir."

Held that the "proper security" to be given must be such as a prudent lender would accept, and that, failing such security, the sum representing the value in question must be paid into bank.

Circumstances in which the Court held that "proper security" was not offered by the disentailing heir, and ordained the sum representing the value of the next heir's expectancy to be paid into bank.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL J. R. FARQUHARSON, heir of entail in possession of the entailed estate of Invercauld under an entail dated prior to 1st August 1848, presented a petition for disentail of a portion of the entailed estate under the Rutherford Act (11 and 12 Vict. c. 36), and the amending Acts of 1875 and 1882. The next heir, the petitioner's only son, Alexander Haldane Farquharson, a minor, to whom Mr Patrick Blair, W.S., had been appointed curator ad litem, declined to give his consent to the petition, and it became necessary, in terms of section 5 of the Entail Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1875, and sections 12 and 13 of the Entail (Scotland) Act, 1882, to ascertain the money value of the son's interest in the estate. Remits having been made for that purpose, the value of the lands proposed to be disentailed was reported to be £48,500, and of the heir's interest £21,930.

1st DIVISION.
 Lord Trayner.
 M.

The petitioner having proposed to secure the heir's interest by granting him a bond and disposition in security over the lands for the £21,930, the curator ad litem objected that the security was insufficient, and not a "proper security" under the Act of 1875,* nor such as a prudent lender would accept, there being a prior bond for younger children's provisions to the extent of £21,000 over the entailed estate, including the subjects which were being disentailed. The free rental of the latter was £787, 6s.

The petitioner subsequently by minute offered the additional security of another estate which was held by him in fee-simple, which was valued at £32,000, and burdened to the extent of £21,700.

The curator ad litem repeated his objections, and added that the free rental of the lands offered as additional security was £1196, the half of which was a fishing and shooting rental.

The Lord Ordinary (Trayner), on 24th November 1886, pronounced an interlocutor in which he, inter alia, ordained the petitioner to pay into bank the sum of £21,930 in name of the next heir.†

* Section 5, subsection 2 (b), of the Act 38 and 39 Vict. c. 61, provides that, upon the value of the heir's expectancy over the lands to be disentailed being ascertained, "the Court shall direct the sum so ascertained to be paid into bank in name of the heir or heirs, the value of whose expectancy or interest has been ascertained as aforesaid, or that proper security shall be given over the estate which is the subject of application for the amount so ascertained in favour of the heir or heirs aforesaid."

† "OPINION.—(After quoting subsection 2 (b) of the 5th section of the Act

No. 49.

Dec. 15, 1886.
 Farquharson
 v. Farquharson's Curator
ad litem.

The petitioner reclaimed, and argued that under the 5th section of the statute above quoted the petitioner could not be asked to give more than 38 and 39 Vict. c. 61)—The purpose and intention of that provision is apparent. The Court is to see that the heir's expectancy is secured to him before the lands shall be disentailed, and that either by the value of that expectancy being deposited in bank, or properly secured over the lands themselves. It is said that the latter condition will be fulfilled if a formal and valid bond and disposition in security is granted over the lands in question; and I agree with that, if the lands afford sufficient security for the amount of the expectancy. But I demur to the view that, in all circumstances, an heir of entail in possession is entitled to have lands disentailed simply in return for such a bond. If the lands do not afford sufficient security for the expectancy, the purpose of the statute would not be accomplished merely by granting a bond over them. The words 'proper security' do not, in my opinion, refer primarily to the nature or character of the writ by which the security is constituted. That writ may, in a technical and conveyancing sense, be a proper security, and yet, as regards the next heir, be no security at all, or very inadequate security. In my view, 'proper security' means adequate or sufficient security—security to the heir which is as good as money. In the ordinary case the lands to be disentailed will afford such adequate security, because the expectancy being calculated on the ascertained value of the lands, and being of necessity less than the value of the lands, the lands will afford security for a sum less considerably than they are worth. But it may be otherwise, and accordingly if the Court is not satisfied with the security of the lands, it may order consignment of the value of the expectancy in bank. The question therefore is, whether the lands now sought to be disentailed afford proper—that is, adequate—security for the amount of the heir's expectancy. The curator says they do not, and the reporter to whom the petition was remitted agrees with him. I think they are right. The lands are worth £48,500, but, burdened with a first bond for £21,000, they are only worth £27,500 as security to the next heir. Now, no prudent lender will give a loan to the extent of £21,930 (the amount of the heir's expectancy) on a subject worth £27,500, even on a first bond, much less on a postponed security. There are other reasons against the security in respect of the rental, but on this matter I refer to the objections stated by the curator.

"It is right, however, to notice that the £21,000 bond already existing is one which affects not only the lands in question, but also the whole entailed estate, and it is said by the petitioner that if the creditors in that bond were to do diligence upon it and operate payment out of the disentailed lands, the next heir would have his relief against the other lands. I feel the force of this; but it appears to me to be the duty of the Court, imposed upon it by statute, to give the next heir, in such a case as this, an actual and adequate security, which he can make immediately available, if necessary, for the amount ascertained to be due to him. He is not to be paid, in whole or in part, by a right of relief. Even if such a right of relief were regarded as a security, it would not be the security provided by the statute. It would not be a security over the lands disentailed, but over other and different lands.

"I regard the next heir as a creditor for the amount of his expectancy, who cannot be compelled to take as a security therefor subjects upon which no prudent lender would advance on loan the amount of that expectancy.

"At the discussion before me, I suggested that the petitioner should endeavour to satisfy the curator ad litem by the offer of some security additional to the lands to be disentailed. Acting upon that suggestion, the petitioner has offered the farther security of the lands of Auchallater. But I agree with the curator that the offer made does not afford any additional security, or at least such as the curator should accept. The lands of Auchallater (as valued in 1884) are said to be worth £32,000. They are already burdened to the extent of £21,700, and are therefore burdened to the full amount (two-thirds of their value) which any prudent lender would advance. Besides, I cannot compel the curator to accept any such additional security if he is unwilling to accept it.

the best security which the subjects which were being disentailed would yield. But apart from that, the security offered was ample. The £21,000 debt was spread over the whole estate of Invercauld, and the additional security of the lands held in fee-simple was in any case sufficient.

The respondent was not called on.

No. 49.
—
Dec. 15, 1886.
Farquharson
v. Farquharson's Curator
ad litem.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I do not entertain any doubt that the Lord Ordinary is right in the view he has taken. The ground of judgment cannot be better stated than in the words which his Lordship has used,—“I regard the next heir as a creditor in the amount of his expectancy, who cannot be compelled to take as a security therefor subjects upon which no prudent lender would advance on loan the amount of that expectancy.” This seems to me to be conclusive against the claimer's contention.

It is only necessary to notice further the supplementary security which has been offered. But, again, the Lord Ordinary's answer is quite conclusive. He says that these additional lands “are already burdened to the extent of £21,700, and are therefore burdened to the full amount (two-thirds of their value) which any prudent lender would advance.” In short, the supplementary security offered is just another example of a security on which no prudent lender would give a loan. It will therefore be necessary that the sum at which the heir's interest has been valued be paid into bank.

LORD MURE, LORD SHAND, and LORD ADAM concurred.

THE COURT refused the reclaiming note.

TODD, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—HUNTER, BLAIR, & COWAN, W.S.—Agents.

KEDDIE, GORDON, & COMPANY, Pursuers (Appellants).—D.-F. Mackintosh No. 50.
—MacLennan.

NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders (Respondents).—
Balfour—C. S. Dickson.

Dec. 15, 1886.
Keddie, Gordon,
& Co. v.
North British
Railway Co.

Carrier—Conveyance of goods—Reparation—Consequential damages.—A manufacturer forwarded a bale of cloth by rail, consigned to a shipping agent at Grimsby, who was to ship it for Germany. On arrival at Grimsby the package was found to be frayed, and some slight damage done to the cloth. The shipping agent refused to take delivery, being of opinion that the goods could not be safely forwarded in their damaged package. The railway company thereupon returned them to the manufacturer, who re-packed them, and forwarded them to Germany. On arrival there they were rejected as being too late. The manufacturer having sued the railway company for damages for loss of market, held that the shipping agent was entitled to refuse to take delivery, and that the loss of market was the direct result of the damage done to the package by the railway company, who were therefore liable for it.

On 16th January 1884 Keddie, Gordon, & Company, tweed manufacturers at Galashiels, delivered a bale of cloth to the North British Railway Company, to be forwarded to Messrs John Sutcliffe & Son, shipping and forwarding agents at Grimsby, to be sent on by them to Messrs Oppenheimer & Grabowsky in Berlin. A letter of advice was forwarded

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Roxburgh and Selkirk.
M.

By the statute the Court has only two courses open to it—(1) to order consignation in bank of the amount of the expectancy, or (2) to see that expectancy properly secured over the lands to be disentailed. As I think that the lands to be disentailed do not afford ‘proper security’ for the amount of the heir's expectancy, I have ordered the amount to be paid into bank.”

No. 50.

Dec. 15, 1886.
Keddie, Gordon,
& Co. v.
North British
Railway Co.

to Sutcliffe & Son, bearing "Please forward this bale with all speed, as it is urgently wanted." The bale was packed in a threefold wrapper, two of jute and one of oilcloth, and was stamped with the letters O. & G. B. within a lozenge, indicating that the goods were to be shipped to Oppenheimer & Grabowsky. The goods were made to a special order of these merchants, the price being £62, 1s. The order was a "repeat" order, and the goods were urgently wanted. The North British Railway Company forwarded the bale over their own and other lines of railway to Grimsby, where it arrived on the 19th January, and was tendered to Sutcliffe & Son for shipment to Hamburg. Sutcliffe's clerk, who was checking the goods for shipment, saw that the wrappings of the bale had been chafed through and the cloth damaged. He was of opinion that it was too much damaged to be shipped, and refused to allow it to go on board.

On this Sutcliffe & Son on the same day wrote to the agent of the railway company at Grimsby,—Bale from Galashiels "delivered by you in a damaged state. We must therefore refuse to accept the bale, and request you to return it to senders for repairs. Should any claim arise we shall hold you responsible." The railway company took back the bale, and returned it to Keddie, Gordon, & Co. It was sent off from Grimsby on the 21st, and reached Galashiels on the 25th. Keddie, Gordon, & Company found that the cloth was very slightly damaged, so that they were able to re-pack it at once, and on the day of its arrival despatch it anew to Grimsby, where it arrived again on 29th January. On 4th February Oppenheimer & Grabowsky, who had not received the bale by that time, wrote to Keddie, Gordon, & Company that they would not now take delivery of it. When it did arrive they tried to sell it, but failing to do so they returned it on 21st February to Keddie, Gordon, & Company, who sold it for £29, 14s. 9d.

Keddie, Gordon, & Company, in January 1886, raised an action against the railway company for £36, 1s. 2d., being the difference between the invoice price and the price actually received, along with certain expenses.

The pursuers pleaded the fault of the defenders.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia ;—(4) Any loss sustained by the pursuers being purely consequential, the defenders are not liable therefor.

A proof was allowed, from which the facts above narrated appeared, and were not disputed. The question came to be whether Sutcliffe should have sent on the goods or sent them back as he did. He gave evidence as to his practice to the effect that when goods arrived in a damaged condition from a point beyond the system of the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway he sent them back. He was agent for that railway company, and the Hamburg steamers belonged to them. When they came from a point on that system he had the damage surveyed, and if a claim arose it was settled by the company's agent in Hamburg. Mr Sutcliffe stated that he shipped about seven-tenths of the cloth that went from this country to North Germany. He and his father had been in business in Grimsby for twenty-four years.

Mr Reed, the company's agent at Grimsby, deponed,—“I don't believe there is any universal custom. Each firm have practices of their own. In cases of slight damage, Messrs Sutcliffe would take a letter from us indemnifying them against any claim. . . . Cross-examined.— . . . It is in the interests of the railway company that damaged goods should be returned rather than forwarded to their intended destination, because when they have got abroad the company would have no means of checking any claim for damage which might arise; I mean except in cases of slight damage. Speaking from memory, I should say a letter of indemnity was not given by me on behalf of the company to Messrs Sutcliffe & Son in this case, nor offered." No. 50.

The Sheriff-substitute (Spittal), on 18th May, after findings in fact, found in law "that through the fault of the defenders, or those for whom they are responsible, the goods in question failed to reach Messrs Oppenheimer & Grabowsky in due time, and were justifiably rejected by them, whereby the pursuers suffered loss to the amount of £36, 1s. 2d.: Decerns against the defenders for the said sum of £36, 1s. 2d. sterling," &c.¹

Dec. 15, 1886.
Keddie, Gordon, & Co. v.
North British
Railway Co.

On 29th June the Sheriff (Jameson) recalled his Substitute's interlocutor, and, after findings in fact, found in law "that the loss sustained by the pursuers, in consequence of the said goods not having been timeously delivered to Messrs Oppenheimer & Grabowsky, is not a loss for which the defenders are liable to make reparation to the pursuers: Therefore refuses the prayer of the petition, and assoilzies the defenders," &c.*

The pursuers appealed, and argued;—A carrier was always entitled to refuse to take goods which were badly packed, and not fit to travel.¹ He was not entitled to open the package and examine it.² Sutcliffe was a carrier, and the company was bound to deliver the goods to him in good travelling condition. The goods were then properly sent back, therefore the delay was due to the damage done by the defenders, and the loss of market was due to the delay. There was nothing extraordinary in the despatch required, and no extraordinary measure of damages was asked. The loss was just the loss of the market price, and the amount of despatch required of the company was just the ordinary course of delivery.³

The defenders argued;—The fault here was Sutcliffe's fault, for the damage done was not done to the goods, nor was it serious enough to warrant Sutcliffe sending the goods back. He should have renewed the packing and sent it on. But, in any event, the company were not liable for the loss occasioned by the delay, a loss that was dependent on a special contract between the parties, of which they had no notice.⁴ If any liability

* "NOTE— The defenders, as practically insurers of the goods carried by them, are undoubtedly liable to make good any actual damage done to goods during transit over their own line, or the lines of companies for whom they are responsible, the measure thereof being the diminished value of the goods. But in the present case that damage was trifling, and it is not claimed in this action. In certain circumstances carriers may be liable for more remote consequences of their breach of contract, provided such consequences are the direct, necessary, or natural result of the breach. Now, I cannot hold that the sending back the bale to Galashiels was the direct, necessary, or natural consequence of the damage sustained during the carriage of the goods from Galashiels to Grimsby; and it is further to be observed that the defenders got no information from the pursuers as to the ultimate destination of the goods, or as to the purpose for which they were sold, nor were they told that there was any necessity for special despatch. All the defenders contracted to do was to carry the goods to Grimsby and deliver them there, and this they did with due despatch. This being so, I think that it must be held that the damage caused by the rejection of the goods on account of delay in their reaching Berlin could not have been in the contemplation of both parties at the time the contract was entered into, and was, as regards the defenders, remote and consequential, and therefore cannot be recovered from them. The loss which the pursuers have unfortunately sustained is, in my view, the direct result of the wholly unnecessary actings of J. Sutcliffe & Son, for whom the defenders are not responsible."

¹ Cox v. London and N.-W. Ry. Co., 1862, 3 Foster and Finlason, 77.

² Crouch v. London and N.-W. Ry. Co., 1854, 14 Scott's Common Bench Rep. 255.

³ Collard v. S.-E. Ry. Co., May 24, 1861, 30 L. J. Ex. 393.

⁴ Hadley v. Baxendale, 1854, L. R., 9 Ex. 341, Smith's L. C. ii. 570.

No. 50.
—
Dec. 15, 1886.
Keddle, Gordon, & Co. v.
North British
Railway Co.

for special loss was sought to be imposed on the company, they must be shewn to be in knowledge of the special contract.¹ Otherwise, the loss was too remote and consequential to be recovered from the defenders, for the ordinary liability of the company was only for ordinary despatch.²

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The discussion in this case raised incidentally and collaterally some questions of interest, but the real matter we have to decide lies within a very narrow compass of facts. This parcel of goods was forwarded by manufacturers in Galashiels. It was put into the charge of the North British Railway Company, by them it was transferred to an English railway company, who forwarded it to Grimsby, where it was taken possession of by Sutcliffe, a shipping agent. He found that the package was frayed, and the goods it contained partly exposed, and in some measure damaged, and thought that it was in a condition in which it was not suitable for further transmission. On that Sutcliffe refuses to accept the goods for further transit, and sends them back to the railway company to be sent back to the manufacturers.

The bale was sent back, and was repacked in Galashiels and sent on again to Grimsby. It was then shipped and delivered in Berlin, but it arrived too late for the only purpose for which the buyer had ordered it. It is returned upon the manufacturer's hands and sold at a loss by him.

Then comes this action against the North British Railway Company. The pursuers think, and think rightly, that the whole ultimate consequences are the result of the damage done by the railway company. The company say that they are not liable for the consequences of the injury. Sutcliffe, they say, should have sent the goods on, the damage was trifling, and if he had done so, the amount of loss to the manufacturer would have been quite inconsiderable. They say further, that the damage which has been suffered was remote, arising as it did from a stipulation between the manufacturer and the buyer in Berlin as to the time of delivery, and the fact that the market was lost from the delay is not a fact for which they can be responsible.

These are, I think, the main contentions for the defenders, and I can dispose of them very shortly. In the first place the North British Railway Company were bound to deliver the goods to Sutcliffe in good travelling condition. They did not do that. Who was responsible for the next step? Sutcliffe was entitled, thinking as he did that the goods were not in safety to travel further, to reject them. It is said that he should have undone the package and repaired it and the goods. I do not think he had any right to do that, and it is clear that he was not bound to do it. He thought it was better to return them to the manufacturer for that purpose. It is said, no doubt, that Reed thought the goods should have been sent on. He says so, no doubt, but he also says that he would have taken a letter of indemnity from the railway company. If he thought that necessary it shews that he did not consider that it was within the scope of the shipper's ordinary duty to forward them.

Now, is the loss which resulted from the goods not arriving in Berlin in time a loss which falls upon the railway company? I think that it is directly the result of the goods not having been carried by the railway company in safety to Grimsby. I think it is a direct result, and the damage is in no way consequential, and therefore I am unable to agree with the Sheriff in the view he takes. He says,—“I think that it must be held that the damage caused by the rejection of the goods on account of delay in their reaching Berlin could not have been in the contemplation of both parties at the time the contract was entered into, and was, as regards the defenders, remote and consequential, and therefore cannot be recovered from them. The loss which the pursuers have unfortunately sustained is, in my view, the direct result of the wholly unnecessary actings of J. Sutcliffe & Son, for whom the defenders are not responsible.” I do not in the least sympathise with that view. I think that Sutcliffe & Son did what was right. I think there is nothing consequential in the damage that was sustained, but that in that damage there was nothing beyond the direct connection of cause and effect. I propose that your Lordships should recall the judgment of the Sheriff and give decree for the amount of the damage claimed by the pursuers.

¹ British Columbia Saw Mill Co. v. Nettleship, 1868, L. R., 3 C. P. 508; Horne v. Midland Ry. Co., 1873, L. R., 8 C. P. 131.

² Finlay v. N. B. Ry. Co., July 8, 1870, 8 Macph. 959, 42 Scot. Jur. 552.

No. 50.

Dec. 15, 1886.
Keddie, Gordon, & Co. v. North British Railway Co.

LORD YOUNG.—I concur with your Lordship. This question, and this question only is, as I think, presented for our consideration, viz., Was Sutcliffe entitled to reject the goods? Was this shipping-agent, who is bound to forward goods delivered to him in proper condition for forwarding, bound to forward these goods? I think they were not in proper condition for forwarding, and so I am of opinion that Sutcliffe had a sufficient cause for returning the bale. I asked if there was any authority or principle binding one carrier to take from another goods in this condition, and I was told that there was none. Mr Sutcliffe, from his experience and position, is the very best person to refer to upon a question of whether goods are fit to be sent on. He thought these were not. He communes with Mr Reed, and the consequence is that Mr Reed has them sent back.

To say, in these circumstances, that Mr Sutcliffe is to blame is to maintain what I can see no good ground for at all. I say here, as I said in the course of the argument, that if Sutcliffe exercised an honest judgment in the matter, and if delay were caused by his action, the railway company will be responsible for the damage arising from that delay, even if Sutcliffe's judgment were shewn to be erroneous. For if the pursuers suffered damage because the goods were injured and so delayed, they must have a remedy against somebody. Where one is in fault he is answerable for the consequences of that fault, even although these consequences might have been prevented by another person exercising his judgment in a different way from what he in fact did. Even criminal responsibility will attach to the original wrongdoer in such a case.

But the circumstances here do not raise any such case, for, in my opinion, Sutcliffe exercised a right judgment, and if the railway company, who were consulted, thought the goods ought to be sent back, they must take the consequences. If they thought differently they might have remonstrated, but they did not.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I concur in the judgment proposed, but I confess I have had some difficulty upon one of the points in the case. If Sutcliffe had rejected the goods at once, I could not have hesitated as to the liability of the railway company. But he did not do so. He held on to them for two days, and then gave orders that they should be returned to the manufacturers. That creates some doubt in my mind, but my doubt is not sufficient to lead me to dissent from the judgment your Lordship proposes.

No. 50. LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

Dec. 15, 1884.
Keddie, Gordon, & Co. v.
North British
Railway Co.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find in fact (1) that, on 16th January 1884, the pursuers delivered to the defenders at Galashiels a bale of goods to be carried to Grimsby, and delivered there to Messrs John Sutcliffe & Son, shippers and forwarding agents, and transmitted by them to Messrs Oppenheimer & Grabowsky, Berlin, the consignees of the goods, to whom they were invoiced, at the price of £62; (2) that the said bale was in good condition when delivered to the defenders, but when tendered to Messrs Sutcliffe & Son was damaged, and was in consequence immediately returned to the pursuers, who received it on 25th January, and, after repacking it, despatched it on the same day to Messrs Sutcliffe & Son; (3) that, on receiving the bale, Sutcliffe & Son forwarded it to Messrs Oppenheimer & Grabowsky, but on 4th February, and before the bale reached them, they intimated to the pursuers that they declined to receive the goods, as their market had been lost by the delay in sending them to Berlin; (4) that the bale was returned accordingly to the pursuers, who, by arrangement with the defenders, sold its contents at the price of £29, 14s. 9d.; (5) that, including charges for insurance and carriage, and interest, the loss sustained by the pursuers on the invoiced price of the said goods amounted at the date of this action to £36, 1s. 2d.: Find in law that Messrs Sutcliffe & Son were entitled to refuse to forward the bale in its damaged condition, and were entitled to return it; that Messrs Oppenheimer & Grabowsky were justified in rejecting the goods because of the delay in forwarding them; and that the defenders are responsible for the loss thereby sustained by the pursuers: Therefore sustain the appeal: Recall the judgment of the Sheriff appealed against, and affirm the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute: Of new ordain the defenders to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £36, 1s. 2d., with the legal interest thereon," &c.

LITTLE & LAWSON, S.S.C.—MILLAR, ROBSON, & INNES, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 51.

Dec. 15, 1886.
Dodsworth v.
Rijnbergen,
&c.

JEREMIAH DODSWORTH (Superintendent of Customs at Lerwick), Complainer (Respondent).—Lord-Adv. Macdonald—Kennedy.
JAN JAN RIJNBERGEN AND OTHERS, Appellants (Reclaimers).—
Pearson—Galloway.

Revenue—Customs—Prosecution of foreigners for importing contraband goods—Customs Consolidation Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. c. 36), sec. 179—Proof—Evidence of accused.—Certain foreigners were convicted and sentenced before the Justice of Peace Court, upon a complaint under the 179th section of the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876,* charging them with having on board a

* That section enacts,—"If any ship or boat shall be found or discovered to have been within any port, bay, harbour, river, or creek of the United Kingdom, or the Channel Islands, or within three leagues of the coast thereof, if belonging wholly or in part to British subjects, or having the persons on board subjects of Her Majesty, or within one league if not British . . . having on board or in any manner attached thereto, or conveying or having conveyed in any manner, any spirits, tobacco, or snuff, in packages of any size and character in which they are prohibited to be imported into the United Kingdom, or the Channel Islands, or any spirits, or tobacco, or snuff, imported contrary to the Customs Acts . . . or which shall be found or discovered to have been foreign ship, within one league of the British coast, packages of spirits, tobacco, &c. of a size and character which are prohibited to be imported. No. 51.

In an appeal against the conviction, held that the Judge in the inferior Court had rightly declined to admit the evidence of the accused, section 259 * of the Customs Law Consolidation Act, 1876, which admits such evidence in certain circumstances, not being applicable to the case. Dec. 15, 1886.
Dodsworth v.
Rijnbergen,
&c.

Held further, that it was not a good objection to the conviction that the evidence had not been recorded by the Judge in the inferior Court, the accused not having asked him to do so.

ON 21st August 1886 an amended complaint,† under the Summary Procedure Acts, 1864 and 1881, was presented to Her Majesty's Justices of the Peace for the county of Zetland by Jeremiah Dodsworth, Superintendent of Customs at the Port of Lerwick, against Jan Jan Rijnbergen, master, and four of the crew of the vessel "Merchant," of Schiedam, then lying in Lerwick harbour, who were charged with an offence within the meaning of "The Customs Consolidation Act, 1876," and particularly section 179 thereof, in so far as they, "upon the 12th day of August current, or about that time, being foreigners, were found on board a foreign ship within one league of the coast of the United Kingdom, said ship being named the 'Merchant,' of Schiedam, and being then within the limits of the port of Lerwick, at or near a point in a north-easterly direction or thereby from Sumburgh Head, said point being within a distance seaward of three miles from low-water mark from the shore of the nearest part of the mainland of Shetland, and the said ship being at the time liable to forfeiture, in respect of being thus found within the limits of the port of Lerwick as aforesaid, and then having on board a number of packages of spirits, tobacco, and cigars, of a size and character in which they are prohibited to be imported into the United Kingdom, said packages of spirits being less in size and character than twenty gallons each, and said packages of tobacco and cigars being less than eighty pounds weight each respectively, and the said port of Lerwick not being a port approved by the Commissioners of Customs for the importation and warehousing of tobacco and cigars," whereby they were severally liable to forfeit a sum not exceeding £100, and, in default of payment thereof, to be imprisoned for a period not exceeding six months. Exchequer Cause.
1st Division.
Lord Fraser.
M.

On 30th August following the accused were tried at Lerwick before within three leagues of any part of the coast of the United Kingdom . . . every such ship or boat, together with any such spirits, &c. . . shall be forfeited; and every person who shall be found or discovered to have been on board any ship or boat, liable to forfeiture as aforesaid, within three leagues of the coast if a British subject, or within one league if a foreigner . . . having on board any spirits, or tobacco, in such packages as aforesaid, shall forfeit a sum not exceeding £100; and every such person may be detained and taken before any Justice to be dealt with as hereinafter directed."

* Section 259 enacts,—“If, in any prosecution . . . any dispute shall arise whether the duties of Customs have been paid in respect of such goods, or whether the same have been lawfully imported or lawfully unshipped, or concerning the place from whence such goods were brought, then, and in every such case, the proof thereof shall be on the defendant in such prosecution, and where any such proceedings are had in the Exchequer Division of the High Court of Justice on the Revenue side, the defendant shall be competent and compellable to give evidence.”

† The original complaint had been objected to by the respondents' agent on the ground of want of specification, and the Justice having intimated that he was of opinion that the objection was well founded, it was amended, the respondents' agent having consented to that being done.

No. 51. Sheriff Cheyne, one of the Justices of the Peace for Zetland. Objections to the competency of the amendment of the complaint in respect that, as originally framed, it was radically bad, and also to its relevancy, were repelled, the former on the ground that the respondents' agent had consented to the amendment, with the view of saving delay and expense. The accused were thereafter convicted of the offence charged as libelled, and the master was ordained to forfeit £50, or suffer sixty days' imprisonment, and each of the crew to forfeit £10, or suffer ten days' imprisonment.

Dec. 15, 1886.
Dodsworth v.
Rijnbergen,
&c.

The accused appealed to the Court of Exchequer, under the 17th section of the Court of Exchequer (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 56).

The grounds of appeal are set forth, infra,* in the note to the inter-

* "NOTE.— . . . 1st, It is maintained that the complaint, as originally presented, was not relevant in respect that it was defective in specification of particulars. This objection was stated to the Justice of the Peace, and the minutes of Court bear that 'the Justice having intimated that he was of opinion that the objection was well founded, Mr Anderson (the solicitor for the prosecutor), with a view to obviate the objection, craved leave to amend the complaint,' by deleting certain portions of it, and inserting new matter. 'Mr Galloway, on behalf of the respondents, consented to the proposed amendments being made, and the Justice accordingly sanctioned their being made, and appointed them to be authenticated by the Clerk of Court in common form.' The objection has been renewed before the Lord Ordinary, while, at the same time, it is admitted that the amended complaint cannot be challenged for want of specification. It is argued, however, that the amendments were incompetent as changing altogether the character of the complaint. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that it was competent so to amend it; but, farther, that it is not allowable now, after the amendments were consented to, to renew the objection.

"2d. The next ground of appeal is that the captain of the vessel, Jan Jan Rijnbergen, tendered himself as a witness, and the Justice refused to allow his evidence to be taken. This being a proceeding for a penalty, it was incompetent (unless there be some statutory enactment allowing it), to allow the accused in such a proceeding to be adduced as a witness (Bruce v. Linton, 13th December 1861, 24 D. 184; Alison v. Watson, 2d December 1862, 1 Macph. 87; Blair v. Mitchell, 9th July 1864, 4 Irvine, 545). But it is said that, by 'The Customs Consolidation Act, 1876,' section 259, persons accused, like the appellants, are made competent, and are compellable to be witnesses. That section does not apply to the present case. It is only in any prosecution where a dispute shall arise as to whether the duties of customs have been paid, or whether the goods have been lawfully imported or lawfully unshipped, or concerning the place from whence they have been brought, that the accused's evidence may be taken. There is no dispute here about any of these matters. The present case only concerns the having on board, at a prohibited place, certain goods of a character forbidden to be imported into the United Kingdom.

"3d. It is next objected to the conviction that the evidence was not recorded by the Justice of Peace. The prosecution is one under the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, the 16th section of which enacts that 'It shall not be necessary, in any proceeding under the authority of this Act, to record or to preserve a note of the evidence adduced.' But the answer to this section, made by the appellants, is that, where a special statute directs that a note of the evidence shall be preserved, the section of the Summary Procedure Act does not take away the right thereby conferred upon the parties, even although the prosecution is expressly brought under the Summary Procedure Act, and reference is made to the case of Halliday v. Bathgate, 1st June 1867, 5 Irvine, 382. Unfortunately for the appellants, there is no provision in the Customs Consolidation Act directing a note of evidence to be taken. It is said, however, that the 243d locutor of the Lord Ordinary (Fraser), who on 6th November dismissed the appeal, and found the appellants liable in expenses, which he modified to four guineas. No. 51.

Dec. 15, 1886.
Dodsworth v.
Rijnbergen,
&c.

The appellants reclaimed. Their argument sufficiently appears from the note to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

The respondent was not called on.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I do not think it is necessary to call upon the Crown to answer the objections which have been stated. They have been well disposed of by the Lord Ordinary.

section of that Act shews that a writ of certiorari can issue to bring up the proceedings to the Supreme Court, upon complying with the conditions set forth in that section. This provision was in the previous statute, which was in operation when the Court of Exchequer Act passed, viz., 16 and 17 Vict. cap. 107, sec. 290. The writ of certiorari can no longer be issued from a Scottish Court, for, by the 17th section of the Exchequer (Scotland) Act, 1856, it is enacted that 'In all cases where, at the date of the passing of this Act, a writ of habeas or a writ of certiorari might have competently issued from the Court of Exchequer, to the effect of removing any proceedings before, or warrant granted or issued by any inferior Court or magistrate, or public officer to the said Court of Exchequer, in order to examination, it shall be competent to the party against whom such warrant is directed, or to either of the parties to such proceedings, to bring up such warrant or proceedings to the Court of Session, sitting as the Court of Exchequer, to the like effect as by such writ of habeas or writ of certiorari before the passing of this Act, and that by lodging in the office of the Clerk of Court attached to the Lord Ordinary in Exchequer causes a note of appeal.' The Lord Ordinary has no means of ascertaining under what circumstances a writ of certiorari could be issued by the old Scottish Court of Exchequer, prior to the Exchequer Act of 1856. There are no books from which such information can be obtained. This, however, is of little consequence, because the Statute 6 Anne, cap. 26, sec. 6, enacts 'that the said Court of Exchequer in Scotland shall, and may act, do, and proceed therein and thereupon in every respect whatsoever, as by law, or as the Court of Exchequer in England, by the constitution, course or practice of or in the said Court, hath been, or is enabled, or hath used or practised to do in the like cases in England; and upon, and in all such informations, actions, suits, or demands, or touching or concerning any the premisses, or any the proceedings thereupon, shall and may make all such orders and rules, and direct, award, and issue all such writs, precepts, process, and methods of proceedings, as hath or have been, is, are or may be done or practised in the same or like cases in the Court of Exchequer in England.' Now, then, what is competent under a writ of certiorari according to the practice and law of England? It is thus stated by Mr Archbold in his Treatise on the Justice of the Peace, vol. i., p. 195, 'Summary convictions by magistrates may be removed by certiorari into the Court of Queen's Bench for the purpose of moving that Court to quash them for errors appearing upon the face of them. (R. v. Liston, 5 T. R., 338.) In this respect the certiorari is in the nature of a writ of error, except that a special application must be made to the Court or a Judge for it; and they will not grant the writ until they are first satisfied that the alleged defect appears upon the face of the conviction. (R. v. Cashiobury, J. J., 3 D. and R. 35.) It is no ground for a certiorari that the Justices came to a wrong conclusion on evidence (R. v. Bolton, 1 Q. B. 66; Anon. 1 B. and Ad. 382).' Consequently, the result of this is that, if the Supreme Court cannot review the decision of the Justices of the Peace on the merits, there was no object whatever in recording the evidence, nor any obligation on the Justice to do so, nor right on the part of the accused to demand that it should be done; and so the present case does not come within the decision in Halliday v. Bathgate.

"The result is that all of the objections to the conviction and sentence being groundless, the appeal must be dismissed, with expenses."

No. 51.

Dec. 15, 1886.
Dodaworth v.
Rijnbergen,
&c.

As regards the first, the accused parties are barred from raising any objection to the amendments which were made upon the complaint,—because they gave their consent to them. Objections were taken that the original complaint was absolutely worthless, and had no substance in it, and amendments were accordingly made upon it by consent of parties, in order to save time and trouble, a most legitimate reason. It would be out of the question to allow the accused to come here now and raise objections which they have already waived.

The second ground of objection, which is founded upon the 259th section of the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876, appears to me to be perfectly well disposed of by the Lord Ordinary. His Lordship says,—“That section does not apply to the present case. It is only in any prosecution where a dispute shall arise as to whether the duties of customs have been paid, or whether the goods have been lawfully imported or lawfully unshipped, or concerning the place from whence they have been brought, that the accused’s evidence may be taken.” And he adds that there is no dispute about any of these matters. And it is plain that there is none. It is said that the goods in question were lawfully on board the vessel; and that there has thus been no contravention of the statute. But the matter of fact is quite clear. The question was, whether this vessel was within a distance of three miles seaward from low-water mark of the shore of Shetland, and had on board packages of goods which were unlawful, and whether the accused were the persons who were on board. The goods were neither imported nor unshipped, except subsequently to the forfeiture. So that that objection fails.

The third objection is that the evidence in the case was not recorded by the Justice of Peace. But the Justice was not bound to record it unless he was specially asked to do so. Whether he would have been bound to do so if he had been asked, it is not necessary to discuss here. It is enough that he was not bound to do so, either under the Summary Procedure Acts, or under the Customs Act of 1876, unless when specially asked.

On the whole matter, I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary’s interlocutor.

LORD MURE, LORD SHAND, and LORD ADAM concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—“Recall the said interlocutor in so far as it finds the appellants liable in expenses, and modifies the same to four guineas: Quoad ultra adhere to the interlocutor, and find the respondents entitled to expenses, both in the Outer and Inner-House, and decern.”

ROBERT PRINGLE, Solicitor of Customs—JAMES SKINNER, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 52. THE MONKLAND IRON COMPANY, LIMITED, AND LIQUIDATOR, Petitioners.—
Asher—M’Nair.

Dec. 16, 1886.
Monkland
Iron Co.
Limited, v.
Dun, &c.

THOMAS DUN AND OTHERS, Respondents.—Balfour—R. V. Campbell.

*Company—Winding-up—Application for supervision order—Relevancy of answer—Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 89), sec. 129, subsec. (3).—*At an extraordinary meeting of a limited company resolutions were carried by the statutory majority to the effect (1) that it had been proved to the satisfaction of the company that it could not, by reason of its liabilities, continue its business, and that it was advisable to wind it up; and (2) that the company should be wound up voluntarily. A petition to have the winding-up brought under the supervision of the Court having been presented, certain shareholders lodged answers objecting to the winding-up, on the ground (1) that the adoption of the resolution in question had been arranged as part of a scheme by certain shareholders to acquire the company estate for their own purposes; and (2) that the company was not unable to carry on its business. Held that these were not relevant answers to the petition, and supervision order granted.

No. 52.

Dec. 16, 1886.
Monkland
Iron Co.
Limited, v.
Dun, &c.

Company—Winding-up—Liquidator—Objection to appointment—Relevancy.—Question, whether averments that a liquidator appointed by a majority of shareholders at a statutory meeting at which a resolution to wind up had been carried was “conjunct and confident” with certain persons who had promoted the winding-up with a view to securing the property on their own terms, were relevant averments to justify the Court in removing him “on due cause shewn” in terms of the 141st section of the Companies Act, 1862.*

Company—Winding-up—Petition for supervision order by the Court—Confirmation of liquidator’s appointment.—It is not proper in a petition for placing a winding-up under supervision of the Court to pray for confirmation of an appointment of a liquidator.

At an extraordinary general meeting of the shareholders of the Monkland Iron Company, Limited, held in Glasgow on 23d November 1886, resolutions were passed by a majority of not less than three-fourths to the effect (1) that it had been proved to the satisfaction of the company that it could not by reason of its liabilities continue its business, and that it was advisable to wind it up; and (2) that the company should be wound up voluntarily. Further resolutions were carried (1) appointing Mr Laurence Hill Watson, C.A., to be liquidator, and (2) empowering him to apply to the Court if and when he found it expedient to have the voluntary liquidation continued subject to the supervision of the Court.

On 2d December following the company and its liquidator presented a petition to the First Division craving that the liquidation should be forthwith placed under supervision of the Court, in terms of the 147th section of the Companies Act, 1862, and for confirmation of the appointment of Mr Watson as liquidator.

Answers were lodged for Mr Thomas Dun and others, the holders of 2410 out of the 40,000 shares, into which the capital of the company was divided. They stated that the company was not insolvent nor unable to continue its business. They further averred that the resolutions of 23d November 1886 for the winding up of the company, on which the present petition was founded, were the latest step in carrying out the scheme of a syndicate formed by certain shareholders to “acquire the whole works and property of the said company on their own terms by a voluntary winding-up, and the appointment of a liquidator in friendly connection with themselves. The motion for winding-up at the said meeting was stated by the chairman (Mr George Wilson), to be supported by 31,335 votes—each share having a vote—and the negative or amendment to this motion was supported by 2740 votes from the respondents or other shareholders—fourteen in all. The shares in respect of which the votes in favour of the winding-up were given had been acquired largely since the said meeting of 21st April 1885”—(At this meeting a resolution to wind up had failed for want of the requisite statutory majority of votes)—“and are held by the said syndicate or coterie, and persons acting for and with them.” Particulars were added as to the pecuniary position of the company, with a view to shewing that it was not insolvent.

The respondents further objected to the appointment of Mr Watson as

* The 141st section of the Act enacts,—“ . . . The Court may also, on due cause shewn, remove any liquidator and appoint another liquidator to act in the matter of a voluntary winding-up.”

No. 52.
Dec. 16, 1886.
Monkland
Iron Co.
Limited, v.
Dun, &c.

liquidator, and stated,—“ Mr Watson, who was a clerk in the office of Mr M'Clelland ” (one of the syndicate referred to), “ or of his firm of M'Clelland, M'Kinnon, & Blyth, and who only commenced business for himself as an accountant in 1879 or 1880, was appointed, contrary to the votes of the independent shareholders, by the votes of the same syndicate which wrongfully carried the said motion for winding-up. He is conjunct and confident with Messrs Donaldson, Wilson, and M'Clelland ” (the syndicate in question), “ and is subject to their influence.” In any event, they asked that an additional liquidator should be appointed.

The petitioners argued;—(1) The extraordinary meeting of the company and the resolutions passed thereat having been quite regular and in conformity with the statute, the averments of the respondents were irrelevant as an answer to the petition. The Court could not review the resolutions, and the allegation of mala fides was not a relevant objection—at least in the present application—to the liquidation. (2) In regard to the objections to the liquidator, the averments were not sufficiently specific.¹ They did not amount to “ due cause,” in terms of the 141st section of the Companies Act, 1862.* The only reason against the appointment of a second liquidator was that of expense, but if the Court thought it expedient, no opposition would be offered by the petitioners.

The respondents argued;—1. The resolution to wind up had not been carried in good faith, and the question at issue could be disposed of in the present petition. [LORD PRESIDENT.—The Court can only grant or refuse the petition. If it is refused, then the liquidation is simply continued as a voluntary liquidation.] But the resolution was bad in substance. It was averred (1) that the resolution was simply a device, and (2) that the finding that the company was unable to carry on was untrue. If the facts on which the resolution was founded were untrue, then the respondents were entitled to have the liquidation recalled. At anyrate, the present petition should be sisted to allow of an action of reduction being brought. 2. Looking to section 141 of the Companies Act, 1862, it was not a matter of course that the Court should confirm the appointment of a liquidator.² [LORD PRESIDENT.—The form of the prayer in this case, which asks for the confirmation of the appointment of the liquidator, is an entire novelty. The proper form was settled in the case of Brightwen,³ and I think that portion of the prayer must be deleted.†] The averments made as to Mr Watson made out a prima facie case to the effect that he was not a fitting person to conduct a large liquidation. In any case, an additional liquidator should be appointed, and further, there should be a direction by the Court that the business of the company should be carried on.⁴

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an application for a supervision order, and the circumstances under which it is asked do not seem to me to be in any way exceptional. The company, on 23d November last, passed certain extraordinary

¹ Sir John Moore Gold Mining Co., June 10, 1879, L. R., 12 Chanc. Div. 325; In re British National Life Assurance Association, 1872, L. R., 14 Equity, 492.

* The 141st section enacts,—“ . . . The Court may also, on due cause shewn, remove any liquidator and appoint another liquidator to act in the matter of a voluntary winding-up.”

² Sir John Moore Gold Mining Co., L. R., 12 Chanc. Div. 325.

³ Brightwen & Co. v. City of Glasgow Bank, &c., Nov. 27, 1878, 6 R. 244.

† This portion of the prayer of the petition was accordingly deleted.

⁴ Companies Act, 1862, secs. 133, subsec. 7, 151, and 95, subsec. 2; Gray's Trustees v. Benhar Coal Co., Limited, Dec. 2, 1881, 9 R. 225.

resolutions to the effect that it could not, by reason of its liabilities, continue its business, and that it should therefore be wound up voluntarily. At the same time it was resolved that Mr Watson, chartered accountant in Glasgow, should be appointed liquidator, and that it should be an instruction to him to apply to the Court of Session for a supervision order if he found it expedient. The answer which is made to the application is that the resolutions to wind up voluntarily were carried by a very large majority of the shareholders, in pursuance of a scheme to acquire the whole works and property of the company on their own terms, and accordingly to sacrifice the company estate.

If that allegation is founded on fact, it is apparent that a very gross fraud has been committed, but I cannot see that it affords any answer to this application. Assuming that it was an answer, and that we were to give effect to the contention of the respondents, and throw out the petition, it would follow that the voluntary winding-up, which had been obtained by fraud, would continue as before, with the result that it would be in the power of the liquidator to do as he pleased in the liquidation, whereas, if the supervision order which is asked is granted, the liquidation will be in the hands of the Court, under whose supervision it will in future be conducted. The appeal which is made to the Court to set aside the liquidation as a fraudulent transaction is not now competently before us, and if it is to be brought before us for consideration it must be in another shape. There being a standing voluntary liquidation, the only question for us now is whether it should be put under supervision, and I have heard no answer to that application, on the assumption that the voluntary liquidation is to stand.

An attempt has been made to satisfy the Court that the resolution that the company is unable, by reason of its liabilities, to continue its business is ill-founded in fact, and that the company is really not in that position. But all that the Court requires to know is that it has been proved to the satisfaction of the company that it is unable to carry on its business. That fact stands recorded by the resolution which has been arrived at by the great majority of the shareholders. The answer made to the petition is, in my opinion, altogether irrelevant; it raises no valid objection to the voluntary liquidation, however good it may be as an answer to the resolution.

Mr Watson has been appointed liquidator under one of the extraordinary resolutions which were carried, and his appointment is also objected to, but upon what grounds does not appear, except that he is said to be a person who is in sympathy with the great majority of the shareholders, against whom the allegations to which I have referred have been made. I do not know that this is such an objection as we could give effect to, even assuming that we had the jurisdiction to do so, or thought fit to exercise it. But the necessity for that has been removed by the consent which has been judiciously given to the appointment of another person as liquidator to act along with Mr Watson.

LORD MURE, LORD SHAND, and LORD ADAM concurred.

THE COURT accordingly granted the supervision order, and, of consent, appointed Mr John Graham, C.A., Glasgow, to be an additional liquidator along with Mr Watson, and remitted to Lord Kinnear (Ordinary) to proceed with the winding-up.

DAVIDSON & SYME, W.S.—MORTON, NEILSON, & SMART, W.S.—Agents.

No. 52.

Dec. 16, 1886.
Monkland
Iron Co. v.
Dun, &c.

No. 53.

Dec. 17, 1886.
Bell's Trustee
v. Coatbridge
Tinplate Co.
Limited.

ROBERT SHARP (Bell's Trustee), Petitioner.—Asher—Ure.
COATBRIDGE TINPLATE COMPANY, LIMITED, Respondents.—Balfour—
Murray.

Company—Shareholder—Retention—Company's lien over shares for debts due by shareholder.—A limited company, incorporated under the Companies Acts, has, at common law, a right of retention over the shares of a partner in security of debts due by him to the company.

The articles of association of a limited company bore that the company should have a first and permanent lien on the shares of members for any debts due by them, and might refuse to register a transfer by such members. The trustee of a bankrupt shareholder, who owed the company money, applied to be put upon the register of shareholders, in respect of the bankrupt's shares, and founded on one of the articles of association, which provided that anyone becoming interested in a share in consequence of the bankruptcy of a shareholder might be registered. Held that the company had a lien over the shares in respect of the debt due to them, both at common law and under the articles, and were entitled to decline the application.

1st DIVISION.

B.

THE estates of Edward Mather Bell were sequestrated by the Sheriff of Lanarkshire on 9th May 1884, and Robert Sharp was appointed trustee. At the date of the sequestration Bell held 248 shares, representing £12,400 of capital in the Coatbridge Tinplate Company, Limited, of which he had been manager.

The company having declined to comply with the application of the trustee to enter his name in the register of shareholders of the company as holder of the bankrupt's shares, the trustee presented a petition to the Court for rectification of the register to that effect in terms of the 35th section of the Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 89).

The company lodged answers in which they stated that at the date of Bell's death on 24th May 1886 he was indebted to them in the sum of £7038, 2s. 9d.; that the value of the shares held by him had decreased to £4216; and that they had under their articles of association a lien over the shares for the debts due by the bankrupt,* and that this security

* The articles bore:—Art. 11.—“The company shall always have a first and permanent lien on the shares of each member, for all the debts, liabilities, and engagements to the company of such member, solely or jointly with any other person, and the company may refuse to register the transfer of any shares by any member who may then be indebted, or under any liability to the company, whether solely or jointly with any other person on any account whatever, and the company may, at any time, call upon such of the shareholders who may be indebted to the company, to pay such debts and engagements, and interest and expenses thereof, within one month from the date of the notice thereof, and, should they fail to pay the same at the time and place fixed upon in the said notice, the company may at any time thereafter absolutely sell and dispose of the shares of any member who may refuse or neglect to pay such debts, liabilities, and engagements, and whether such member be the sole or a joint holder of such shares, and apply the proceeds of such sale, so far as the same will extend, in discharge, or satisfaction of all debts, liabilities, or engagements from such member of the company, and upon such sale the company shall, without any further or other consent from the holder or holders of such shares, transfer the same, in the books of the company, to the purchaser thereof.”

Art. 20.—“Any person becoming interested in a share in consequence of the death or bankruptcy of any shareholder, or by any lawful means other than by transfer, in accordance with these presents, may, upon producing such evidence had been admitted by the trustees.* They therefore submitted that the petition should be refused. It further appeared that the company had, on 29th February 1884, intimated to Bell that, failing payment of his debt to them, they would sell his shares. No. 53.

Dec. 17, 1886.
Bell's Trustee
v. Coatbridge
Tinsplate Co.
Limited.

Argued for the petitioner;—At the date of the sequestration the bankrupt was the registered owner of the shares, and the 20th article of the company's articles of association provided for a bankrupt's trustee being put on the register. It was said that the 11th article entitled the company to refuse to register. But this was a transmission,—it was not a transfer. And so far as that article gave a power to the company to refuse to register, because of the debt due by the bankrupt to the company, it was answered by the decision of the English Courts in the case of the Bentham Mills Spinning Company.¹ In that case the articles of association were in the form given in table A to the Companies Act, 1862. It was said that here the company possessed a right of a higher kind, and it might be that the terms of the 11th article gave the company an equitable charge upon the share of any member; but they certainly did not give them a right of property. The circumstances of the case of *Harrison*² were so different from the present as to make it of no authority.

As to the trustee's deliverance, dated 22d September 1884, to which reference had been made, it had been held that a trustee ought not to pronounce a deliverance until he was about to declare a dividend, and, further, that it was open to him to reconsider it.³

The respondents argued;—Article 11 of the company's articles of association gave the company a distinct lien over the shares, and subsequent articles should be read in the light of that article and with a view to preserving the lien. The more reasonable view of the 20th article (which was equivalent to article 14 of table A) was that it contained a general direction, subject to the provisions of article 11. The object of article 11 was to make the company's lien effective, and the company were entitled, in the circumstances of the present case, to refuse to put the petitioner's name upon the register.⁴ There was no provision in the articles or elsewhere for putting a name on the register under reservation of their lien, and the petitioner's remedy was to pay the debt, when he could at once as the board think sufficient, either be registered himself as the holder of the share, or elect to have some person nominated by him, and approved by the board, registered as such holder, and if he shall elect to have such nominee registered, he shall grant to his nominee a transfer of the share, and until such transfer be registered he shall not be freed from any liability in respect of the share."

* In a claim lodged by the respondents upon Bell's sequestrated estate for payment of the debt of £7038, 2s. 9d., the trustee issued this deliverance on 22d September 1884:—"The trustee admits this claim to rank to the extent of £1038, 2s. 9d.; quoad ultra rejects the claim, in respect that the claimants hold a security over a part of the estate of the bankrupt, which they have valued at the sum of £6000."

¹ In re Bentham Mills Spinning Company, 1879, L. R., 11 Chanc. Div. 900.

² Ex parte Harrison in re Cannock & Rugeley Colliery Company, April 9, 1814, L. R., 26 Chanc. Div. 522, revd. Feb. 11, 1885, L. R., 28 Chanc. Div. 363.

³ Monkhouse v. Mackinnon, Jan. 28, 1881, 8 R. 454.

⁴ Buckley on the Companies Acts, p. 412; The Companies Act, 1862, table A, Cause 10; Ex parte Harrison, supra, L. R., 26 Chanc. Div. 522, revd. 28 Chanc. Div. 363; Burns v. Laurie's Trustees, July 7, 1840, 2 D. 1348, 12 Scot. Jur. 622.

No. 53.

Dec. 17, 1886.
Bell's Trustees
v. Coatbridge
Tinplate Co.
Limited.

be put on the register. There was an English case of *Lewis*¹ which illustrated the effect of a proper lien as against a mere set-off. The result of the contention on the other side would be to defeat the provisions of the 65th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856. The creditor holding a security had an active right, and might realise it in order to pay his own debt.² If the petitioner was right, the creditor's rights would be defeated. This was the view which had been taken by the trustee himself in his deliverance in September 1884, and it was only lately that he had adopted a different course.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an application by the trustee on the estate of a certain Mr Edward Mather Bell, a shareholder in the respondent company to the extent of 248 shares, representing a nominal value of about £12,000 of capital, and Mr Sharp, the petitioner, applies to be put upon the register in place of the bankrupt, as owner of the shares in question. The ground upon which he makes this application is the 20th article of the articles of association, which provides that “any person becoming interested in a share in consequence of the death or bankruptcy of any shareholder, or by any lawful means other than by transfer, in accordance with these presents, may, upon producing such evidence as the board think sufficient, either be registered himself as the holder of the shares, or elect to have some person nominated by him, and approved by the board, registered as such holder.” The petitioner produces his confirmation as trustee, and desires to have the shares transferred to his name in the books of the company. But the company state in answer that Mr Mather Bell's indebtedness to them in a sum of money exceeds the value of his shares. The amount of his debt is about £7000, and the present value of the shares he holds was stated, in the trustee's deliverance (dated 22d September 1884) upon the respondents' claim on the bankrupt's sequestered estate, to be £6000. The company maintain that under the 11th article of the articles of association they are entitled to a lien for the debt due to them, and to sell the shares for the purpose of realising their value and satisfying their claim.

Three things are provided for in the 11th article. First, it is provided that the company are to have a preferential permanent lien for debts due. In the second place, in the case of a transfer, the company is to be entitled to refuse to register a transfer by any member who may then happen to be in debt to the company until the debt is paid. In the third place, there is provision for working out the lien by notice and sale.

The parties here appear to have been originally at one, because I see that a claim was made by the respondents on the bankrupt estate for £7038, 2s. 9d., and that they declared that they held no security therefor except their right of lien, which they valued at £6000 and deducted, and on considering the claim the trustee made this declaration,—“The trustee admits this claim to rank to the extent of £1038, 2s. 9d.; quoad ultra rejects the claim, in respect that the claimants hold a security over a part of the estate of the bankrupt, which they have valued at the sum of £6000.” If the parties had settled upon that footing there would have been no further difficulty, and the lien would have received full effect. But the trustee seems to have taken new advice or to have conceived a different idea, and he presents this petition and requires the company to register him as a shareholder. It appears to me that if the lien claimed by the company is effectual, he can have no right to require registration, for the simple reason that registration would do him no good. He contends that not being a transferee of shares, and the shares being transmissible by reason of bankruptcy, he is not within the rules which entitle the company to reject a transferee. But independently of the first mode of giving effect to the lien which is provided by the articles of association to which I have referred, there is another method of giving effect to it, viz., by giving notice to the bankrupt himself and then selling the shares. And I see that such notice was given by the company upon 29th February 1884, before the date of the bankruptcy, and they are clearly entitled to follow up that notice. So that they have put themselves into the position defined in the 11th article, assuming that they have this lien, and, accordingly, the only point is whether the lien is good or not.

¹ In re General Exchange Bank, Lewis' case, May 1871, L. R., 6 Chanc. App. 818.

² Henderson's Trustee v. Auld and Guild, July 6, 1872, 10 Macph. 946.

I must say that I have not seen any reason for refusing effect to the lien. The right is one which is quite in conformity with the law prior to the passing of the Joint Stock Companies Acts. We are familiar with this in connection with the law dealing with the management of banks. There is one well-known case—Hotchkiss (Keir's Trustee) v. The Royal Bank, 1797, M. 2673, which was affirmed upon appeal, 3 Paton, 618. In that case Bertram, Gardner, & Company became bankrupt, deeply indebted to the Royal Bank of Scotland. The bye-law of 1728 really created such a lien as we are dealing with here, and it was maintained by the trustee for the creditors of Bertram, Gardner, & Company that the bye-law was ultra vires of the bank, and it is very important to observe how that contention was met. The answer was that the right of retention was good at common law independently of the bye-law, and this was the ground upon which the Court decided the case. It was observed that the bye-law was merely corroborative of the common law.

No less than three cases were decided at the same time, and all upon the same ground. It was thus established that by the common law of Scotland there is a right of retention on the part of a company, where shares stand in the name of a shareholder, in satisfaction of debts due by the shareholder to the company.

The same thing occurred in connection with another bank,—Burns (Manager of Central Bank) v. Lawrie's Trustees, July 7, 1840, 2 D. 1348,—where the doctrine laid down in the case of Hotchkiss was dealt with as a fixed rule of law. Lord Moncreiff, the Lord Ordinary in that case, stated the law thus,—“The first question is whether the Central Bank have a right to retain the shares of stock standing in the name of Peter Rae, in satisfaction of debts due to them by Rae? . . . The Lord Ordinary thinks that there is no doubt or difficulty in the first question. The fund in medio consists of certain shares of the stock of the Central Banking Company. By the constitution of that company, in the special clauses quoted or referred to, it was an intrinsic quality or condition of the right of every holder of such stock that the bank should be entitled to retain it for payment of whatever debts he might in any way contract to the bank. The stock here in question had stood from the commencement of the establishment in the name of Peter Rae; and before the bank had any notice of any other party having a claim thereupon, which was in June 1838, all the debts had been contracted for which the bank now claim retention. In the simple statement this must appear a very clear case.” The application of these authorities is very

No. 53.

Dec. 17, 1886.
Bell's Trustees
v. Coatbridge
Tinplate Co.
Limited.

No. 53. Dec. 17, 1886.
Bell's Trustees
v. Coatbridge
Tinsplate Co.
Limited.

apparent, and even without them the creation of this lien would be a perfectly lawful stipulation in the constitution of the company. It is therefore clear that the company have this lien, and that they are entitled to retain the shares, because an incorporated society such as the present is on the same footing as a private trading company.

It is inconsistent with this right of lien that the shares should be transferred to the name of the trustee, and therefore the trustee's demand is quite untenable. He seems to desire to have himself placed on the register so as to try the question of his position. He can have no other conceivable object except to defeat the company's right of lien. But I am of opinion that the company's lien is good, and that they are entitled to retain the shares that they may realise them in satisfaction of the debt which is due to them, and I am therefore for refusing the petition.

LORD MURK.—The company have declined to register the trustee, on account of the lien they have over the shares; and I have no doubt that this lien is good against the bankrupt, both at common law and under the articles of association. My individual opinion is so decided upon this point, that, as at present advised, I do not see how the trustee could maintain the position of his being in right to those shares, except upon the footing that he is to hold them subject to the same lien as the bankrupt himself. I do not therefore see that this company would here be prejudiced by registering the trustee.

But the circumstances of the case are peculiar, because the trustee makes no secret of his intention to dispute the company's lien. His object, moreover, is to endeavour to strengthen his position in this respect by forcing the company to put his name upon the register; and I agree with your Lordship that in these circumstances the company have a right to refuse to register the petitioner, particularly looking to the decision in the case of Hotchkiss to which you have referred.

LORD SHAND.—The bankrupt, who is now represented by his trustee, was indebted to the respondents' company in a sum of about £7000, and the value of the shares which he held in the company is stated by the petitioner to be about £4000 only. The respondents, on the other hand, state the value of the shares to be about £6000. It is plain that there is a debt due by the bankrupt exceeding the value of the shares, and the only purpose which the trustee can have in asking that the shares shall be transferred to his name is that he may get rid of the lien which the company holds over the shares. I am of opinion that in the circumstances the trustee is not entitled to have the shares entered in his name with a view to his effecting any such purpose.

There is in the articles of association of the company this provision,—“The company shall always have a first and permanent lien on the shares of each member, for all the debts, liabilities, and engagements to the company of such member, solely or jointly, with any other person.” The company are desirous of exercising this lien, and the trustee seeks to defeat it by getting his name placed upon the register. I think the company has a legitimate interest, title, and right to decline to put his name on the register even by way of transmission by virtue of his act and warrant of confirmation. Suppose that article 11 had stopped at the point to which I have now read, I cannot imagine that there would be any room for the argument of the trustee. The lien is declared by that article, and, the trustee's purpose being to defeat it, surely the company would be entitled to defend their right and to decline to register the transfer. The only justification for the argument he advances is contained in the words which follow,—“and the company may refuse to register the transfer of any shares by any member who may then be indebted, or under any liability to the company, whether solely or jointly with any other person on any account whatever.” It is said that this necessarily limits the remedy of the company vindicating their lien. It certainly provides a remedy in one class of cases, but if there be another in which the entry of a new and substituted name might defeat the lien to the prejudice of the company, I do not think the company are precluded from refusing to make the registration asked.

We were referred to a case which has been decided in England, and I rather believe that it is in reliance upon that case that the trustee has taken up his present position—(Bentham Mills Spinning Co., L. R., 11 Chanc. Div. 900). It was held in that case that a company cannot refuse to register a trustee in bankruptcy of a shareholder on the ground that the shareholder is indebted to the company. If we assume that the decision of the Court of appeal is right, I am still of opinion that it is clearly distinguishable from the present. The case was decided on the terms of the 10th rule of table A of the schedule to the Companies Act, 1862. The 10th rule of table A provides that “the company may decline to register any transfer of shares made by a member who is indebted to them.” That rule professes at the outset to deal with transfers only, and it was held, whether rightly or wrongly, that the fact of a member's indebtedness to the company would not entitle the company to decline to register a transfer to his trustee in bankruptcy. But the present case is very different. There is here a clear provision expressed in the articles of association in entirely different terms from those used in the Bentham Mills Spinning Co. case—viz., to the effect that the company shall have a lien over the shares of any member for payment of any debt he may owe to the company. What follows is merely executorial, and I do not think that the words which follow the clause giving the right to refuse to register a transfer are to be read as at all limiting the right which the company has to decline to enter a new and substituted name on the register where there is reasonable ground to think there may be prejudice to the company's right of lien.

LORD ADAM.—I do not think the petitioner here disputes the validity of the company's lien. His object is to have himself placed upon the register of shareholders, because he thinks that the debts of the bankrupt would not be his debts. But I am of opinion that this is a ground on which he is not entitled to succeed, and I concur with your Lordships that the petition must be refused.

THE COURT refused the petition.

FODD, SIMPSON, & MARWICK, W.S.—J. & A. HASTIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

THOMAS KERR (Mary Halliday's Executor), Pursuer. No. 54.
JOHN HALLIDAY AND JAMES HALLIDAY (William Halliday's Executors), Defenders (Appellants).—J. C. Lorimer—Boyd.

Sheriff—Jurisdiction—Executor—Whether subject to jurisdiction of Sheriff Court in which confirmation granted.—Held that the fact that confirmation of
Dec. 17, 1886.
Halliday's
Executor v.
Halliday's
Executors.

No. 54.

Dec. 17, 1886.

Halliday's
Executor v.
Halliday's
Executors.

1st Division.

Sheriff of Dumfries and Galloway.

M.

an estate has been taken out in the Sheriff Court of the deceased's domicile does not of itself subject the executors to the jurisdiction of that Court, and that an action will not lie against them if none of them is resident within that jurisdiction.

THOMAS KERR (Mary Halliday's executor), sued John Halliday, and James Halliday, executors-dative qua next of kin of the late William Halliday, in the Sheriff Court of Dumfriesshire, for payment of £200, a sum alleged to have been due by William to Mary at the date of his death.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The defenders not being subject to, or under the jurisdiction of, this Sheriff Court, the action falls to be dismissed, with costs.

It appeared that the deceased William Halliday had resided at Ulzieside, in the parish of Sanquhar, Dumfriesshire, and that the defenders had applied for and obtained confirmation in the Sheriff Court of that county. Neither of them resided within the sheriffdom, one being domiciled in Glasgow, and the other in Ayrshire. The greater part of the executry estate had been removed from Dumfriesshire, and was now deposited in the British Linen Company Bank in Glasgow.

The Sheriff-substitute (Hope), on 13th September 1886, inter alia, repelled the plea above stated.*

* "NOTE.—The first plea is one of 'no jurisdiction,' and it is founded on the fact that neither of the defenders lives within the sheriffdom. The point thus raised seems to be a new one, as far as I can see. This may arise either from the fact that jurisdiction in such a case has not usually been disputed, or because no action has been brought against executors similarly situated. The case most analogous to the present is that of Black v. Duncan (18th December 1827, 6 S. 261), the rubric of which is as follows:—'Trustees of a party deceased who was proprietor of an heritable property, in which he had carried on a manufacture, may be sued before the Sheriff of the county where the deceased had lived, where the property lay, and where the managing trustee resided, although the majority of their number personally dwelt in another county, they being cited by letters of supplement.' The distinctions between that case and the present are, (1) The defenders were trustees and not executors; (2) The trust-estate comprised heritable property; and (3) One of the trustees was resident within the sheriffdom. Taking these differences—for convenience—in their reverse order, I may remark that I fail to see that the presence of one trustee can affect the question, if the majority live out of the jurisdiction. I do not see that the trustees as a body are separable in their fiduciary capacity, or that jurisdiction over an estate should vary if the trustees choose to change their residence. However that may be, I think that the case of executors is different. If this were not a case in which executors are sued I would have some difficulty in respect of the fact that the estate is admittedly moveable. In the case of Cameron v. Chapman (9th March 1838, 16 S. 907), Lord Glenlee remarked,—'Moveables have no situs,' and therefore on the ground of ratione rei sitae alone I think there would be no jurisdiction.

"As regards the distinction between trustees and executors, it is all in favour of the pursuer's contention. The executors have, I consider, subjected themselves to the jurisdiction of this Court in matters pertaining to the executry estate. They have applied for and received from this Court the office they hold, and they have obtained confirmation and have recorded in the books of the sheriffdom an inventory of the estate. I do not see to what tribunal they are more amenable.

"Mr Wilson, after noticing the case of Black v. Duncan, remarks,—'In the same way it is thought that executors would be liable to the jurisdiction of a sheriffdom where the deceased lived, where the executors were confirmed and

On 21st October 1886, the Sheriff (Macpherson) on appeal adhered, holding that there was jurisdiction in a question regarding the amount of the deceased's estate, and further that the Sheriff Court of Dumfriesshire was forum conveniens. He also held that by taking out confirmation the defenders had prorogated jurisdiction. No. 54.

Dec. 17, 1886.
Halliday's
Executor v.
Halliday's
Executors.

The defenders appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—The Court of Session was the only competent tribunal here, where both executors and the principal portion of the estate were out of the sheriffdom.¹ That the jurisdiction must be in the sheriffdom where the administration was taken out was said to be the true construction of the decision in Preston's case.² That construction had been canvassed in the House of Lords in Orr Ewing's case.³ The form of the testament-dative granted by the Sheriff was not important, because as soon as the confirmation was complete the Sheriff had nothing further to do with the matter.

No appearance was made for the respondent.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am disposed to sustain this appeal and to hold that the Sheriff has no jurisdiction. If the executors who were confirmed had been foreigners, it is plain that they could not have been sued except in the Supreme Court, which is commune forum. Where one executor resides in the sheriffdom, and is engaged in the active administration of the funds of the estate, it might be different, and I am very much disposed to agree with Lord Fraser in the view which he took in the case which has been cited to us (Guthrie's Sheriff Court Cases, 241). It is no doubt true that confirmation was obtained in the Sheriff Court of Dumfries, but that was because the deceased was domiciled within the sheriffdom, but the executors have no connection with that sheriffdom, and they went there merely for the purpose of obtaining possession of the executry estate. They got possession of it on the footing that they should duly account for it, but they can only be called to account for it where they may be where the estate was being wound up, though the majority of them should actually be resident without the sheriffdom.'

"I go further than this, and would say—'though they be all resident without the sheriffdom.'

"I think that support for this view can be obtained by a consideration of the terms of the bond of caution, which cautioners for executors have to sign, and which must have been signed by the cautioners for the defenders. The form, after stating that the cautioner binds and obliges himself that the sum contained in the testament 'shall be made free and forthcoming to all parties having interest therein as law will,' contains the following clause,—'And I subject myself, my heirs and successors, to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff of Dumfries and Galloway in this particular.'

"I never heard of a cautioner being subjected to greater liability than the principal; and, if an executor is not subject to the jurisdiction of the Court which appointed him, I cannot see why his cautioner should be required to subject himself to it."

¹ Watt v. Richmond's Executors, decided by Lord Fraser when Sheriff of Renfrewshire, Guthrie's Sheriff Court Cases, 241; M'Morine v. Cowie, Jan. 16, 1845, 7 D. 270, 17 Scot. Jur. 135; Ferguson v. Douglas, Heron, & Co., 1796, H. of L., 3 Paton's Appa. 503 (Lord Chancellor Loughborough, p. 510); Black v. Duncan, Dec. 18, 1827, 6 S. 261; Magistrates of Wick v. Forbes, Dec. 11, 1849, 12 D. 299, 22 Scot. Jur. 71.

² Preston v. Melville, March 29, 1841, 8 Cl. & F. 1, 2 Rob. App. 88 (Lord Chancellor Cottenham, p. 12).

³ Orr Ewing's Trustees v. Orr Ewing, July 24, 1885, 13 R. (H. of L.), Lord Blackburn, p. 18.

No. 54

Dec. 17, 1886.
Halliday's
Executor v.
Halliday's
Executors.

competently cited. There is nothing in the fact that the Sheriff of Dumfriesshire granted confirmation to confer jurisdiction upon him in such an action as the present. The executors have carried the estate outside the sheriffdom, and in that state of circumstances I do not see on what ground the pursuer can establish the jurisdiction. If, as Lord Adam has remarked, the mere fact of confirmation gave jurisdiction against executors exclusively in the Court which granted the confirmation, I could understand the argument for the pursuer, but as an executor may be sued anywhere, where he himself is, and an action may be brought against him in any Court to which he is himself subject, it is quite plain that there cannot be exclusive jurisdiction in the Court from which the confirmation proceeded. And if there is not exclusive jurisdiction, I do not see how the fact of confirmation can confer any jurisdiction unless the executor is otherwise subject to it. I think the defenders' first plea in law must be sustained.

LORD MURE.—I am of the same opinion. At first I had some hesitation in coming to a different conclusion from the Sheriff, from the apprehension that a contrary decision on the question of jurisdiction might render it necessary in all such cases for parties to be at the expense of coming to the Court of Session as the commune forum. But this may I think be obviated wherever there is one executor, and there are many such cases, subject to the jurisdiction of a Sheriff Court. I further agree with what has been said by your Lordship, to the effect that there is no exclusive jurisdiction in the Sheriff Court which granted confirmation.

LORD SHAND.—The decision of this point seems to me to depend upon the answer to the question whether the taking out of confirmation implies (for there is nothing express to which we can look) that thereby jurisdiction arises entitling creditors or beneficiaries to call the executors to account in the Sheriff Court in which the confirmation was granted. I agree in thinking that this question must be answered in the negative.

Suppose that one of the executors here had lived in Glasgow, can it be said that he is not to be sued there, but that the action must be brought in another part of the country with which he has no connection? I should be sorry if the result of our decision were that in future it would be necessary to bring the action to the Court of Session. But that is not a necessary result. All that we decide is that where an executor has no residence in the jurisdiction in which he is sued, and no tie there except that he has obtained confirmation of the estate of a deceased, the action will not lie. If the pursuer had resorted to the domicile of the executor who had taken the leading part in connection with the administration of the executry estate, and had sued both executors there, I should have had no doubt of the jurisdiction. But that is not the case here, and I agree with your Lordship that the defender's first plea must be sustained.

LORD ADAM concurred.

THE COURT accordingly recalled the interlocutors of the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute, sustained the first plea in law for the defenders, and dismissed the action.

THOMAS HART, L.A., Agent.

ALEXANDER M. ROSS, Pursuer.—C. S. Dickson—G. W. Burnet.
 WILLIAM LETHAM M'KITTRICK, Defender.—Asher—Kennedy.

No. 55.

Dec. 17, 1886.

Reparation—Slander—Process—Jury trial.—A person charged with having contravened the Weights and Measures Act, 1878, by having in his possession or using measures which were not of any Board of Trade standard, and were false or unjust, was convicted of the offence except in so far as it was charged that his measures were false or unjust. He afterwards brought an action of damages against the printer and publisher of a newspaper for slander contained in an article commenting on the case, which, upon the face of it, assumed that there had been a conviction upon both charges. There was no issue of justification, and the defender in his defences offered a retraction and apology, and a nominal sum of damages, and in the witness-box admitted that the article charged the pursuer with dishonest conduct. The presiding Judge (Lord McLaren) told the jury that it was for them to consider whether the article was false and calumnious, and no exception was taken to his charge.

The jury having returned a verdict for the defender, the Court granted a new trial upon the ground that the verdict was contrary to evidence—disa. Lord McLaren, who held that it being the province of the jury and not of the Court to determine whether the article was or was not a defamatory libel, their verdict affirming that it did not exceed the limits of fair criticism ought not to be interfered with.

ALEXANDER M'KENZIE ROSS, refreshment contractor in the International Exhibition Buildings at Edinburgh, was charged with a contravention of the Weights and Measures Act, 1878, "in so far as, on the 8th May, . . . he used, or had in possession for use, for trade, twenty-eight measures of capacity which were not of the denomination of some Board of Trade standard, and were false or unjust." The complaint was tried in the Edinburgh Burgh Court on 19th May 1886 before Baillie Turnbull, and the accused was "convicted of the offence charged, except in so far as it is charged in the complaint that his measures in question were false or unjust." On appeal to the High Court of Justiciary, the conviction was set aside (June 8, 1886, 13 R. Just. Ca. 73).

In the National Guardian newspaper of 26th May 1886 there appeared an article regarding the proceedings in the Burgh Court, headed "Illegal Measures."*

* The article was:—"There never was a time in the history of the world, so far as we know, when false weights and measures were not in existence. . . . Seeing that the use of a false measure violates one of the ten commandments, it follows, naturally enough, that a portion of the moral law is thereby broken. Nothing is more certain than that an infraction of the plain injunction, 'Thou shalt not steal,' must then ensue. It is not possible to regard the position in any other light.

"It is unfortunate, therefore, that the International Exhibition in Edinburgh should have been marred, at the very opening, by the unseemly discovery that visitors were being supplied with liquor in measures that were unjust or false in respect of their capacity. . . . The case against Mr Alexander M'Kenzie Ross, the purveyor, was not very creditable to him, and it also, indirectly at least, reflects most awkwardly on the directors. Either Mr Ross had illegal measures in his possession or he had not. In the latter case the charge against him must have naturally collapsed. Unfortunately for him, however, and also for those officially responsible for the just management of the Exhibition, the offence was clearly proved, and Mr Ross was fined £2, with the alternative of going three days to prison. The illegal measures, as is customary in such cases, were ruthlessly confiscated, so that visitors will know in the future that they are being supplied with the quantity of liquor for which they pay. The attempt to prove that this had been the case already was not very happy. The mere circumstance that the false measures were there, unstamped, in constant use, and purporting to be what they really were not, was quite sufficient to secure a conviction.

No. 55.

Dec. 17, 1886.
Ross v.
M'Kittrick.

An action of damages for slander was afterwards brought by Ross against William Letham M'Kittrick, the printer and publisher of the National Guardian, on the ground that the statements and representations made in the article were false and calumnious, and were maliciously made and published.

The defender explained in answer that the article in question was based upon the reports of the proceedings at the trial, and that it did not exceed the limits of fair and legitimate comment. He further offered a retraction and apology, and also to pay the pursuer a sum by way of nominal damages. He also inserted in a prominent position in the issue of his journal dated 9th June an explanation and apology.

The following was the issue for the trial of the cause :—"Whether the article is of and concerning the pursuer ? and Whether the article falsely and calumniously represents the pursuer as having been guilty of dishonest conduct in his business of purveyor to the said International Exhibition, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer ?" There was no counter issue.

The case was tried before Lord M'Laren on 18th November 1886, when the jury returned this verdict :—"The jury unanimously find that the article is of and concerning the pursuer, but find that it does not impute dishonest conduct to the pursuer to his loss, injury, and damage." The verdict was entered for the defender.

On 15th December following the pursuer moved the First Division for a rule, upon the ground that the verdict was contrary to evidence. He maintained that the article in question represented that he had been convicted of an offence of which he had been really acquitted. There was no reasonable doubt that it was intended to charge him with dishonourable conduct. The defender himself had admitted in the witness-box in cross-examination that the article "charged dishonesty, i.e., in connection with the charge of using unjust measures." It was therefore a strong thing for a jury to affirm that there was no such charge, for the verdict could mean nothing else, although it was no doubt the fact that no special damage had been proved.

A rule having been granted, the defender shewed cause. Lord M'Laren's charge to the jury was admittedly correct, otherwise the pursuers ought to have excepted to it. There had been a conviction under the Weights

"Mr Johnstone, who addressed the Court on the question at issue, said that he made no reflection at all upon Mr Ross from a moral point of view. This was very kind and generous of Mr Johnstone, who undoubtedly placed the transaction in as mild and civil a fashion as he could decently assume, but it is by no means clear that he was strictly accurate. If Mr Ross was not guilty of an offence against the moral law, as laid down in the authorised authorities on that delicate subject, then why should he have been dragged into Court and fined £2 with the alternative of imprisonment ? It was distinctly proved that Mr Ross had ordered forty measures to hold about one-third of a gill, and as one tradesman refused to do the work we are entitled to assume that some dubiety already existed in certain quarters concerning the propriety of making the measures at all. It was also proved that the measures had been made by another tradesman, failing the one who had refused the order, and that they had been delivered to Mr Ross and used in the Exhibition. The measures, moreover, must have been recognised as inaccurate by the servants of Mr Ross, for when the two officials from the Weights and Measures Department were engaged in their mission in one part of the building, the waiters were removing the measures from another. It is certainly to be deplored that the opening of the Exhibition, so grand an event in the history of Edinburgh and of Scotland, should have been disfigured by such an unfortunate occurrence, but in all probability it was better that the discovery should have been early in order to give the public the full benefit of a more equitable traffic."

and Measures Act, 1878, and the article in question was founded upon a report of the trial of the case which had appeared in the Scotsman, and was a fair criticism of that report. Between the date of that report and the appearance of the article there had been an interval of six days, during which the report had remained uncontradicted. The damages which were asked were by way of reparation only, for there was no ground for solatium, an apology and explanation having been published in the issue succeeding that in which the article complained of appeared. The question, therefore, came to be, whether, although no special damage was proved, the jury ought not to have awarded nominal damages. Upon that question the case of *Craig v. Hunter*¹ was in point. The Court held there that to sustain an action of damages for alleged verbal injury there must be an animus injuriandi, and they reversed the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary finding damages due. The present case was not one in which the Court would readily grant a new trial.

No. 55.

Dec. 17, 1880.
Ross v.
M'Kittrick.

Replied for the pursuer;—The verdict was not only against the weight of evidence, there was actually no evidence to support it. The defender himself admitted that the article was capable of no other interpretation than that put upon it by the pursuer. The only question, therefore, left for the jury to consider was that of the amount of damage. The apology and retraction might be relevantly taken into consideration in regard to the matter of the amount of damage, but not as affecting the nature of the verdict for or against the pursuer. A verdict for the pursuer with nominal damages would have cleared his character,—which the verdict returned did not. It was important to observe that the summons in the present case was dated 3d June, the apology was dated the 9th June. There was a similarity, therefore, between this case and that of Faulks v. Park,² where a retraction made just before the case went to trial was held insufficient. The case of *Craig v. Hunter*¹ was quite inconsistent with the later view of the law that language which was found to be calumnious was presumably malicious.

At advising,—

LORD MURK.—A motion for a new trial has been made in this case on the ground that the verdict is contrary to evidence; and the question for consideration is, whether it has been shewn that there is in the proof adduced evidence which ought necessarily to have led the jury to come to a different conclusion from that at which they arrived. The main question sent to trial was, whether the article complained of “falsely and calumniously represented the pursuer as having been guilty of dishonest conduct in his business of purveyor, &c., to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer,” and the jury have found that it did not. Having regard, however, to the admission made by the defender when under cross-examination, to the effect that the article in question “charged dishonesty, i.e., in connection with the charge of using unjust measures,” and to the terms of the article itself, I am constrained to come to the conclusion that the verdict finding for the defender was contrary to evidence, being contrary to the defender’s own express admission that the pursuer was charged with being guilty of dishonest conduct.

Now, the article is, on the face of it, calumnious, and the defender’s admission being clear and distinct, and no issue having been taken in justification, the

¹ Craig v. Hunter, June 29, 1809, 15 F. C. 371.

² Faulks v. Park, Dec. 22, 1854, 17 D. 247, 27 Scot. Jur. 102.

No. 55.

Dec. 17, 1886.
Ross v.
M'Kittrick.

An action of damages for slander was afterwards brought by Ross against William Letham M'Kittrick, the printer and publisher of the National Guardian, on the ground that the statements and representations made in the article were false and calumnious, and were maliciously made and published.

The defender explained in answer that the article in question was based upon the reports of the proceedings at the trial, and that it did not exceed the limits of fair and legitimate comment. He further offered a retraction and apology, and also to pay the pursuer a sum by way of nominal damages. He also inserted in a prominent position in the issue of his journal dated 9th June an explanation and apology.

The following was the issue for the trial of the cause:—"Whether the article is of and concerning the pursuer? and Whether the article falsely and calumniously represents the pursuer as having been guilty of dishonest conduct in his business of purveyor to the said International Exhibition, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?" There was no counter issue.

The case was tried before Lord M'Laren on 18th November 1886, when the jury returned this verdict:—"The jury unanimously find that the article is of and concerning the pursuer, but find that it does not impute dishonest conduct to the pursuer to his loss, injury, and damage." The verdict was entered for the defender.

On 15th December following the pursuer moved the First Division for a rule, upon the ground that the verdict was contrary to evidence. He maintained that the article in question represented that he had been convicted of an offence of which he had been really acquitted. There was no reasonable doubt that it was intended to charge him with dishonourable conduct. The defender himself had admitted in the witness-box in cross-examination that the article "charged dishonesty, i.e., in connection with the charge of using unjust measures." It was therefore a strong thing for a jury to affirm that there was no such charge, for the verdict could mean nothing else, although it was no doubt the fact that no special damage had been proved.

A rule having been granted, the defender shewed cause. Lord M'Laren's charge to the jury was admittedly correct, otherwise the pursuers ought to have excepted to it. There had been a conviction under the Weights

"Mr Johnstone, who addressed the Court on the question at issue, said that he made no reflection at all upon Mr Ross from a moral point of view. This was very kind and generous of Mr Johnstone, who undoubtedly placed the transaction in as mild and civil a fashion as he could decently assume, but it is by no means clear that he was strictly accurate. If Mr Ross was not guilty of an offence against the moral law, as laid down in the authorised authorities on that delicate subject, then why should he have been dragged into Court and fined £2 with the alternative of imprisonment? It was distinctly proved that Mr Ross had ordered forty measures to hold about one-third of a gill, and as one tradesman refused to do the work we are entitled to assume that some dubiety already existed in certain quarters concerning the propriety of making the measures at all. It was also proved that the measures had been made by another tradesman, failing the one who had refused the order, and that they had been delivered to Mr Ross and used in the Exhibition. The measures, moreover, must have been recognised as inaccurate by the servants of Mr Ross, for when the two officials from the Weights and Measures Department were engaged in their mission in one part of the building, the waiters were removing the measures from another. It is certainly to be deplored that the opening of the Exhibition, so grand an event in the history of Edinburgh and of Scotland, should have been disfigured by such an unfortunate occurrence, but in all probability it was better that the discovery should have been early in order to give the public the full benefit of a more equitable traffic."

and Measures Act, 1878, and the article in question was founded upon a report of the trial of the case which had appeared in the Scotsman, and was a fair criticism of that report. Between the date of that report and the appearance of the article there had been an interval of six days, during which the report had remained uncontradicted. The damages which were asked were by way of reparation only, for there was no ground for solatium, an apology and explanation having been published in the issue succeeding that in which the article complained of appeared. The question, therefore, came to be, whether, although no special damage was proved, the jury ought not to have awarded nominal damages. Upon that question the case of *Craig v. Hunter*¹ was in point. The Court held there that to sustain an action of damages for alleged verbal injury there must be an animus injuriandi, and they reversed the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary finding damages due. The present case was not one in which the Court would readily grant a new trial.

No. 55.

Dec. 17, 1886.
Ross v.
M'Kittrick.

Replied for the pursuer;—The verdict was not only against the weight of evidence, there was actually no evidence to support it. The defender himself admitted that the article was capable of no other interpretation than that put upon it by the pursuer. The only question, therefore, left for the jury to consider was that of the amount of damage. The apology and retraction might be relevantly taken into consideration in regard to the matter of the amount of damage, but not as affecting the nature of the verdict for or against the pursuer. A verdict for the pursuer with nominal damages would have cleared his character,—which the verdict returned did not. It was important to observe that the summons in the present case was dated 3d June, the apology was dated the 9th June. There was a similarity, therefore, between this case and that of Faulks v. Park,² where a retraction made just before the case went to trial was held insufficient. The case of *Craig v. Hunter*¹ was quite inconsistent with the later view of the law that language which was found to be calumnious was presumably malicious.

At advising,—

LORD MURR.—A motion for a new trial has been made in this case on the ground that the verdict is contrary to evidence; and the question for consideration is, whether it has been shewn that there is in the proof adduced evidence which ought necessarily to have led the jury to come to a different conclusion from that at which they arrived. The main question sent to trial was, whether the article complained of “falsely and calumniously represented the pursuer as having been guilty of dishonest conduct in his business of purveyor, &c., to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer,” and the jury have found that it did not. Having regard, however, to the admission made by the defender when under cross-examination, to the effect that the article in question “charged dishonesty, i.e., in connection with the charge of using unjust measures,” and to the terms of the article itself, I am constrained to come to the conclusion that the verdict finding for the defender was contrary to evidence, being contrary to the defender’s own express admission that the pursuer was charged with being guilty of dishonest conduct.

Now, the article is, on the face of it, calumnious, and the defender’s admission being clear and distinct, and no issue having been taken in justification, the

¹ Craig v. Hunter, June 29, 1809, 15 F. C. 371.

² Faulks v. Park, Dec. 22, 1854, 17 D. 247, 27 Scot. Jur. 102.

No. 55.

Dec. 17, 1886.
Ross v.
M'Kittrick.

An action of damages for slander was afterwards brought by Ross against William Letham M'Kittrick, the printer and publisher of the National Guardian, on the ground that the statements and representations made in the article were false and calumnious, and were maliciously made and published.

The defender explained in answer that the article in question was based upon the reports of the proceedings at the trial, and that it did not exceed the limits of fair and legitimate comment. He further offered a retraction and apology, and also to pay the pursuer a sum by way of nominal damages. He also inserted in a prominent position in the issue of his journal dated 9th June an explanation and apology.

The following was the issue for the trial of the cause :—"Whether the article is of and concerning the pursuer? and Whether the article falsely and calumniously represents the pursuer as having been guilty of dishonest conduct in his business of purveyor to the said International Exhibition, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?" There was no counter issue.

The case was tried before Lord M'Laren on 18th November 1886, when the jury returned this verdict :—"The jury unanimously find that the article is of and concerning the pursuer, but find that it does not impute dishonest conduct to the pursuer to his loss, injury, and damage." The verdict was entered for the defender.

On 15th December following the pursuer moved the First Division for a rule, upon the ground that the verdict was contrary to evidence. He maintained that the article in question represented that he had been convicted of an offence of which he had been really acquitted. There was no reasonable doubt that it was intended to charge him with dishonourable conduct. The defender himself had admitted in the witness-box in cross-examination that the article "charged dishonesty, i.e., in connection with the charge of using unjust measures." It was therefore a strong thing for a jury to affirm that there was no such charge, for the verdict could mean nothing else, although it was no doubt the fact that no special damage had been proved.

A rule having been granted, the defender shewed cause. Lord M'Laren's charge to the jury was admittedly correct, otherwise the pursuers ought to have excepted to it. There had been a conviction under the Weights

"Mr Johnstone, who addressed the Court on the question at issue, said that he made no reflection at all upon Mr Ross from a moral point of view. This was very kind and generous of Mr Johnstone, who undoubtedly placed the transaction in as mild and civil a fashion as he could decently assume, but it is by no means clear that he was strictly accurate. If Mr Ross was not guilty of an offence against the moral law, as laid down in the authorised authorities on that delicate subject, then why should he have been dragged into Court and fined £2 with the alternative of imprisonment? It was distinctly proved that Mr Ross had ordered forty measures to hold about one-third of a gill, and as one tradesman refused to do the work we are entitled to assume that some dubiety already existed in certain quarters concerning the propriety of making the measures at all. It was also proved that the measures had been made by another tradesman, failing the one who had refused the order, and that they had been delivered to Mr Ross and used in the Exhibition. The measures, moreover, must have been recognised as inaccurate by the servants of Mr Ross, for when the two officials from the Weights and Measures Department were engaged in their mission in one part of the building, the waiters were removing the measures from another. It is certainly to be deplored that the opening of the Exhibition, so grand an event in the history of Edinburgh and of Scotland, should have been disfigured by such an unfortunate occurrence, but in all probability it was better that the discovery should have been early in order to give the public the full benefit of a more equitable traffic."

and Measures Act, 1878, and the article in question was founded upon a report of the trial of the case which had appeared in the Scotsman, and was a fair criticism of that report. Between the date of that report and the appearance of the article there had been an interval of six days, during which the report had remained uncontradicted. The damages which were asked were by way of reparation only, for there was no ground for solatium, an apology and explanation having been published in the issue succeeding that in which the article complained of appeared. The question, therefore, came to be, whether, although no special damage was proved, the jury ought not to have awarded nominal damages. Upon that question the case of *Craig v. Hunter*¹ was in point. The Court held there that to sustain an action of damages for alleged verbal injury there must be an animus injuriandi, and they reversed the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary finding damages due. The present case was not one in which the Court would readily grant a new trial.

No. 55.

Dec. 17, 1884.

Ross v.
M'Kittrick.

Replied for the pursuer;—The verdict was not only against the weight of evidence, there was actually no evidence to support it. The defender himself admitted that the article was capable of no other interpretation than that put upon it by the pursuer. The only question, therefore, left for the jury to consider was that of the amount of damage. The apology and retraction might be relevantly taken into consideration in regard to the matter of the amount of damage, but not as affecting the nature of the verdict for or against the pursuer. A verdict for the pursuer with nominal damages would have cleared his character,—which the verdict returned did not. It was important to observe that the summons in the present case was dated 3d June, the apology was dated the 9th June. There was a similarity, therefore, between this case and that of Faulks v. Park,² where a retraction made just before the case went to trial was held insufficient. The case of *Craig v. Hunter*¹ was quite inconsistent with the later view of the law that language which was found to be calumnious was presumably malicious.

At advising,—

LORD MURK.—A motion for a new trial has been made in this case on the ground that the verdict is contrary to evidence; and the question for consideration is, whether it has been shewn that there is in the proof adduced evidence which ought necessarily to have led the jury to come to a different conclusion from that at which they arrived. The main question sent to trial was, whether the article complained of “falsely and calumniously represented the pursuer as having been guilty of dishonest conduct in his business of purveyor, &c., to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer,” and the jury have found that it did not. Having regard, however, to the admission made by the defender when under cross-examination, to the effect that the article in question “charged dishonesty, i.e., in connection with the charge of using unjust measures,” and to the terms of the article itself, I am constrained to come to the conclusion that the verdict finding for the defender was contrary to evidence, being contrary to the defender’s own express admission that the pursuer was charged with being guilty of dishonest conduct.

Now, the article is, on the face of it, calumnious, and the defender’s admission being clear and distinct, and no issue having been taken in justification, the

¹ Craig v. Hunter, June 29, 1809, 15 F. C. 371.

² Faulks v. Park, Dec. 22, 1854, 17 D. 247, 27 Scot. Jur. 102.

No. 55.

Dec. 17, 1886.
Ross v.
McKittrick.

charge must, as I conceive, be held to be false; and the proper verdict for the jury in such circumstance to return was a verdict for the pursuer, with such damages, nominal or real, as they thought applicable to the case.

I have been averse to granting a new trial here, having in view the fact that an apology has been made by the defender. But it appears that this was not done until after the case had come into Court. I put it to the defender's counsel whether they knew of any instance where in such a case an apology of the description here made had been held to justify a verdict of the kind, but they were unable to name one. I cannot therefore see my way to come to any other result than that the rule must be made absolute, and a new trial granted.

LORD SHAND.—I concur with Lord Mure in thinking that in the circumstances it is inevitable that a new trial should be granted. It is important in considering the question to have in view the precise point of time at which the article complained of appeared. The pursuer was charged by the Procurator-fiscal of the Burgh Court of Edinburgh with what may be fairly called two distinct offences—at least the charge dealt with two different matters—the having in his possession measures which were not standard measures was one matter, and the second was that he had used measures which were “false and unjust.” The magistrate convicted him of having measures which were not standard measures, but declined to convict him of having acted falsely and dishonestly in the use of these measures, so that the result of the conviction was that the magistrate refused to affix any moral stigma upon him. It was in that state of matters that the article appeared, and the pursuer complains of it as having been false and calumnious, and as representing him as having been guilty of dishonest conduct in connection with his business in the International Exhibition. In other words, the pursuer complains that the article charged him with conduct which subjected him to a very serious moral stigma, viz, with dishonesty. That being so, the question for the jury, in the first place, was whether this article did go beyond a fair comment on the conviction; and it appears to me to be quite clear that it did so, for there was a distinct charge of dishonesty contained in it, and indeed the defender in the witness-box admitted that it bore that construction. The article cannot be read without this being at once apparent, and this is not surprising, for the writer of the article was under the erroneous impression that the conviction had found that false and unjust measures had been used. The article, indeed, in substance, stated that this was the fact. In these circumstances I am not surprised that counsel for the defender was unable to resist an admission that the article was false and calumnious. That being so, the result must be that the pursuer was entitled to a verdict. Apologies and expressions of regret may go to reduce damages. But if a legal wrong is committed by a false and calumnious charge being made, then a verdict for the pursuer must be returned, the jury being masters of the amount of damages to be awarded.

The verdict was worded in very peculiar terms, for instead of a simple finding for the defender, it repeated the words of the issue. That seems to indicate that the jury held that the charge was false and calumnious, but would not find that the result was loss, injury, and damage to the pursuer. But if such a charge was made, then, in the absence of an issue of veritas, it follows there must be damages given. I think the pursuer is entitled to a verdict which will clear his character, and that the present verdict cannot stand.

As already noticed, it has been suggested that the article may be sustained as being a fair comment upon the proceedings at the trial. But I think there are fatal objections to such a view. If there had been a conviction upon both charges, then there would have been room for strong comment, and it would have been very desirable that there should be strong comment. But the conviction was, as I have said, limited to the charge that the accused had the measures in question in his possession, while the article proceeded, indeed asserted, that the conviction had in point of fact gone farther, and commented on the conviction, taking that view of it. In such a case it is impossible successfully to represent that the article only contains fair comment.

No. 55.

Dec. 17, 1886.

Ross v.

M'Kittrick.

LORD ADAM.—It appears to me that the verdict for the defender necessarily affirms that the defender has not represented that the pursuer was guilty of dishonest conduct. I quite think that the question whether the article was calumnious or not was properly left to the jury. But I do not think that a jury is more infallible in a libel case than in any other, and if juries go wrong, as they do occasionally, I do not see any reason why in these, as in any other cases, they should not be corrected. In this case I have no doubt that the jury has gone wrong. The admission of the defender himself that the article does accuse the pursuer of dishonesty is enough to shew that the verdict is a wrong one—and the accusation did not merely refer to the keeping illegal measures, it also extended to the using of false and unjust measures. No doubt the article was a comment on the trial, but the writer was under a mistake in imagining that there had been a conviction upon the charge of using the false measures. It may have been a mere mistake, but that is not a sufficient excuse. The pursuer is entitled to have a verdict which will clear his character. That means that there must be a verdict for the pursuer, which is the only verdict consistent with the evidence in the case. That being my view, I see no other course but to send the case to be tried anew.

LORD M'LAREN.—As I believe I stand alone in the opinion which I have formed regarding this motion, I think it necessary that I should state my views in some detail. The question is one of considerable importance, and, so far as I know, there is no precedent since the institution of jury trials in Scotland for interfering with the verdict of a jury in a case of libel where the question is between a verdict for the defender and a verdict for the pursuer with nominal damages. I should have been satisfied if the verdict had been for the pursuer, accompanied with nominal damages, in accordance with the view which has been expressed by my colleagues who have already spoken. But I am also satisfied with the verdict which has been returned. There is a distinction, no doubt, between the two forms of verdict, but I think it is a distinction without a difference. I cannot see, either as regards the matter of real injury or as regards the vindication of the pursuer's character in the eyes of the public, that it is of the slightest consequence whether he receives a verdict with a farthing damages or whether a verdict is recorded against him.

I am, however, of opinion that the verdict returned was not against the weight of the evidence, but was one which the jury were entitled to give—having regard to the evidence which was before them. It must be observed that the pursuer was undoubtedly convicted before the Burgh Police Court of Edinburgh of a contravention of the Weights and Measures Act, the charges being, first, that

No. 55.

Dec. 17, 1886.

Ross v.
M'Kittrick.

he had used unjust measures, and, secondly, that he had in his possession measures which were not the legal and correct standard measures. The conviction was upon the latter charge only. Accordingly, there was a substantial acquittal upon the charge of using unjust measures. Nevertheless there was a conviction under the statute, and a punishment of a fine inflicted, so as clearly to constitute the offence a criminal one. The conviction was thereafter set aside in the High Court of Justiciary, where the Judges were divided in opinion, but that fact is of no importance so far as regards the question of the justice of the criticism of a case previously tried before a competent Court. What the defender professed to do in the article in question was to criticise the conduct of the pursuer as disclosed in a case which had been heard in Court, and in which he had been convicted of a criminal offence.

The next point in the order of events is that it has not been shewn, at least to my satisfaction, that the article in question contains any misstatements of the case. It is not a full report—it is rather of the nature of a leading article. But in the course of it the circumstances are fairly brought out, and also the different views which might be taken of these—both those for and those against the pursuer. There was an omission in the article: It was not stated that the pursuer had been absolved from the charge of using unjust measures, but neither was it stated that he had been convicted of that charge. In considering the import of the article, I think the pursuer is entitled to have it read just as if it had contained the words which are used in the innuendo, because the defender admitted in the witness-box that the article was meant to characterise the conduct of the pursuer as dishonest. Upon this I would remark that it was not a general accusation of dishonesty, which would have been a more serious matter. The issue puts it in this way:—"Whether the said article falsely and calumniously represents the pursuer as having been guilty of dishonest conduct in his business of purveyor to the said International Exhibition, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer,"—and I think the article is to be considered as if it had said in so many words that the pursuer had been guilty of dishonesty in the conduct of his business as purveyor to the Exhibition. There were two questions which the jury had to consider,—First, What was the meaning of the article? and second, Was it, or was it not, a fair comment upon the conduct of the pursuer as disclosed by the trial? Upon the first question there was no doubt, because the meaning attributed to the article by the pursuer was admitted by the defender. But, as I have said, the jury had further to consider whether the imputation of dishonesty was or was not within the bounds of fair criticism. It was argued to the jury that if the innuendo put upon the article was proved to their satisfaction damages must follow. I expressly told the jury that this was not the case, and that it was for them to say whether the article was, or was not, calumnious, and I do not understand that any of your Lordships take a different view. And I take it that by their verdict the jury in effect found that the article did not exceed the bounds of fair criticism, and that it was not calumnious.

The question whether words are defamatory is a question not so much of fact as of opinion. It is a matter which the practice of this country—I may almost say the constitution of this country—leaves entirely to the discretion of the jury, and I do not know how I can arrive at the conclusion that the verdict of the jury was against the weight of evidence where the facts have been fairly laid before them. Without going so far as to say whether I should have agreed with the jury or not, I think that the language of the article complained of was such that a jury might hold that it did not go beyond the bounds of fair criticism. No. 55.

Dec. 17, 1886.
Ross v.
M'Kittrick.

But, further, I think that the judgment which your Lordships are to pronounce really amounts to this, that it attributes to the Judges the function which is generally exercised by juries, of considering and determining whether the words used are libellous or not. I think this is just what the Judges in England in the last century tried to do in the prosecution in which Lord Erskine was counsel, and in which he successfully asserted the right of the jury to give a general verdict, and to determine whether the words used were, or were not, defamatory. In consequence of that case an Act of Parliament was passed which is known as Fox's Libel Act (32 Geo. IV. cap. 60). That Act is, I think, a clear indication of what the Legislature thought was the proper function of juries in actions of libel. It provides that, in all cases of libel, the jury "may give a general verdict of guilty or not guilty upon the whole matter put in issue upon such indictment or information, and shall not be required or directed by the Court or Judge before whom such indictment or information shall be tried to find the defendant or defendants guilty merely on the proof of the publication by such defendant or defendants of the paper charged to be a libel, and of the sense ascribed to the same in such indictment or information." The statute applies to criminal prosecutions, and therefore I do not quote it as a direct authority. But I do not conceive that the functions of a jury are materially different in criminal and civil cases depending on the same facts.

It seems to me that if the Court takes the course of sending this case to a new trial it is in effect assuming that upon proof of the words used, and upon proof of the sense attributed to them, the jury must, in accordance with the direction of the Judge, find a verdict for the pursuer, which is the very thing the statute says they are not to do. I should be strongly opposed to making a precedent which would take from juries the discretion which I think they have, upon the whole, fairly exercised of distinguishing between cases in which damage has been suffered and cases, such as this, where no substantial injury has been done, and where the whole matter has arisen out of a mistake, for which an apology was offered.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The publication of the alleged libel in this case was admitted, and it was also not matter of dispute that the article applied to the pursuer, and, therefore, the only question remaining for the consideration of the jury was, whether the article falsely and calumniously represented the pursuer as having been guilty of dishonest conduct in the business of purveyor at the International Exhibition, to his loss, injury, and damage.

What is the meaning of a verdict for the defender upon such an issue? It can mean nothing but this, that the article did not falsely and calumniously represent the pursuer as having been guilty of such dishonest conduct. Lord McLaren seems to think that the difference between this and a verdict for the pursuer, with nominal damages, is immaterial; or, in other words, that it is a distinction without a difference. I cannot assent to that. To say that a man has been calumniated, and to say that he has not been calumniated, appears to me to constitute a substantial distinction with a very great difference. A verdict for the defender means in a case of libel either that there has been no attack upon the pursuer's character at all, or that he has come into

No. 56. On 11th December 1886 the pursuers moved for decree in terms of the joint minute.

Dec. 17, 1886.
Jack, &c. v.
North British
Railway Co.

The defenders appeared, and stated that they wished to be certain that they got a valid discharge, and that some of the children being pupils and others minors, and no curator having been appointed to them, there was some doubt whether they could grant a valid discharge, or whether their mother could do so. As regarded the pupils, probably under sec. 2 of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. chap. 27), the mother of the pupils, being "the guardian of the infant," could grant a valid discharge for them just as the father might have done had he been alive. The question as to whether minors could validly discharge such a debt as this did not appear ever to have been expressly settled.¹

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case there was an issue in which the children of the late John Jack claimed damages to the extent of £2100, or £300 to each of them, they being seven in number. The case did not go to trial, but was settled by a joint minute, in which the pursuers accepted a tender, which had previously been made, of a payment of £350 in all, or alternatively of a payment of £50 to each child. The case now comes here on a motion by the pursuers for decree.

Of the seven children five are in pupillarity, and two have attained minority, and the question comes to be, how are the defenders to obtain a valid discharge? As regards the five pupil children, I think all difficulty is at an end, for by the recent statute the mother is entitled to act as tutor or guardian to her children, and she has apparently just as good a right to grant a discharge as the father would have had had he been alive.

But as regards the minor children, the question is of greater difficulty. No curator has been appointed to them, and therefore it is doubted by the defenders whether they can grant a good discharge. That is a point which we have not yet had occasion to consider in reference to the question under consideration. Three cases have been laid before us. The first is Pratt v. Knox, June 28, 1855, 17 D. 1006. There the Court refused to grant decree against the defenders for payment to the curator ad litem for behoof of minor children, or to appoint him curator bonis without a formal application in the usual way. That case obviously does not apply here. The next case was that of Anderson v. Kidd.² There a widow and her children were the pursuers of the action, and the Court refused to grant decree until a factor loco tutoris was appointed, because the mother declined to hold the sum awarded by the jury in trust for herself and the children subject to the orders of the Court. There only remains the case of Anderson v. Muirhead, June 4, 1884, 11 R. 870. That was a case of minors, but there there was no demand for decree in the children's own names, and therefore the point we have here did not arise. The minors considered that they ought to have a guardian, and therefore the Court refused to proceed until a curator was appointed.

In the present case the minors ask for decree in their own name. As to the general rule applicable to the case, there is perhaps no place where it is better stated than by Mr Erskine in his Institutes (i. 7, 33), where he says,—“Every deed of a minor who has no curators is as effectual as if he had curators, and had acted with their consent.” That statement is subject to some qualification, and Professor More states as accurately as anyone the result of the cases, where he says (Lectures, i. p. 110),—“Where minors have no curators they may act by themselves, and payments made to them by their debtors will be valid and effectual. But the Court of Session will not in every instance compel a debtor to pay to a minor who has no curators, at least without his giving security to keep the debtor indemnified, thus indirectly compelling the minor, where this appears to be necessary for his own protection, to have curators appointed to him.” Now, the case in which the qualification alluded to was given effect to is that cited in Lord Fraser’s book on Parent and Child, pp. 337-338, viz., Kirkman v. Pym, 1782, M. 8977, and it affords a good illustration of the sort of qualification with which the general doctrine of Erskine is to be received. Pym was there indebted to Kirkman in “a large sum of money secured by a heritable bond upon some houses in Edinburgh.” On the death of Kirkman, his son succeeded, but no curators were appointed to him, and he chose none himself. While in minority he claimed payment of this “large sum of money secured by heritable bond.” It was observed on the Bench,—“This question, which relates to the payment of a principal sum or sors, is to be distinguished from all cases in which the interest only of money or the rents of subjects are claimed,—those ordinary acts of administration which might be necessary for a minor’s support.” “The Lords were of opinion that as the debtor could not even by making full money be secure against future challenge unless the money were to be afterwards profitably employed for the minor’s behoof, so the Court ought not to interpose their authority in order to compel him to do an act which would subject him to that hazard.” Now, the distinction taken there is between large capital sums which fall to be invested and income, and it is a very important distinction, but it is in applying this doctrine that the only difficulty lies. It appears to me that this sum, which each minor proposes to discharge, cannot be described as a large sum which falls to be invested, or as anything equivalent to it. It is simply a sum which the law has given to the children to repair the loss they have sustained through the death of their father, and that loss is just the liability he would have been under to maintain and educate them, and if the sum which comes in place of that is this £50 a-piece, that seems to me to be intended to satisfy the immediate purposes of maintenance and education, and to fall within the rule and not under the exception, and therefore I think the minors can grant a valid discharge to the defenders.

¹ In Sharp v. Pathhead Spinning Co., Jan. 30, 1885, 12 R. 574, the Second Division appointed a trustee to hold a fund of this kind for a minor, and in Collins, &c. v. Eglinton Iron Co., Feb. 2, 1882, 9 R. 500, the same Division de plano appointed a factor loco tutoris to pupils.

² Not reported, but see Lord President's opinion in Anderson v. Muirhead, June 4, 1884, 11 R. 870.

LORD MURE, LORD SHAND, and LORD ADAM concurred.

A minute was lodged sisting the mother as tutor to the pupil pursuers, and

THE COURT thereafter pronounced this interlocutor:—“Decern against the defenders (first) for payment to” the minor pursuers “of the sum of £50 sterling each, with interest thereon from 27th July 1886 till paid, and (second) for payment to the said Mrs Mary Gray Wilson or Jack, as tutor foresaid, of the sum of £250, with interest thereon from said date till paid.”

DOVE & LOCKHART, S.S.C.—MILLAR, ROBSON, & INNES, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 56.

Dec. 17, 1886.
Jack, &c. v.
North British
Railway Co.

No. 57. UNITED HORSE SHOE AND NAIL COMPANY, LIMITED, Pursuers (Reclaimers).

—*Guthrie Smith—Shaw.*Dec. 17, 1886.
United Horse
Shoe and Nail
Co. Limited, v.
Stewart & Co.JOHN STEWART & COMPANY, Defenders (Respondents).—Asher—Ure.Patent—Damages—Infringement of subsidiary part of patented mechanism.—

Where articles are manufactured by means of pirated machinery, it is relevant for the patentees to aver as grounds of damage that they have suffered from loss of market, and obtained smaller prices for the patented goods, owing to the competition of the infringers.

In an action of damages brought by a company engaged in the manufacture of horse-shoe nails against another company engaged in the same manufacture for damages caused by the defenders' infringement of patents belonging to the pursuers for improvements in the mechanism used in the manufacture, the defenders admitted that certain boxes of nails, manufactured and sold by them, had been made by means of machines which, in a previous action, had been held to be in certain minute particulars infringements of the pursuers' patents; but they proved that the pirated portions of the mechanism were not essential to the manufacture of the nails, and that without using these portions they could have made the nails as well, and almost, if not quite, as cheaply, as with them. Held that inasmuch as infringement of patented right was admitted, it must be assumed that the pirated mechanism was of some utility, although it was proved to be but small, and that the amount of damages fell to be assessed on the footing that the infringer must pay merely for the benefit which he had taken from the use of the improvements pirated. Damages assessed at £50.

1st Division.
Lord Kinnear.
B.

IN May 1885 the United Horse Shoe and Nail Company, Limited, raised an action of damages against John Stewart & Company, iron merchants, Glasgow, concluding for payment of £10,000 in respect of infringement of certain patent rights.

The pursuers founded on a judgment of Lord Kinnear, Ordinary, which was acquiesced in and had become final, pronounced on 20th March 1885, in a process of suspension and interdict at their instance against the defenders, in which he interdicted the defenders from infringing letters-patent No. 2432, granted in 1872, and No. 4078, granted in 1878. Of these patents, No. 4078 related to machinery for the process of punching in the manufacture of horse shoe nails, No. 2432 was an "interceptor," which was a part of the finishing machine, and was not actually used in the manufacture of the nails, but merely came into use in case of an obstruction arising in the supply of nails to the machine.

The pursuers in the action of damages averred that such nails as they sold could be made only by the use of the patented mechanism, and that, consequently, the infringement enabled the defenders to compete with them in the market, when otherwise the pursuers would have had the field to themselves. They averred further that by underselling the pursuers, the defenders had brought down prices, and had seriously injured the pursuers' trade connection and business profits.

The defenders admitted that certain boxes of nails manufactured and sold by them had been made by means of machinery which, in the interdict process, had been held to be in certain particulars an infringement of the pursuers' patents, but denied that nails such as they produced could only be made by using the mechanism covered by the patent, or that they had undersold the pursuers or injured their business. They further founded on the opinion delivered by Lord Kinnear, in the suspension and interdict, averring in accordance therewith (1) that in that action the pursuers founded on five separate letters-patent, and failed entirely on three of them, (2) that the letters-patent No. 4078 now founded on concluded with six claims, but that interdict had been granted only in respect of an infringement of the sixth, and that the least important claim, which related only to an unimportant part of the mechanism used; and (3) that the letters-patent No. 2432 now founded on concluded with two claims, but that interdict had been granted only in respect of infringement of the second, and that the less important claim, which protected only a subsidiary part of the mechanism used.

No. 57.

Dec. 17, 1886.
United Horse
Shoe and Nail
Co. Limited, v.
Stewart & Co.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defenders having infringed the said two letters-patent No. 2432 of 1872, and No. 4078 of 1878, as aforesaid, and having thereby caused serious loss, injury, and damage to the pursuers, they are liable in reparation therefor to the pursuers.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The pursuers having suffered no damage in consequence of the defenders' actings, absolvitor should be pronounced, with expenses.

Issues were adjusted for the trial of the case before the Lord Ordinary and a jury, but a reclaiming note and a notice of motion to vary the issues having been presented to the Inner-House by the defenders, at the discussion both parties agreed that the proof should proceed before the Lord Ordinary. On the motion of the defenders an assessor was named to hear the case along with the Lord Ordinary in terms of the Patents Act, 1883, but before the proof it was intimated that the parties were agreed to dispense with the assistance of the assessor.

Thereafter the minute of admissions quoted infra was adjusted.*

After hearing evidence, the import of which is fully given in Lord Adam's opinion, the Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) pronounced this interlocutor on 11th March 1886:—"Having considered the cause, productions, and whole proceedings, decerns against the defenders for the sum of £530 sterling: Finds the pursuers entitled to expenses."†

* In this minute it was stated that "the defenders, with the view of limiting the proof in this action, but merely for the purposes of this action, admitted and hereby admit that all the horse-shoe nails imported by the defenders from Sweden prior to 20th March 1885, consisting of 6215 boxes of 25lbs each, and all the horse-shoe nails sold by them prior to 20th March 1885, consisting of 5752 boxes of 25lbs each (of which 1390 boxes were made entirely without the use of the interceptor forming part of the subject of the letters-patent No. 2432 after mentioned) were made by machines not differing from the machines belonging to Messrs Kollen" (manufacturers of the nails in question abroad), " . . . and in contravention of claim 2 of the letters-patent No. 2432 of 1872, and claim 6 of No. 4078 of 1878, in respect of which interdict was granted; and that of said 5752 boxes, 2481 boxes were made and sold prior to the 23d May 1884, 200 of which were made without the use of the interceptor, the remaining boxes being made between that date and the 20th March 1885, of which 1459 boxes were made without the use of the said interceptor. The pursuers, on the other hand, only for the purposes of this action, do not maintain that said nails were made by mechanism constructed in contravention of claim 1 of No. 2432, nor of the claims of No. 4078 other than the 6th."

† "OPINION.—I think it is clear, from the evidence which has now been adduced, that from the date of the agreements with the United Horse Nail Company, the pursuers were in right of the patents which were subsequently formally assigned to them by the assignation founded upon. They were bound by the agreement to take over the pending contracts and liabilities of the former company as from its date; and the evidence shews that they did in fact take over the business on the 28th of June, or at all events in the beginning of July 1883; and I think it follows that any infringement of the patent right after the 28th June, or the beginning of July, was an injury to the pursuers, for which they are entitled to compensation.

"Now, that leaves only one question,—the question of the amount of damages,—and I do not think it is in general necessary or desirable to give

No. 57.

Dec. 17, 1886.
United Horse
Shoe and Nail
Co. Limited, v.
Stewart & Co.

The pursuers reclaimed, but at the opening of the discussion in the Inner-House the defenders' counsel intimated in answer to the Court that reasons in detail for fixing damages; because, although the elements which ought to be taken into account may be capable of more or less exact definition, still in most cases the estimate of the particular sum which the pursuer may be entitled to as compensation must be made upon somewhat vague and conjectural considerations. It is really a jury question. But there are one or two points in this case as to which I think it is due to the parties that I should say how far I take them into consideration.

"In the first place, the defenders say, and I think rightly, that the pursuers can only recover compensation for the actual loss which they have sustained; and, on the other hand, it is said with equal justice that every sale of a patented article is an injury to the patentee or to the assignees of the patent; and prima facie, therefore, it would appear to me that the true measure of damage should be the amount of profit which the assignees of the patent would have made if they had themselves carried through those sales, because the loss which they have sustained is simply the loss of profit upon sales, which it may be presumed they would have made, were it not for the wrongful intervention of the defenders. But then it is said—and there is force in the consideration—that it is rather an assumption than a matter of certain inference to say that if the infringers had not interfered, the sales made by them must necessarily have been made by the pursuers; because there are other considerations which go to the effecting of sales, such as connection in trade, and energy and skill in the conduct of business, and therefore it does not necessarily follow that the pursuers would have made every sale which the defenders succeeded in making, if the defenders had not interfered at all. There is another consideration which the defenders have urged, and perhaps a more formidable one, because they say that the patents have only been infringed in so far as they apply to two separate parts of the process of the manufacture of shoe nails, and that those two parts are in themselves of subordinate importance; and therefore they say that they have derived no material advantage from the infringement, because the real merit of the nails they have sold is not attributable to the patented mechanism, or to any process or mechanism that is not open to the public. And therefore they say that since no considerable portion of the profit they have made upon the sales in question can be traced to their use of the patented machinery, the pursuers are entitled only to nominal damages, if they are entitled to damages at all. Now, as to the matter of fact upon which that argument was founded, I think that if I were to proceed merely upon the evidence which had been adduced in this case, and which was not adduced in the former action, as to the value and utility of the particular part of the punching machine which is covered by the claim which the defenders are said to have infringed, there might have been considerable force in the defenders' argument. But then the argument goes too far; because the purpose of the device in question is to save waste, and the evidence, according to their view of it, is that, so far from saving waste, it really involves greater waste than the former process of manufacture; or, in other words, that the supposed invention is perfectly worthless, and therefore that the patent is void from inutility. But it is an admission in the case that the patent No. 4078 has been infringed by the defenders in the particular respect set forth in their minute. Now, that means that there is a good patent, which necessarily means that there is a patent for a useful and meritorious invention, which the defenders have infringed, and that is the admission upon which I am asked to proceed, in considering the question of damages, and therefore I cannot assume anything contrary to that, but must, on the contrary, assume that the particular piece of mechanism which is covered by this part of the patent is a useful and meritorious part of the invention—that the value of the patent is what the patentee alleges—that it saves waste, and therefore saves cost of manufacture. I should not, however, have thought the matter of very much importance, in so far as the argument rests upon this patent alone, if the pursuers had been in a position to say that all the sales of which they complain involved an infringe-they proposed to take advantage of the pursuers' reclaiming note, and to ask the Court to find nominal damages only due by the defenders. No. 57.

ment of the other patent, No. 2432; because, in order to the production of the manufactured articles which form the subject of this complaint, it is necessary to use not only the machine which is covered by the patent No. 4078, the punching machine, but also the finishing machine, which is covered by No. 2432, and, according to the opinion of the late Professor Fleeming Jenkin, and according to the evidence in the former case, the finishing machine is certainly an exceedingly ingenious and useful invention. It is covered by three separate patents—the pursuers, at least, maintained it was covered by three separate patents,—but of these there is only one that I was able in the former action to sustain as valid; but still the mechanism covered by that single patent, No. 2432, is undoubtedly very ingenious and useful; and, therefore, if every nail that has been sold by the defenders involved in its production an infringement of that patent, I should not have thought it very material to consider, for the purposes of this question, whether it involved the infringement also of any part of patent No. 4078.

“But then the admission that the defenders, by importing and selling the nails in question, have infringed the patent for the finishing machine, is qualified by the counter admission that the infringement of that machine arises only with reference to the sale of a certain portion of the cases of nails imported and sold by the defenders. I think something like 1800 odds out of 5000 odds cases of nails have been produced, according to the admission, without infringing that patent. As to the question of law that was suggested as arising upon that admission, all I think it necessary to say is, that it is a misapprehension to suppose that it was decided in the former case that there could be no infringement of the patent without taking the interceptor as well as the moveable gate, which is patented as in combination with the interceptor. That was not decided. It was a question that did not arise, and was not necessary to be considered, because there was no question in the former case that the defenders had imitated the interceptor, nor that they had imitated the combination if I was right in the view I took of the evidence as to the similarity of their machine to the pursuers' machine. Therefore it is a misapprehension to suppose that there was any decision as to the possibility of infringing No. 2432 without taking both the moveable gate, which is a material part of that invention, and the interceptor, which is also a material part of it. Of course, I say nothing for the purpose of deciding it now, because for the purposes of this action the parties are agreed as to what is to be taken as the condition of the infringement,—the admitted fact as to the infringement is that the defenders are to be held as having infringed No. 2432 by the importation and sale of those cases of shoe nails, but of those cases alone which were produced by the use of the interceptor.

“Now, that being the state of facts upon which this argument for reducing the damages to nominal damages is founded, the question is whether the defenders are well founded in maintaining that, by reason of the infringement being applicable only to those portions of the patented machine which I have described, the pursuers are precluded from saying that the loss which they have sustained by the infringement is the loss of the profit they would have made upon the sale of the nails if they had sold them themselves. And there certainly is a great deal of authority for saying that, where only a part of a complex machine is protected by a patent, the infringer cannot be made liable for the aggregate profit derived from the entire machine, as if that were the profit he had made by the use of the patent. But then the cases cited by the Solicitor-General, in which that consideration was thought to be material, were not actions of damages for infringement. They were suits in equity for ascertaining the profits obtained by the infringers, charging them as trustees for the patentee, and in such case it would be exceedingly material to shew that a part of the profit for which they were asked to account was really attributable to processes which were not covered by the patent at all. For the only question in these cases is what advantage the infringer has derived from the use of the patent over and above what he

Dec. 17, 1886.
United Horse
Shoe and Nail
Co. Limited, v.
Stewart & Co.

No. 57.

Dec. 17, 1886.
United Horse
Shoe and Nail
Co. Limited, v.
Stewart & Co.

Argued for the pursuers ;—The defenders' admission of infringement of the two letters-patent, against infringement of which they were admit-would have got from the use of processes open to the public, and this is very clearly explained in the American case of Moury v. Whitney, quoted by the Solicitor-General. The question as to the patentee's loss does not enter into the consideration at all, because, as the law was stated in the House of Lords in Betts v. De Vitre, the basis of the claim for profits is that the patentee condones the infringement and does not complain of it, but seeks to recover the whole profit made by the infringer as if it had been made as trustee for him. But this is an action of damages for infringement, and the question is, not what profit the infringer has made, but what loss the patentee has sustained ; and what the pursuer complains of is that he having a sale for articles of common use, which was of great value to him, by the use of his patented machine, the defenders have infringed his patent right by interfering with his business, and depriving him of the sales which he alone would have made if the defenders had not pirated his machine. Now, if the pursuers have lost the profit they would have made upon these sales by reason of the defenders' infringement, it does not appear to me to be of very much importance whether you can trace the profit which they would have made, or how much you can trace to the use of a particular portion of their machine. What they have lost is the sale. The great value of all machines of that kind consists not merely in their producing a superior article, but in their producing that article at a cost which enables the patentees to put it upon the market so as to command large sales, and that is what they lose by an infringement which enables others to compete with them.

"Therefore it appears to me to be a fair enough ground for estimating their damages to take the whole profits which they would have made upon the sales actually made by the defenders, if the defenders had not interfered so as to prevent the pursuers effecting those sales themselves. That would mean the difference between the cost of manufacture and the prices at which they were selling at the time to their own agent. No doubt there are the considerations to which I have adverted which ought to be taken into account. I cannot hold it as absolutely certain that they would have made the whole of these sales. That is a consideration, however, which I think is not capable of being estimated very exactly in money, and before determining as to the weight which is to be given to it there is another point to be taken into view—a ground upon which the pursuers maintain that the profit upon their sales—I mean the profit upon the defenders' sales at the actual rate at which the pursuers are selling for the time—is by no means sufficient to compensate them for the loss which they have actually sustained, because they say that they have been compelled by the wrongful competition of the defenders to lower their prices to their own agent in Scotland, and, therefore, that to give them full compensation the profits of which they have been deprived by the defenders are not to be estimated at the rates at which they were selling at the dates when the actual infringement took place, but at the higher rate at which they were enabled to sell before the defenders began to compete with them, or before the competition of the defenders had brought down their prices so considerably as they say it in fact succeeded in doing ; and, for the same reason, they say it follows that they must also have the difference between the prices which they actually earned on their own sales to their agent in Scotland and the rates they would have earned if there had been no competition. Now, I think this additional claim would not be unreasonable if the grounds in fact upon which it rests could be satisfactorily established, for, if they have the sole right of manufacturing and selling horse-shoe nails produced by their machine, they might well be entitled to damages for interference with their business over and above loss and profit on the actual sales of nails imported by the defenders. But then I think they have failed to prove damage on this account—at least to such an extent as would enable me to make any satisfactory estimate of the amount which they have lost in this way ; because, though it is true there has been a considerable fall in prices since the beginning of 1883, when the defenders first began to sell nails made by the

No. 57.

Dec. 17, 1886.
United Horse
Shoe and Nail
Co. Limited, v.
Stewart & Co.

tedly interdicted, afforded conclusive proof of the fact that they had adopted a valuable improvement, otherwise they would not have used it. Without using it they could not successfully have competed against the pursuers in the market,* and the latter were therefore entitled to damages upon the footing that the defenders' presence in the market was due entirely to the piracy. If that were so, damages to a much larger extent than had been awarded by the Lord Ordinary were due. The true measure of damages was the amount of profit which the holders of the patent would have made had they themselves carried through the sales, for it must be presumed that had the defenders not made these sales the pursuers would have done so, there being no other nails of anything like the same quality in the market. Further, the effect of there being two nails of the same quality in the market was to drive down the prices, and, therefore, in estimating the amount of damages due the sales should be calculated as if they had taken place when the nails were at the higher price at which they were when the pursuers were alone in the market, and not at the lower price which they fetched when competition had been brought to bear.

Argued for the defenders ;—The evidence shewed that the nails sold by them could have been produced equally well without using the patent machines which have been found to infringe the pursuers' patents, I do not think it is proved that the competition of the defenders was the sole cause of that fall. There is evidence that, however excellent the pursuers' nails may be, there were other nails in the market with which they had to compete, and, independently of competition, there are other causes for the fluctuation of prices which do not appear to me to be excluded by the evidence. Therefore I am not able to give any precise pecuniary value to this element of loss which the pursuers allege. The result is that there are considerations tending, on the one hand, to increase, and, on the other, to diminish, the compensation to which the pursuers would be entitled if their loss of the profits which they might have earned upon the sale of the same number of cases of nails as the defenders have sold, in violation of their patent, were to be taken as the true measure of damage. But they are neither of them capable of any precise pecuniary estimation, and I think the fair result is that these considerations on either side, which cannot be estimated with precision, should be allowed to neutralise one another, and therefore that the measure of damage should be the difference between the cost of manufacture and the profit which they would have obtained upon the sale to their own agent in Scotland of as many cases of nails as are admitted to have been sold by the defenders in violation of the patents, taking the rates which they obtained at the time when the infringement actually took place.

"Now, the evidence as to that is that, if the whole 5752 boxes were in question, the amount of damages would be £611, but the pursuers were not in right of the patents until the end of June 1883, and I think about 700 of the 5752 boxes were imported by the defenders prior to the end of June 1883, and therefore I think the sum of £611 brought out in the pursuers' evidence must suffer deduction to the extent of 700 boxes. The result of that is that I think a fair compensation to the pursuers will be £530. I do not know that that is the exact amount, but it is within a few pounds of the profit which, I think, they might have obtained if the defenders had not interfered. It is right to add, though I daresay I have said it already, with reference to the argument which the defenders urged upon the extent of the infringement of the pursuers' patent, that, in my opinion, the defenders have infringed, and have admitted upon their admissions a very substantial infringement of, a really valuable patent, and therefore the suggestion that this is a case for mere nominal damages is entirely without foundation."

[The defenders having only tendered £251, the pursuers were found entitled to expenses.]

* For details of the inventions and such a statement of the evidence as is necessary, see Lord Adam's opinion, infra, 274.

No. 57.

Dec. 17, 1886.
United Horse
Shoe and Nail
Co. Limited, v.
Stewart & Co.

No. 4078, which had nothing to do with any method of making nails, but was designed only to save waste in the punching.* No doubt the defenders had acquiesced in the judgment in the interdict case, and here had admitted infringement. That inferred that the patent infringed was valid, and therefore useful, but the question how great the utility was one for the Court to decide. The proof here went to shew that the utility was very small, and therefore the admission ought to be taken as meaning that the utility was only great enough to render the patent valid. As regarded the second letter-patent, No. 2432, which related to a piece of mechanism called an interceptor, the same argument applied. It was proved by the pursuers' own manager† that the interceptor was injurious to the machine, and had been for some years discarded, so that the fact that the nails could be made without that piece of mechanism was not open to doubt. That had in fact been done. Upon the authority of American decisions it was plain that damages for infringement of a small and unimportant part of a complicated machine must not be assessed upon the same principle as where the whole machine had been taken.¹ On the evidence it was shewn that it was not the defenders' competition which had lowered prices, and that the pursuers had taken the lead in under-selling.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—This is an action brought by the pursuers for damages in respect of the infringements of two patents belonging to them. These are, first, claim 6 of letters-patent No. 4078, and claim 2 of letters-patent No. 2432, both being used in the manufacture of horse-shoe nails, the first in connection with the punching-machine and the second in connection with the finishing-machine.

The Lord Ordinary has found the pursuers entitled to a sum of £530 as the damage sustained by them in respect of the infringement by the defenders of these two patents.

He has arrived at that result in this way—The number of cases of nails sold by the defenders between the end of June 1883, when the pursuers acquired right to the patents, and the 20th March 1885, when the sale of the nails by the defenders was stopped by interdict, was 5052, and the sum of £530 is the amount of profit (that is, the difference between the cost of manufacture and the prices at which the nails were selling at the time) which the pursuers would have realised on the footing that they would have sold all these nails themselves. There are, however, two other elements which the Lord Ordinary has taken into consideration; the one is that he thinks it is not certain that the pursuers would themselves have made the whole of those sales, a consideration which goes to diminish the amount of the damages, and the other is that the competition of the defenders may to some extent have lowered the selling price of the nails in the market, and so have diminished the pursuers' profits.

"The result is," he adds, "that there are considerations tending on the one hand to increase and on the other to diminish the compensation to which the pursuers would be entitled if their loss of the profit which they might have earned upon the sale of the same number of cases of nails as the defenders have sold in violation of their patent were to be taken as the true measure of damage. But they are neither of them capable of any precise pecuniary compensation, and I think the fair result is, that these considerations on either side, which cannot be estimated with precision, should be allowed to neutralise one another," and so he arrives at the result of giving as damages to the pursuers the profits which would have been realised by them had they themselves sold the whole of the nails sold by the defenders.

* See Lord Adam's opinion, p. 275.

† See Lord Shand's opinion, p. 281.

¹ Authorities cited.—Curtis on Patents, pp. 55-9; Jones v. Morehead, 1863, 1 Wallace (U. S. Reps.) 155; Mowry v. Whitney, 1871, 14 Wallace (U. S. Reps.) 620; Suffolk Company v. Hayden, 1865, 3 Wallace (U. S. Reps.) 315; Yale Lock Company v. Sargent, 1885, 117 U. S. Reports, 536; Watson v. Holliday, 1882, L. R., 20 Chanc. Div. 780.

No. 57.
Dec. 17, 1886.
United Horse
Shoe and Nail
Co. Limited, v.
Stewart & Co.

I am not satisfied that the basis on which the Lord Ordinary has thus rested his award of damages is sound.

I see nothing in the proof to shew, or to make it probable, that the pursuers would have made all these sales. There is nothing in the proof to shew that purchasers generally would have this particular nail, and none other. There is keen competition in the nail trade, and no doubt these sales were in large part due to the exertions of the defenders' agents. I do not think therefore that it is either proved, or that it would be at all in accordance with the fact to presume, that the pursuers, but for the intervention of the defenders, would have effected the whole or any large part of these sales. If the pursuers had had a monopoly of horse-shoe nails, and if none could have been manufactured or sold except by the use of their patents, probably the assumption made by the Lord Ordinary would be correct enough, but I do not think it is so where, as in this case, there are many competing nails in the market, all apparently equally sought after. Neither am I satisfied that even in that case the whole profits of the manufacture would furnish the true measure of the damages to be awarded. I cannot help thinking that the Lord Ordinary has been misled by the supposed analogy of the case in which a patentee, as he is entitled to do, claims, not damages in the proper sense, but the profits made by the infringer by the use of the patent infringed, in which case the profits made by the infringer on the sales is the measure of the patentee's claim.

The pursuers, however, maintain that by the use of the parts of the punching and finishing machines which the defenders have infringed the defenders have been enabled to compete with them so as not only to force down the selling price of the nails in the market, and thus diminish their profits, but also to reduce the amount of sales of the nails which they would otherwise have effected.

It appears to me that these are perfectly relevant grounds of damage, and, if established in fact, would entitle the pursuers to corresponding damages. But the defenders reply that it was not because of their use of the infringed patents that they were enabled to manufacture and sell the nails in question, which they say could and would have been manufactured and sold by them as freely and cheaply if they had not used these patents, and they further say that it was not the competition of their nails which brought down the price in the market, upon which they say their nails had no appreciable effect, but the competition of other nails, and if such be the state of the fact it would appear that the pursuers' claim for damages must fail.

As I have said, the infringed patents are claim No. 6 of patent No. 4078, and claim No. 2 of patent No. 2434.

With reference to patent No. 4078, the defenders maintained that they had, by inadvertence, failed in a previous case between them and the pursuers to contest the validity of this patent, and they have led evidence in this case to

No. 57.

Dec. 17, 1886.
United Horse
Shoe and Nail
Co. Limited, v.
Stewart & Co.

shew that the patent was of no utility, and therefore invalid. But I agree with the Lord Ordinary that for the purposes of this case the defenders are bound by the admission contained in their minute, which necessarily means that the particular piece of mechanism which is covered by this part of the patent is a useful and meritorious invention in respect that it saves waste, and therefore cost of manufacture.

But that does not preclude inquiry into the degree of usefulness of the patent, and the amount of waste saved by its use, facts which, having regard to the pleas of parties, it is necessary to ascertain in this case.

Claim No. 6 of No. 4078 is described in the letters-patent as "an improvement in the art or method of making animal shoe nails, which consists in punching from a rolled ribbed plate blanks of different widths, those cut from one edge of the plate being wider at or near their heads than those cut from the other edge of the plate, the object being to economise waste heretofore common and necessary when cutting blanks of equal width."

The punching machine is, I understand, a complicated and ingenious piece of machinery which the defenders were entitled to use. The invention patented consisted of the use in the punching machine of a matrix and die constructed so as to punch out blanks of different widths, but the patent in no way affected or interfered with the defenders' right to use the punching machinery with matrices and dies adapted to punch out blanks of the same size. The process patented was in no way required for the manufacture of the nail—the only question is, whether by its use the nail can be manufactured more economically, and if so, to what extent.

The pursuers have examined one mechanical engineer, Mr Beck, who is of opinion that the saving of waste by the use of the patent would amount to from 10 to 15 per cent; while the defenders have examined two engineers, Messrs Cruickshank and Morton, who are equally positive that the use of the patent would result in an increase of waste.

The difference between them may, I think, be accounted for to a considerable extent by the fact that the defenders' witnesses assume, and perhaps rightly, that the patent is used exactly as described in the letters-patent, in which case I think they are right in saying that its use would result in increased waste, while the pursuers' witnesses, in order to prove that there is less waste, have to assume that not only a wider but also a longer blank is punched out. It may be that if this be done a saving may result, but it is to be remarked that there is nothing said in the letters-patent about the one blank being longer than the other.

Seeing that these machines have been in use by both pursuers and defenders for a considerable time, one would have expected that the question might have been brought to the test of actual experiment.

Mr Gibbs, the pursuers' manager, tells us from experiment that the waste has been reduced since the improvements in 1878 from 33 per cent to 16 per cent, but this experiment is of no value in the present question, because these improvements included others calculated to save waste besides the one in question.

Mr Cruickshank says that he ascertained by experiment that the total waste when punching nails of equal size was 7 per cent. If this be true, it shews that it was only on this small margin of 7 per cent that saving could be effected by the use of the patent. Mr Kollen, however, did make the experiment, and he tells us that—"I made an experiment to ascertain the amount of waste in punching blanks from the plate last summer. I took two blanks of equal width at the head, and of the same length, and the percentage of waste I got was 3·458. I made another experiment with another size of nail, and I got a little less waste, viz., 2·951 per cent. Then I made another experiment with the same size, the nails being of equal width at the head, but of different length, and I found that with the size which had before given 3·458 per cent of waste, I now got 5·647, and with the size which had before given 2·951 of waste, I now get 6·596 per cent. Then I made a third experiment with blanks of different width at the head and of different lengths, and I got 6·392 per cent of waste. I find from experience that there is more waste in punching blanks with broad heads at one side of the plate, and with narrower heads at the other. I find there is least waste when blanks are punched of equal width and equal length from opposite sides of the plate."

No. 57.

Dec. 17, 1886.
United Horse
Shoe and Nail
Co. Limited, v.
Stewart & Co.

If this evidence can be relied on, it would appear that there was no saving, but a loss, by the use of the patent, and Mr Kollen is not cross-examined at all as to this. Mr Kollen, however, continued to use the patent until he was interdicted, from which it may be inferred that he derived some advantage from it.

On the whole matter, I have come to the conclusion that if the patent is used exactly as described in the letters-patent, no saving is effected, but the reverse, and that in any view the saving is so immaterial that I have no doubt the defenders without its use would still have manufactured their nails, and competed with the pursuers just as they are doing now.

With reference to the infringement of claim No. 2 of patent No. 2434, this patent is for a piece of machinery called an interceptor, and is a part of the finishing machine. It will be observed that the interceptor has nothing to do with the fabrication of the nail. Mr Gibbs, the pursuers' manager in Sweden, says,—“When the machine is working properly, the interceptor has nothing whatever to do; it is an apparatus which comes into use only in case of obstruction or choking in the tunnel, so as to intercept the supply of blanks coming down. We have never used,” he says, “the interceptor described in the second claim in Sweden,” and a little further on he says, “We have entirely done away with the gate described in the specification as arranged to be opened by forward pressure. We have never used that in Europe at all. We found in America that it was not successful, and we have never used it in Sweden. It would not be an advantage in making nails, and we consequently did not adopt it.”

Mr Morton says there are innumerable means of counteracting a block without the use of an interceptor. One method, and one that is in use, is to drive the finishing-machine by means of a friction pulley, which will only stand a certain strain, and in the event of that strain being exceeded the pulley slips, and the whole machine comes to a stand. By adopting that method, nails can be as cheaply made as by the use of the interceptor, and Mr Kollen says, “Since March 1885, I have not used the interceptor in my nail-making machines. For sizes 11 and 12 we have not used it since the autumn of 1883. The interceptor on the machine we were working for these sizes at that time was broken, and we never repaired it. Instead of the interceptor to stop the supply of nails when a choke takes place, we use a friction pulley to drive the machine, and whenever a choke occurs, the resistance being greater than the pulley is able to overcome, the machine stops. I gave up its use,” he says, “altogether in January or February 1885. I did not find it an advantage when I used it.” And it is

No. 57. matter of admission that 1459 of the 5000 odd boxes of nails in question in this case were made without the use of the interceptor.

Dec. 17, 1886.
United Horse
Shoe and Nail
Co. Limited, v.
Stewart & Co.

It appears to me, in the face of this evidence, it is impossible to say that this patent was of much, if any, use in the process of manufacture.

With reference to the question whether the competition of the defenders' nails brought down the selling price of the pursuers' nails in the market, I am of opinion that they did not do so to any appreciable extent.

I think it is clearly proved that many nails of different kinds and descriptions keenly compete in the horse-shoe trade, and that it was the competition of these nails that brought and kept down the price, and that the price was not affected by any competition of the pursuers' and defenders' nails inter se.

I do not propose to analyse the evidence in detail, but I would refer to the evidence of Mr Seeley, the pursuers' manager. He says,—“There was a change in the price of our nails before 1883. The discount we gave was at first 30 per cent and then 35 per cent, and in the end of 1881, or beginning of 1882, I increased the price-list and changed the discount. I did so because before that we had been selling at a price that we could not live at. Prices for ordinary iron have fallen very much recently, but there has been no fluctuation recently in the price of the material and plate we use for years. I attribute the high rate of discount which we still maintain to competition alone. That applies to the period from March to September 1885 as well as before.”

Now, this is a very significant statement, because Mr Seeley says that the pursuers brought down their prices in 1881, but the defenders did not begin to sell till 1883, and he further says that he attributes the present high rate of discount, which is, in other words, the low rate of price, to competition alone, but the defenders ceased to use the infringed patents in March 1885, and the price not having risen since, the inference would seem to be that the market price was not affected by the defenders' use of the patents.

I would also refer to the evidence of Mr Goodall, Mr Lamb, and Mr Andrew Goodall, where an account will be found of a dozen or so in number of nails which were competing in the market, and their evidence is confirmed by that of some purchasers and sellers of nails. On the whole matter I have no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the competition of the defenders' nails had no appreciable effect on the market price at which nails were selling.

If this be so, and if I am right in thinking that the defenders could and would have equally competed with the pursuers if they had not used the patents, then the conclusion at which I am compelled to arrive is, that the pursuers have failed to prove that they have suffered any loss from the defenders' use of their patents, and therefore are not entitled to recover any substantial damages. But nevertheless the defenders have committed an illegal act in infringing the pursuers' patent, and in that view they would be liable in a nominal sum of damages.

There is, however, another view of the case which was not pressed before us, but which leads to a somewhat different result.

A patentee whose patent has been infringed may elect either to claim damages or the profits made by the infringer by the use of his patent. Now, although I do not think that the patentees in this case have proved that they have suffered loss by the acts of the infringers so as to entitle them to damages, still it does not follow that the infringers may not have made some profit by the use of the patents which the patentees are entitled to claim.

We are, as I have said, bound by the admission of the defenders in this case to assume that both patents were useful and meritorious inventions, and seeing that the defenders continued to use them, I think we may fairly presume that they found some profit in doing so.

No. 57.
Dec. 17, 1886.
United Horse
Shoe and Nail
Co. Limited, v.
Stewart & Co.

I do not think, however, that the pursuers are entitled to claim the whole profits made by the defenders in the manufacture of the nails, but only such portion thereof as is fairly attributable to the use of those parts of the machinery covered by the patents.

We were not referred to any case in this country where the question has occurred, but we were referred to a case decided in the Supreme Court of the United States—that of Mowry v. Whitney, in December 1871, in 14 Wallace's Reports, 620.

This was an action brought for the infringement of a patent for an improvement in the process of manufacturing cast-iron railroad wheels.

The improvement consisted in a process of slow-cooling the wheels in connection with the employment of artificial heat to retard the progress of cooling.

The Court below found that the defendant had infringed the patent, and found him liable in damages, these being assessed at the entire profits made by him by the manufacture and sale of all wheels sold by him in the manufacture of which the patented process had been used.

The Superior Court reversed this latter finding, and decided that an infringer is not liable to the extent of his entire profits in the manufacture, and that in such a case the question to be determined was, what advantage did the infringer derive from using the invention over what he had in using other processes then open to the public, and which would have enabled him to obtain an equally beneficial result. The fruits of that advantage it was held were his profits, and that advantage is the measure of profits to be accounted for. I agree with that case. The whole profit is not made by the use of the patents infringed, but by the use of the whole machinery employed. It is the saving only in the cost of manufacture which is effected by the use of the infringed patents which is the profit made by their use, and it is this saving, it appears to me, which ought on such an assumption to be given to the patentee.

The case we have to deal with is one in which the article produced is the result of a variety of successive processes, and of the use of a variety of complicated and ingenious machinery, all parts of which the defenders were free to use except only the two in question, which I think have been proved to be subsidiary and unimportant parts. The saving effected by their use must have been small. What proportion it bears to the whole profit realised we have no means of judging with precision, but I think that if we award £50—which is about one-tenth of the whole profits—to the pursuers on that account we shall be doing justice.

LORD MURE.—I concur in the result at which Lord Adam has arrived. The only question before us in this reclaiming note is the question of damages. There has been a decision on the question of infringement, and the proof proceeded in terms of a written admission of the parties. The ground upon which damages were claimed was somewhat different, I think, from what we usually find in these cases. In general when damages are claimed, the claim is measured by the profits the infringer has made by the use of the patent; but in this case, in article 5 of the condescendence, which is the only one that makes specific mention of the grounds upon which the damages are assessed, the patentees com-

No. 57.
Dec. 17, 1886.
United Horse
Shoe and Nail
Co. Limited, v.
Stewart & Co.

plain of the interference with their business by the influx of nails made abroad and thrown into the market by the defenders while they were infringing the patent; and the Lord Ordinary has adopted that view, and has allowed (as he explains in his note) the pursuers the profits which they would have made upon the sales actually made by the defenders if the defenders had not interfered so as to prevent the pursuers effecting these sales themselves. That is the ground upon which he estimates the damage, which is a somewhat different mode from that usually adopted, and having applied his mind to the consideration of the case in that view, he brings out the sum mentioned in his interlocutor as the sum which he thinks is due. I have looked at the evidence, and I concur with Lord Adam that it is not sufficient to instruct that any such loss has been sustained through the operation of the infringers. And while I think Lord Adam has taken a sound view of that matter, I further agree with him that there must necessarily, when there is infringement of this sort, be a certain amount of damage sustained by the patentee, and although the sum is far short of the sum claimed, I think with Lord Adam that £50 may fairly represent any inconvenience and loss they may have sustained. I concur in the decision Lord Adam has come to.

LORD SHAND.—This case undoubtedly presents points of novelty and of considerable importance for the decision of the Court. The question which is raised and which has been discussed before us is one of fact only, and that is as to the amount of damage the pursuers are entitled to claim in respect of the infringement of their patents which was established by the decision of the Lord Ordinary, and is admitted in the joint minute of admissions. The claim as presented to us was, as Lord Adam has observed, not a claim for profit made by the defenders, but a claim for damage done to the pursuers by the actings of the defenders. It was presented under two heads. In the first place, it was said that the defenders, by bringing the nails into the market in large quantities in competition with the pursuers, and selling large quantities of nails, had really been selling nails which the pursuers would have sold, and the pursuers claim on that ground that they have been damaged by those sales, and that the measure of the damage is the profit the defenders made. The second head of damage was that the defenders having put the nails, as they did, into the market, they thereby competed with the pursuers and brought down the pursuers' prices by a process of underselling from time to time, and that thereby a much larger sum than even the Lord Ordinary has allowed was sustained as damage.

Now, the Lord Ordinary in dealing with those claims has fixed the amount exactly on the same principle and brought out the same amount as if the defenders had infringed the pursuers' patents in all respects. It is clear upon a perusal of his Lordship's judgment that he would have arrived at exactly the same result as he has done in regard to the amount of damage, and no higher result, if it had been found by the Lord Ordinary that in every respect the pursuers' patents had been infringed; and his Lordship therefore has proceeded on this view, that the defenders could not have put nails the same in material and form on the market if they had been interdicted from the use of the patent in terms of the Lord Ordinary's previous judgment. But the great peculiarity of the case, to which I think the Lord Ordinary has not sufficiently adverted, is this, that the defenders were not found guilty of infringing these patents in all their heads, or infringing them generally. The Lord Ordinary's judgment in its terms no doubt was a general interdict against infringing these patents, but by reference to the opinion which his Lordship then gave it is quite clear that he held that the main parts of the subject of these patents were not infringed, and that only in two particulars—what I may call the fringes of the patents of the pursuers—was there any infringement at all. Certainly the infringement that was found under that former action had reference, as the Lord Ordinary says, I think, in this case, to merely subordinate points in the patents. That, I think, is made very clear by a short reference to the patents themselves. In the first place, the patent No. 4078 contains no less than six heads, and it is impossible to read those different heads of the patent without seeing that the substance of the patent is contained in the first five, none of which the Lord Ordinary found had been infringed. The first is for a machine generally “to punch blanks from a rolled, flanged, or ribbed plate, combined with feeding mechanism which intermittently grasps and feeds forward the said flanged plate, and then releases the plate and moves back along over it, again grasping the strip and again feeding it forward to the punches after each operation of the punches”; second, in a machine “for the manufacture of blanks for animal shoe-nails, a series of punches and dies to shape the blanks, an intermittently operating feed of the class herein described, and mechanism to straighten the long, rolled, flanged strip supported in coil form in advance of the feeding mechanism”; third, “the combination with intermittently reciprocating and grasping feeding mechanism of an adjustable stop to control the backward reciprocation of the feeding devices, and a stop to determine the forward reciprocation of the said feeding devices”; fourth, “the combination with the carriage which supports the feeding devices of an operating arm provided with friction rollers, one of which is moveably supported upon the said arm, the two rollers rotating in contact to operate substantially as described”; and fifth, “the combination with a nail-plate grasping lever or jaw held up by a spring, of a striker connected with the punch-slide to open and release the grasp of the said jaw upon the nail-plate preparatory to the backward movement of the said feeding devices.” Now, there, I think, one finds quite clearly the main features of what I may call the substance of the invention. The sixth head relates simply to a matter in which it is claimed that some saving can be effected in the use of the general subject of the invention. It says—“That improvement in the art or method of making animal shoe-nails which consists in punching from a rolled ribbed plate blanks of different widths, those cut from one edge of the plate being wider at or near their heads than those cut from the other edge of the plate, the object being to economise waste heretofore common and necessary when cutting blanks of equal widths.” In short, the point of head six is, taking the patent generally as for the machine as it is now described, that it will make some saving in the operations to be carried out in the use of the machine. Now, it was that sixth head only that the Lord Ordinary found was infringed. And, again, in regard to the other patent, the only infringement there found to have taken place was on head 2 of the claim, which was in these terms:—“In combination with the gate the hook or interceptor r operating substantially as shewn and described.” Then, again, in the minute of admissions we have it made quite clear that that must be the view on which this question of damages arises, because whereas on the one hand the defenders admit that while the nails which they put on the market were manufactured subject to the infringement of head six of the first patent and the

No. 57.

Dec. 17, 1886.
United Horse
Shoe and Nail
Co. Limited, v.
Stewart & Co.

No. 57.

Dec. 17, 1886.
United Horse
Shoe and Nail
Co. Limited, v.
Stewart & Co.

second head of the second patent, the pursuers, on the other hand, have admitted—only for the purposes of this action, but still admitted—that they do not maintain that the said nails were made by mechanism in contravention of claim one of No. 2432, nor of any of the claims of No. 4078 except the sixth.

Now, upon that state of the rights of the parties as settled by the Lord Ordinary's judgment, followed by the interdict, the pursuers present the case in this shape: They say the defenders never could have manufactured their nails at all, standing an interdict of that kind, and upon the footing that the rights of the parties had been so declared; that if they had proceeded to manufacture without taking the benefit of these two minor parts of those patents they would have lost all their profit, and the nails would never have been in the market. If that be established in this case, then the pursuers' view of their claim of damage is right. The defenders, on the other hand, however, have said, "Suppose we had been interdicted then, as we are interdicted now, from using these two subordinate minor parts of these patents, we could have put our nails on the market all the same; and if so, the view which you present in your claim of damages must be unsound, because the view on which your claim is presented is, that we could not have put our nails on the market." Now, looking at the position of the two parties, we have defenders before us who have been guilty of infringement, and I am free to confess that prima facie one would be disposed to hold infringers liable in damages, and that if they mean to say that they could and would have manufactured nails all the same, and would have been quite as much in competition in the market as they were, notwithstanding that they had been found guilty of the infringement of those two patents, there is a heavy onus upon them to instruct that that was the case. But having given the best consideration I could to the argument (which was very full) and to the evidence, I am of opinion with my brother Lord Adam that the defenders have made out their point—that the result of the evidence is, that they have shewn that a mere interdict against contravening what I have called the fringes of these patents would not have prevented their being in the market with the nails just as they were, and if so, the case presented for the pursuers in that view undoubtedly fails. In the first place, we have the fact that the defenders have gone on to manufacture their nails; they stopped for a short time after the interdict, I suppose to take counsel and make arrangements, but since that they have gone on manufacturing their nails, and they are as fully and freely in the market as ever, and it is not said that the nails so manufactured do contravene those minor parts of the patents. Then, in the second place, although undoubtedly it has been found that these patents in the two heads to which I have been referring were useful, and such as would base a claim for a patent, the question is, what amount of utility was there in them, and although I find on the one hand that there is a good deal of loose evidence on the part of the pursuers as to the percentage of saving that they could make by the use of the particular method patented under the sixth head of the main patent, on the other hand I think, when their men of skill and their own manager came to be subjected to cross-examination, their evidence produced the effect on my mind that really the amount of saving was very little. And when I look to that, and the large body of counter evidence, the result is to impress me with the conviction that the saving is trifling, if there be a saving at all. Then, again, in regard to the use of the interceptor, it appears to me that the evidence of the pursuers really demonstrates that the interceptor, as put in the claim in the second patent, although

No. 57.

Dec. 17, 1886.
United Horse
Shoe and Nail
Co. Limited, v.
Stewart & Co.

found by the Lord Ordinary and Professor Fleeming Jenkin to be an ingenious contrivance, so that we must take it to be of some benefit because of the decision in the former case, must be taken to be a very trifling benefit, because Mr Gibbs, the pursuers' own manager, says in regard to that matter,—“As I have said, the middle tunnel was discarded because, when the door opened, the supply of blanks not being checked, they continued to come down, and, instead of passing between the bottom rolls, came out and fell into the nipper-frame, and disarranged it, and caused serious trouble and delay. We found it was not advisable to have that door open, because it allowed the blanks to fall out and do damage to the machine. We made a new form of tunnel slightly different, and we also made a slightly different form of interceptor.” And then he goes on to say that they have entirely done away with the gate; that it would not be an advantage to use that mechanism, and consequently they did not adopt it. Now, if that be so of this interceptor as patented in combination with the gate, for the patent so bears—“In combination with the gate the hook or interceptor r operating substantially as shewn and described,”—it appears to me that again there is a failure to shew that the adoption and use of this part of the patent could be of any material advantage to the defenders. Now, what is the result? The question I put to myself upon this jury question of damages is this, Does it appear that if this interdict had been granted as at the date when this process was brought into Court, or at a much earlier date, the defenders would have been precluded from making nails and putting them upon the market? My opinion upon that question is that they would not. I think the defenders would have been the pursuers' competitors, and so I think it would be most unjust to the defenders that we should hold that the pursuers must reap the profit of all the nails which the defenders sold.

Now, that disposes of the first branch of the pursuers' claim, for which the Lord Ordinary has allowed upwards of £500, and upon the view I have stated, and concurring in the opinion Lord Adam has delivered, I am of opinion that judgment cannot be sustained.

The second head is,—“You were in the market as competitors, and you constantly kept bringing down prices, and the result is we have lost a great deal of money which we would have had by selling our nails at much higher prices.” Now, if what I have said be sound—and it is the judgment I have formed upon the evidence—it results that the competition would have existed all the same, and if the competition had existed all the same, then the defenders, as competitors, were entitled to reduce the market price if they thought fit, and so there is no damage done upon that head. But there is, further, a fatal objection to that contention, which is this, that I do not think it has been proved in this case at all that the competition of the defenders was really the cause of bringing down the price of these nails. It appears that before the defenders came into the field at all the prices of these nails were tumbling down steadily and considerably—coming down time after time in the market; and that they came down after the defenders came into the market is not, in my opinion, to be placed to their doing so. The pursuers themselves seem to have led in reducing the prices, and I think they did so, not because of the defenders' competition, but because there was a very large competition with a great many other nails, particulars of which are given by the witnesses, and so I am of opinion with the Lord Ordinary and Lord Adam that in this part of the case the pursuers also fail.

Lord Adam has proposed that we should, nevertheless, allow a sum of £50 to

No. 57. the pursuers as damages or compensation, and I quite concur with his Lordship that this may be done. The ground upon which I do so is this, that in any view there has been an infringement of these patents. I do not think that, as the case was presented, the pursuers have made out damage which they could recover in either of the views they put, but taking this case as one in which they might have said—although they have not so said,—“Well, at all events, we must have the profit made by your using these two parts of our patent,” I think we must take it that, although the profit that would be made must be of very trifling amount, there must be some profit made, because the former case sustained the patents upon the footing that there must be some profit made. But, looking to the evidence as a whole, I cannot see, assuming that these were beneficial parts of the patent which the defenders used, that it has been made out that a profit beyond the sum of £50 at the utmost could have been made by infringement of these heads of the patent, and, taking it at that, I have only to say that I concur entirely in his Lordship's views, and have only ventured to add what I have done because of the novelty and importance of the question raised.

Dec. 17, 1886.
United Horse
Shoe and Nail
Co. Limited, v.
Stewart & Co.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I entirely concur in the opinion of Lord Adam. The result will be to reduce the damages found by the Lord Ordinary from £530 to £50.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor :—“Recall said interlocutor : Decern against the defenders for £50 ; and, in respect of tender of £251, find the defenders entitled to expenses since the date of said tender, and remit,” &c.

GILL & PRINGLE, W.S.—MACONOGHIE & HARE, W.S.—Agents.

No. 58. COLL MACKINTOSH, Complainer (Reclaiming).—Asher—Strachan.
LORD LOVAT, Respondent.—D.-F. Mackintosh—C. J. Guthrie.
Lease—Subject—Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. c. 62), secs. 28, 35, and 42.—Held that the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883, did not apply to the case of a hotel and 30 acres of land let together as one subject.

Dec. 18, 1886.
Mackintosh v.
Lord Lovat.

1ST DIVISION. LORD M'LAREN. M. ON 23d March 1878 an agreement was entered into between Lord Lovat and Coll Mackintosh, residing at Fort-Augustus, “for a lease of the hotel and lands there, as now possessed by him, and also for the new hotel, built adjoining to the old hotel by his Lordship.” The lease was for seven years from Whitsunday 1878, and the rent £160. The lands included in the lease extended to about 33 acres, a small portion of which, about 4 acres, were shortly after the commencement of the lease resumed by the landlord, a deduction of £8 per annum being allowed from the rent.

Mackintosh remained in possession of the subjects of lease until its expiration, after which it was continued by tacit relocation. On 24th December 1885, Lord Lovat presented a petition in the Sheriff Court of Inverness-shire for Mackintosh's removal as at Whitsunday following, and in April following the latter was charged, upon an extract decree of the Sheriff of Inverness-shire, so to remove.

Mackintosh then brought a suspension of the charge in the Court of Session, urging that the Sheriff's interlocutor was erroneous and unfounded, as no notice of removal had been given, as required by the 28th section of the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, i.e., not less than one year "before the termination of the lease."*

No. 58.

The respondent pleaded, inter alia, that "the complainer not being a tenant of a holding within the meaning of the Agricultural Holdings Act, was not entitled to the notice therein prescribed."

Dec. 18, 1886.
Mackintosh v.
Lord Lovat.

The Lord Ordinary (McLaren), on 3d November 1886, repelled the reasons of suspension.†

The complainer reclaimed.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The subject of the original lease between Lord Lovat and the reclaimer (which is dated 23d March 1878, and was for a period of seven years from Whitsunday 1878) is "the hotel and lands there," i.e., at Fort Augustus, "as now possessed by him, and also the new hotel, built adjoining to the old hotel by his Lordship." The question is whether that is a subject to which the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883, applies. The 28th section, subsec. (a), of the Act, provides that in such a case as the present notice of intention to bring the tenancy to an end must be given not less than one year, nor more than two years before the termination of the lease. The subject in question was held on tacit relocation, the lease having expired in 1885, but the provisions of the above quoted subsection apply if the subject is one to which the statute applies.

It appears to me that the 35th section of the Act makes it clear to what subjects the Act applies and to what it does not. The form of expression used in the section is a little awkward,—“Nothing in this Act shall apply to a holding that is not either wholly agricultural or wholly pastoral.” The same meaning might be

* The Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883, sec. 28, enacts,—“Notwithstanding the expiration of the stipulated endurance of any lease, the tenancy shall not come to an end, unless written notice has been given by either party to the other of his intention to bring the tenancy to an end—(a) In the cases of leases for three years and upwards, not less than one year, nor more than two years before the termination of the lease; (b) In the case of leases from year to year, or for any other period less than three years, not less than six months before the termination of the lease. Failing such notice by either party, the lease shall be held to be renewed by tacit relocation for another year, and thereafter from year to year.”

The 35th section enacts,—“Nothing in this Act shall apply to a holding that is not either wholly agricultural or wholly pastoral, or in part agricultural, and as to the residue pastoral, or in whole or in part cultivated as a market garden, or to any holding let to the tenant during his continuance in any office, appointment, or employment of the landlord.”

The 42d section, inter alia, enacts,—“Holding” means “any piece of land held by a tenant.”

† OPINION.— The subject let to the suspender is a hotel and land, and the subject cannot be described as being either ‘wholly agricultural,’ ‘wholly pastoral,’ or ‘in part agricultural, and as to the residue pastoral.’ Nor is it a market garden. The subject is therefore not a holding falling under any of the descriptions contemplated by the Act. I understand that the suspender relies entirely upon the words of section 42. But it is clear (so far as any enactment can be clear) that the more comprehensive definition of a holding contained in section 42 is controlled by the words of exclusion contained in section 35. The form of the proposition in section 35 is that of a universal negative, subject to certain exceptions. The suspender must be able to place his holding under one of the excepted categories, otherwise he takes no benefit from the statute.”

No. 58. differently expressed in this way,—“This Act shall apply only to a holding which is wholly agricultural or wholly pastoral.” The meaning would be exactly the same, and it makes it abundantly clear that the intention was that the Act should apply to agricultural and pastoral subjects, and not to anything of the nature of urban or house property. The subject here is a hotel with one or two fields consisting of 33 acres—five of which were rough pasture—adjoining. Shortly after the commencement of the lease, the landlord resumed possession of a small portion of these. Is it possible, in these circumstances, to say that the subject is wholly agricultural or wholly pastoral?

Dec. 18, 1886.
Mackintosh v.
Lord Lovat.

The argument under the 42d section of the Act affords no aid to the reclaimer, because all that is there expressed is that “holding” means any piece of land held by a “tenant.” It seems to me that the interpretation here given stands as much in need of interpretation as the interpreted. If a holding means only a piece of land held by a tenant, then the 35th section provides, that no piece of land held by a tenant shall be subject to the Act unless it is wholly agricultural or wholly pastoral. I entirely agree with the Lord Ordinary.

LORD MURE and LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD SHAND was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

WILLIAM OFFICER, S.S.C.—JOHN C. BRODIE & SONS, W.S.—Agents.

No. 59. JAMES ANDERSON AND OTHERS (Buchanan's Testamentary Trustees), First Parties.—Sol.-Gen. Robertson—C. N. Johnston.
Dec. 18, 1886. PROVOST AND MAGISTRATES OF KILMARNOCK AND OTHERS (Trustees of the Buchanan's Buchanan Bequest), Second Parties.—Sol.-Gen. Robertson— Trustees v. C. N. Johnston.
Buchanan Be-quest Trustees.
REV. WILLIAM DUNNETT AND ANOTHER, Third Parties.—
Sol.-Gen. Robertson—C. N. Johnston.
REV. EMANUEL MORGAN, Fourth Party.—
Sol.-Gen. Robertson—C. N. Johnston.
REV. JAMES MACGEOCH AND OTHERS, Fifth Parties.—
D.-F. Mackintosh—H. Johnston.
REV. GEORGE GARDINER, Sixth Party.—D.-F. Mackintosh—H. Johnston.

Church—Quoad sacra—Trust—Construction.—An estate was left to the Provost and Magistrates of Kilmarnock, “the ministers of the Established Churches of Scotland in Kilmarnock, and the minister of the parish of Riccarton, all for the time being, and their successors in office,” to hold the same, and to apply the income to certain purposes, paying the balance of the income “equally between the parishes of Kilmarnock and Riccarton, to be paid to and expended by the ministers of said respective parishes in charitable and benevolent purposes connected therewith.”

Held (1) that the ministers of three quoad sacra parishes, the churches of which were situated within the burgh, were trustees both to hold the general fund and to receive and expend the balance of income; but (2) that the minister of a quoad sacra parish erected out of portions of Kilmarnock, of Riccarton, and of Galston parishes was neither a trustee of the general fund nor of the balance, his church being situated outside the burgh of Kilmarnock.

2d Division.
M.

BY mutual trust-disposition and settlement dated 8th July 1861, Misses Margaret, Jane, and Elizabeth Buchanan, three sisters residing at Bellfield, in the parish of Riccarton and county of Ayr, inter alia directed their trustees in the seventh place, as soon as they conveniently could after the death of the last survivor of the trustees, to dispose, convey, and deliver over to "The Provost and Magistrates and Town-Council for the time being of Kilmarnock, and their successors in office; the clergy-men of the Established Church of Scotland in Kilmarnock for the time being, and their successors in the ministry; and the clergyman of the parish of Riccarton for the time being, and his successors in office—all in trust," the lands and estate of Bellfield belonging to the trustees, to be held by these trustees in trust for the ends, uses, and purposes therein mentioned.

No. 59.

Dec. 18, 1886.
Buchanan's
Trustees v.
Buchanan Bequest Trustees.

On 11th May 1871, Miss Elizabeth Buchanan, the survivor of the three sisters, in exercise of a reserved power of revocation and alteration, executed a codicil to the trust-disposition and settlement, by which she, in the third place, on the narrative that it was her will and desire that the estate of Bellfield should be devoted in all time coming to certain uses and purposes therein set forth, and that the trust in connection therewith should be called "The Buchanan Bequest," ordained and appointed her trustees to hold that estate for the period of ten years from and after the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas occurring six months after her death, and on the lapse of the said period of ten years to dispose, assign, and make over the estate, and all accumulation of rents which might then be in their hands, "to and in favour of the Provost and Magistrates of Kilmarnock, the ministers of the Established Churches of Scotland in Kilmarnock, and the minister of the parish of Riccarton, all for the time being, and their successors in office," and to the trustees themselves during their lives, all as trustees to hold the same in all time coming, and apply the income thereof in the execution of the several purposes of the "Buchanan Bequest" mentioned in the codicil.

The sixth and last purpose mentioned in the codicil was in these terms:—"(Sixth) For payment of the balance or residue of the said revenue or income equally between the parishes of Kilmarnock and Riccarton, to be paid to and expended by the ministers of said respective parishes in charitable and benevolent purposes connected therewith."

Miss Buchanan died on 23d April 1875, and accordingly the ten years mentioned in her codicil expired at Martinmas 1885.

At the date of Miss Buchanan's death there were in Kilmarnock the Laigh Kirk—which was the original parish church and a collegiate charge—and three quoad sacra parishes—the High Kirk, St Marnock's, and St Andrew's, which were erected respectively in 1811, 1862, and 1868. All these churches and parishes were within the burgh of Kilmarnock, and also within the original parish of Kilmarnock, with the exception of the parish of St Marnock, which to the extent of more than one-half was outside the burgh, though entirely within the original parish. The church of St Marnock's was within the burgh.

There was also the quoad sacra parish of Hurlford, which was erected in March 1875, the church being opened in May 1875—a month after Miss Buchanan's death. This parish was erected out of parts of the parishes of Riccarton, Kilmarnock, and Galston, to the extent of populations respectively of 3849, 657, and 193. The church was within a portion of the parish which had been disjoined from Kilmarnock, but it was not within the boundaries of the burgh.

In these circumstances, questions having arisen as to who were entitled to be trustees of the Buchanan Bequest, and also who were entitled to administer the residue of the income of the fund under the sixth purpose of the codicil, a special case was presented, to which the parties were (1) the Buchanan testamentary trustees; (2) the Provost and Magistrates of Kilmarnock, the ministers of all the parishes except Hurlford, and the

No. 59. testamentary trustees—these being the persons to whom the testamentary trustees proposed to convey the subjects of the Buchanan Bequest; (3) the ministers of the Laigh Kirk; (4) the minister of Riccarton; (5) the ministers of the High Kirk, of St Andrew's Kirk, and of St Marnock's Kirk; and (6) the minister of Hurlford.

Dec. 18, 1886.
Buchanan's
Trustees v.
Buchanan Bequest Trustees.

The questions of law were:—“(1) Is the minister of the church and parish of Hurlford quoad sacra one of the ministers of the Established Churches of Scotland in Kilmarnock in the sense of the said trust-disposition and settlement and codicil, and as such a trustee of ‘The Buchanan Bequest’? (2) Are the ministers of the parishes of the High Kirk quoad sacra, Kilmarnock, St Marnock's quoad sacra, Kilmarnock, St Andrew's quoad sacra, Kilmarnock, and Hurlford quoad sacra, or any and which of them, entitled, along with the collegiate ministers of the Laigh Kirk, Kilmarnock, to receive and expend the one-half of the balance or residue of the income of the Buchanan Bequest falling to the parish of Kilmarnock? (3) Is the minister of the parish of Hurlford quoad sacra entitled, along with the minister of the parish of Riccarton, to receive and expend the one-half of the said balance or residue falling to the parish of Riccarton? (4) In the event of the second and third queries, or either of them, being answered in the affirmative, is the fund to be administered jointly within the respective parishes by those found entitled to receive and expend it; and if not, upon what principle does it fall to be apportioned?”

The sixth party maintained an affirmative answer to the first question. With reference to the second and third questions, the fifth and sixth parties contended that, as regarded the half of the residue falling to the parish of Kilmarnock, the ministers of the quoad sacra parishes of the High Kirk, St Marnock's, St Andrew's, and Hurlford were entitled, along with the collegiate ministers of the Laigh Kirk, to receive and expend that half, either jointly or in proportion to the population, or to the area of their respective parishes, so far as within the original parish of Kilmarnock; and the sixth party further contended that, as regarded the one-half of the residue falling to the parish of Riccarton, the minister of the quoad sacra parish of Hurlford was entitled similarly to receive and expend that half along with the minister of the parish of Riccarton.¹ The third and fourth parties maintained that the residue fell to be paid to and expended by them and their successors in office in equal shares. On the fourth question, the fifth and sixth parties preferred that it should be held that each minister should be found entitled to receive and distribute an aliquot share of the residue—the remaining parties, that each half should be distributed by the ministers as a distributing board.

At advising,—

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—We have here before us a special case, which has been presented for the purpose of determining certain questions which have arisen as to the construction of a charitable trust established by the will of the late Miss Elizabeth Buchanan.

The questions are two in number,—first, who are the trustees to hold; second, who are the trustees to distribute. The fund is to be divided into two portions. One half of it is to be expended on charitable purposes within the parish of Kilmarnock; the other half in the parish of Riccarton.

¹ Authority.—Hutton v. Harper, March 9, 1876, 3 R. (H. L.) 9, L. R., 1 App. Cas. 464.

By the clause which establishes the trust for holding the fund the truster directs her trustees to pay the trust funds to the Provost and Magistrates of Kilmarnock, the ministers of the Established Churches of Scotland in Kilmarnock, and the minister of Riccarton.

No. 59.

Dec. 18, 1886.
Buchanan's
Trustees v.
Buchanan Bequest Trustees.

The question which has arisen under this clause is, who are in the sense of the deed the ministers of the Established Churches in Kilmarnock? Putting aside the quoad sacra parish of Hurlford, which I shall deal with afterwards, it appears that in the town of Kilmarnock there is the original parish church, which is called the Laigh Kirk, and several quoad sacra churches which have been created from time to time. The question is, whether the expression "ministers of the Established Churches in Kilmarnock" includes not only the ministers of the Laigh Kirk, but also the ministers of the quoad sacra churches, and in my opinion it includes the whole. It is plain that the latter are ministers of Established Churches in Kilmarnock, and it is as plain that according to the very expression of the deed more than one minister in Kilmarnock was to be a trustee. I am very clear therefore that the quoad sacra ministers are trustees as well as the minister of the Laigh Kirk. It is impossible otherwise to satisfy the words of the trust-deed.

There is no question about the parish of Riccarton. With respect therefore to the constitution of the trust for holding the fund, I am of opinion that the trustees include the ministers I have mentioned.

With respect to the trust for distribution we have a different phrase. The clause is thus expressed,—“for payment of the balance or residue of the said revenue or income equally between the parishes of Kilmarnock and Riccarton, to be paid to and expended by the ministers of said respective parishes, in charitable and benevolent purposes connected therewith.”

If we had not anything else but these words, there might be considerable difficulty in extending the trustees beyond, first, the minister of the parish of Kilmarnock, that is to say, the minister of the Laigh Kirk, and secondly, the minister of the parish of Riccarton. But I think it would not be consistent with the purposes of the trust, and the intention of the truster, to take these words according to their strict meaning. It appears to me that she must be held to have meant that the trustees for holding were also to be the trustees for distributing, and that the trustees for distributing, so far as regarded the parish of Kilmarnock, were not to be confined to the minister of the Laigh Kirk. With respect to Riccarton, the trustee for distributing is of course the minister of Riccarton.

I have yet to deal with the minister of Hurlford.

The position of Hurlford is peculiar. That parish has been formed partly out of Kilmarnock, partly out of Riccarton, and partly out of Galston; but I do not think that the minister can be held to be a minister of an Established church in Kilmarnock. His church, although in the parish of Kilmarnock, is not in the town of Kilmarnock. I think that the words “Established Churches in Kilmarnock” refer to churches in the town of Kilmarnock, and do not extend to the whole parish.

I propose that the questions should be answered according to the opinion I have just expressed.

LORD YOUNG and the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

LORD CRAIGHILL was absent.

No. 59.

Dec. 18, 1886.
 Buchanan's
 Trustees v.
 Buchanan Be-
 quest Trustees.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor :—"The Lords having heard counsel for the parties on the special case, are of opinion (1) with reference to the first of the questions therein stated, that the minister of the church and parish of Hurlford quoad sacra is not one of the ministers of the Established Churches of Scotland in Kilmarnock in the sense of the trust-disposition and deed of settlement and codicil mentioned in the special case, and is not a trustee of 'The Buchanan Bequest'; (2) with reference to the second question, that the ministers of the parishes of the High Kirk quoad sacra, Kilmarnock, St Marnock's quoad sacra, Kilmarnock, and St Andrew's quoad sacra, Kilmarnock, are for the time being entitled, along with the collegiate ministers of the Laigh Kirk, Kilmarnock, to receive and expend the one-half of the balance or residue of the income of the Buchanan bequest falling to the parish of Kilmarnock, and that the minister of the parish of Hurlford quoad sacra is not so entitled; (3) with reference to the third question, that the minister of the parish of Hurlford quoad sacra is not entitled along with the minister of the parish of Riccarton to receive and expend the one-half of the said balance or residue falling to the parish of Riccarton; (4) with reference to the fourth question, that to the extent of one half the fund is to be administered for the time being by the ministers of the Laigh Kirk, Kilmarnock, of the High Kirk quoad sacra, Kilmarnock, St Marnock's quoad sacra, Kilmarnock, and St Andrew's quoad sacra, Kilmarnock, jointly, and that to the extent of the other half the fund is to be administered by the minister of the parish of Riccarton: Find and declare accordingly: Find the whole parties to the case entitled to expenses out of the trust-funds: Remit," &c.

GIBSON & STRATHERN, W.S.—GEORGE J. WOOD, W.S.—Agents.

No. 60.

Dec. 18, 1886.
 Leslies v.
 Walker, &c.

WILLIAM LESLIE AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Appellants).—H. Smith—M'Kechin.
 THOMAS WALKER AND OTHERS, Defenders (Respondents).—Sol.-Gen. Robertson—D. Dundas.

Reparation—Fishing—Trawler—Sea Fisheries Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. cap. 22), sched. art. xix.—The Sea Fisheries Act, 1883, sched. art. xix., provides that, "where trawl fishermen are in sight of drift-net or long-line fishermen, they shall take all necessary steps in order to avoid doing injury to the latter. Where damage is caused, the responsibility shall be on the trawlers, unless they can prove that they were under the stress of compulsory circumstances, or that the loss sustained did not result from their fault."

Long-line fishermen were engaged for about an hour in setting their lines between three and four on a clear afternoon. During this time they saw a steam trawler engaged in fishing two miles off. The fishermen, without warning the trawler, went ashore, leaving their lines through the night marked only by a buoy and flag at each end of the line, a distance of $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles. During the night the trawler carried away the lines. In an action of damages by the fishermen against the trawler, the pursuers averred, but failed to prove, a general custom of long-line fishermen to leave their lines all night unattended. The Court being of opinion, on the evidence, that the trawler had kept a proper look-out, and had not seen either the fishermen setting their lines or the buoys they had set, held that the defenders had proved that the loss sustained did not result from their fault, and therefore assoilzied them.

In July 1885 William, John, and James Leslie, fishermen, Stronsay, Orkney, and owners of the fishing-boat "Ebenezer," brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen against Thomas Walker and others, owners of the steam-trawler "St Clement" of Aberdeen, for £122, being (1) £10 as the value of ten long fishing-lines, which, as the pursuers averred, had been destroyed by the "St Clement" on the night of the 20th-21st May 1885, when trawling in the North Sound between the islands of Sanda and Papa Westray; and (2) £112 as the estimated value of a fortnight's fishing said to have been lost in consequence of the loss of the lines.

No. 60.
Dec. 18, 1886.
Leslie v.
Walker, &c.
2d Division.
Sheriff of Aberdeen,
Kincardine,
and Banff.
L.

The case stated by the pursuers was that, on the afternoon of the 20th May, they had set on a bank about $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles from the shore ten long lines, each of 300 fathoms, making, when joined together, a continuous line of 6000 yards, with hooks baited; that the lines were properly buoyed, the buoys being easily observable on the surface of the water; that, when engaged in setting their lines, they saw the "St Clement" fishing about 2 miles off, and that those on board her saw, or could easily have seen, them setting their lines; that, after setting their lines, they returned to Pierowall Harbour, Westray, for the night; that it was a well-known custom, which the defenders knew or ought to have known, for long-line fishermen to leave their lines all night at that place, which was a well-known fishing ground for long-line fishermen; and that, in these circumstances, the defenders were liable in damages to the pursuers, both at common law, in respect that they ought to have refrained from approaching the fishing ground when they knew, or ought to have known, that the pursuers' lines were set there, and also under the Sea Fisheries Act, 1883, particularly art. 19 of the schedule annexed thereto.*

The defenders on record and before the Sheriffs did not admit that the pursuers had set their lines as they alleged, or, if they had, that the "St Clement" had had anything to do with their destruction, but at the hearing on the appeal the defenders conceded that the lines had been lost, and that the trawling operations of the "St Clement" were the cause of the loss. The defenders maintained that they were nevertheless not liable in damages, in respect (1) that their crew had kept a proper look-out, and had never seen either the pursuers setting the lines or the buoys of the lines when set; and (2) that the pursuers had themselves been guilty of negligence in leaving the lines unattended all night, instead of staying by them in their boat, which would have had to shew a light.†

A proof was allowed. The evidence, in so far as bearing on the points ultimately in dispute, was to the following effect:—The lines as set had two buoys, one at each end of the 6000 yards. On each buoy was a flagstaff 10 feet high with a black flag, which would shew about 7 feet above the surface of the water. The afternoon was clear, but the night was somewhat hazy, according to some of the witnesses. Such a buoy and flag would probably have been visible about a quarter of a mile off during the night. The pursuers had never shot long lines in the North Sound before, nor had they ever before seen a steam trawler there. It did not occur to them that there was any risk of the lines being carried away by

* The Sea Fisheries Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. cap. 22), schedule, art. xix., provides,—“When trawl fishermen are in sight of drift-net or long-line fishermen they shall take all necessary steps in order to avoid doing injury to the latter. Where damage is caused, the responsibility shall lie on the trawlers, unless they can prove that they were under stress of compulsory circumstances, or that the loss sustained did not result from their fault.”

† The Order in Council, dated 17th September 1885, sec. 10, subsec. c, provides,—“A vessel employed in line-fishing with her lines out shall carry the same lights as a vessel when engaged in fishing with drift-nets.”

No. 60.

Dec. 18, 1886.
Leslies v.
Walker, &c.

the trawler. During the whole time they were setting the lines (about an hour) they saw her steaming backwards and forwards about two miles off, and they assumed that she saw what they were doing. It was customary in the North Sound (where the tide did not run strongly) to leave long lines out all night unattended, but there was no evidence that a similar practice prevailed anywhere else, except that one of the defenders, Thomas Walker, in cross-examination spoke to its being done in the Bay of Aberdeen. The sea was rough on the night of the 20th May, and it would have been dangerous for the pursuers to stay by their lines. Those on board the trawler deponed that they had kept a good look-out during the whole time they were in the North Sound; that they had seen no fishing boat setting lines, nor any buoys except one that they had fixed as a guide for their own operations; and that they had found no fishing hooks or lines caught in the trawl, when they raised it, which they did every two hours. The master of the trawler admitted that he had taken no pains to ascertain the practice of long-line fishermen in the North Sound, and stated that, before the present occurrence, he was not aware that they were in the habit of leaving their lines out all night unattended. Several independent witnesses both on shore and on other boats observed both the "Ebenezer" and the trawler, and inferred what each was doing. One of these witnesses was of opinion that those on board the trawler could easily have seen the "Ebenezer" setting her lines if they had looked; and further deponed, that he had remarked to one of his crew at the time, that he "expected the trawler would take away some of the 'Ebenezer's' lines before daylight." On the morning of the 21st, the "Ebenezer" went alongside the trawler, and the pursuers demanded compensation from the trawler. This her master refused. He and his crew deponed that the pursuers first asked for £2 and then for £1, and the pursuers stated that they had asked for compensation for the loss of their lines.

On 29th April 1886, the Sheriff-substitute (Brown) pronounced an interlocutor (after other findings in fact) finding "(4) That when the pursuers were engaged in setting their lines as aforesaid, the defenders' trawler the 'St Clement' was in the North Sound, at a distance at which the operations of the pursuers might have been observed had a look-out been kept; (5) That during the night of the 20th of May and the morning of the 21st May, the said trawler belonging to the defenders passed over the pursuers' lines, and carried them away or destroyed them; (6) That the officers and crew of the said trawler failed to keep a proper look-out while engaged in trawling operations as aforesaid, and failed otherwise to take all necessary steps in order to avoid doing injury to the pursuers' lines, in terms of article 19 of the first schedule appended to the Sea Fisheries Act, 1883: With reference to the foregoing findings, finds the defenders liable to the pursuers in damages; assesses these at £20, with expenses."*

* "NOTE.— . . . The statute was evidently designed to give a special protection to the weaker party; and I am disposed to think that the provision in the schedule imposes an absolute obligation on trawlers when long-line fishermen are in sight, or with proper care may be observed. But, notwithstanding the rules laid down by the Sea Fisheries Act, it seems to me that the main issue in the case must still primarily be controlled by the provisions of the common law. In this view, the defenders contend that there is a duty laid on long-line fishermen, after they have set their lines, to remain by them in their boats during the night, in which case the situation of the lines would be marked by the lights which the boats are bound to carry. It is not said that there is any provision in an Act of Parliament or any statutory regulation that a boat shall remain beside its lines during the night, but it is argued that that is a principle of the common law, and in corroboration of that the defenders appeal

On appeal the Sheriff (Guthrie Smith) recalled this interlocutor, and found "that on the night of the 20th May 1885 the pursuers' fishing-lines were damaged, as alleged, by the trawler 'St Clement,' but that the defenders have proved that the loss sustained did not result from their fault: Therefore assoilizes the defenders from the conclusions of the action," with expenses.*

No. 60.

Dec. 18, 1886.
Leslies v.
Walker, &c.

to the regulations for preventing collisions at sea, annexed to the Order in Council, dated at Balmoral on 17th September 1885, and particularly to section 10 thereof, subsection c.—(supra, p. 289). Now, certainly, that is a very distinct provision as to what lights are to be exhibited, assuming fishing-boats and vessels to be in the same category, when they remain beside their lines; but considering what the primary object of the regulations is, viz., to prevent collisions at sea, it strikes me as a somewhat strained principle of construction to extract from them a law to regulate the conduct of fishermen in prosecuting their rights as such. It is proved in this case that the lines were set in the usual way, and it is quite a common practice to leave them out all night without a watch; and I have judged in several cases in this Court where damages have been claimed and awarded under the same conditions. I quite appreciate the strength of the argument that if fishermen are to be permitted to occupy such a large portion of the highway of the sea as is implied in setting their lines in a continuous line, and are not to be held bound to mark their situation by a light, and trawlers are to be found responsible for destroying them, that practically means the prescription of trawlers from certain localities in the exercise of an admittedly common right. It would, however, be as manifest a hardship to poor fishermen following their calling in remote districts of the country, and knowing little of modes of fishing beyond their own primitive experience, to have their property destroyed when pursuing their vocation as they have been accustomed to do, and in a way that the law, so far as I can see, has never declared illegal. Both trawlers and fishermen are engaged in exercise of their common right to take white fish from the sea, but it is notorious that, in pursuance of these rights, a conflict of interests may arise, and therefore it is necessary that each party should inform himself as to the conditions under which the other practises his vocation. I think it is proved that there is a practice, not only in the North Sound, but in other places, such as the Bay of Aberdeen, of fishermen leaving out their lines all night; and it seems to me that if a trawler betakes himself to such a limited area for fishing as the North Sound, with that knowledge, a special duty of inquiry and vigilance is laid upon him both by common and statute law to see that no damage is done. But that is precisely, I think, what the defenders' trawler did not do, for I believe the master of the trawler strikes the true keynote of the case, notwithstanding his protestations as to the instructions to keep a good look-out, by his admission that it never occurred to him to look out for fishermen's lines; and if that was the frame of mind of the captain, that of his crew may readily be inferred. On these grounds, I feel myself obliged to award damages. . . ."

* "NOTE.—I think that the Sheriff-substitute has rightly held that the damage in this case was done by the trawler. The master admits that she was the only trawler in the North Sound of Orkney on the night of the 20th May, and two perfectly neutral witnesses saw her crossing and recrossing about 10 o'clock at night over the part of the bay where the lines were set. It follows that, under article 19 of the convention, which by the Sea Fisheries Act of 1883 has the force of statute, the responsibility lies on the trawler, 'unless she can prove that the loss sustained did not result from her fault.'

"The pursuers commenced to set their lines about three in the afternoon, and about four o'clock left them for the night, their custom being to return next morning and lift them. During the night they admit that they were wholly unattended and unprotected, and were only marked at either end by a skin and cork buoy, surmounted by a flagstaff, rising perhaps 7 feet above the water. The lines were 6000 yards, or nearly 3½ miles, in length. It is admitted that the weather was hazy, not so much so in the afternoon, but towards evening the

No. 60. The pursuers appealed.

Dec. 18, 1886.
Leslies v.
Walker, &c.

As already stated, the defenders admitted that the pursuers had set their lines as alleged, and that the loss had been caused by the "St Clement."

Argued for the pursuers ;—(1) The defenders had failed to prove that they were not in fault. Either they saw the pursuers' boat, and, doing so, must have known that the pursuers were long-line fishermen setting their lines; or they did not see the pursuers, in which case they could have kept no efficient look-out, for it was now conceded that the pursuers did set their lines. They were near enough to enable people accustomed to fishing (which the trawler's crew must be assumed to be) to know that. In the words of the Lord Justice-Clerk in Combe v. Renton, "they were manifestly to the observation of any skilled eye engaged in the occupation of fishing."¹ The pursuers were certainly long-line fishermen setting their lines "in sight" of the defenders, whether the defenders actually observed them or not, if they ought to have observed them. The Act, art. 19, therefore applied, and imposed the duty on the defenders of looking out for the lines which the defenders ought to have known would probably be left unattended. That was the custom of the district, at least, and was common elsewhere, and made the defenders liable at haze became very dense, and after dark the two terminal buoys were of no use in indicating the lines.

"It appears that it has always been the custom for the people of the islands to fish in this way; and until they were invaded by trawlers, the traffic in these seas was too insignificant to occasion any considerable risk. It is otherwise, however, now; and I have no scruple or hesitation in holding that the local custom must conform to the requirements of the general law. The sea is a public highway, open to all; and if a fisherman leaves his lines all night to take care of themselves, it is at his own risk. Had the pursuers remained by their lines, they would have been bound to exhibit the lights prescribed by vessels engaged in fishing; and any failure to do so would have disentitled them to recover. Much more when there was neither boat nor light, nor anything visible to warn off passing vessels; and if, in the darkness, another boat chanced to run through their lines, she cannot be said to be to blame, unless she knew that they were there.

"The question in the case thus comes to be, Did the defenders know? On this point the burden of proof shifts to the pursuers as soon as the defenders have proved negligence in leaving the lines unguarded. I do not think that, on the evidence, this burden has been discharged. When the pursuers began to set their lines the trawler was observed away to the south, about half-way between them and the island of Sanday, which, according to the chart, would be about 3 miles. It is inferred that, at that distance, they might have seen the boat and also what she was doing, if a proper look-out had been kept. But the master states that he was on deck all the time, and he is confirmed by his crew in saying that no boat was seen, and they had no reason to suppose that a line had been stretched right across the mouth of the bay. Moreover, the argument cuts both ways. If the trawler was to blame in not taking a more active interest in the operations of the fishermen, it was no less the duty of the pursuers to have made certain that she did see them. It would have been an easy thing to have hailed her, and warned her to keep clear of the lines, especially if one of their own witnesses is right in saying, 'I expected the trawler would take away some of the "Ebenezer's" lines before morning.' Thus, in the most favourable view which can be taken of the pursuers' case, there was negligence on both sides; and I have no doubt that art. 19 of the convention, under which the case falls to be determined, must be read in accordance with the rule of the common law on the subject, namely, that to enable a fisherman to recover, the accident must be attributable entirely to the fault of the trawler; and if there was want of care on both sides, he cannot maintain his action."

¹ Combe v. Renton, June 5, 1886, 13 R. (Just. Ca.) 67, at p. 70.

common law, although it was true that the evidence was meagre on the general custom, the only other locality with reference to which the custom was proved being the Bay of Aberdeen. That being so, (2) No fault could be imputed to the pursuers. Their duty was to set the lines, to buoy them and flag them. They might then go away. They did not require to give verbal warning to trawlers near enough to see what they were doing.

Argued for the defenders ;—The evidence here was that the defenders kept a proper look-out, and they did not in fact see the pursuers, at least they did not see what they were doing. Nor were they in a position to infer what the pursuers were doing. The distance was too great, and there was nothing in the motions of the pursuers' boat to make it reasonably plain that they were setting lines. The pursuers, who knew what they themselves were doing, and who saw the trawler, ought to have given warning, and were in fault for not giving warning. If, then, the defenders neither saw, nor were bound to see, the pursuers setting their lines, they were out of the Act, which applied only to "fishermen" in sight. That could not be construed to mean a buoy without a light. When the pursuers' boat went away the application of the Act ceased. After that there was only the common law, and nothing like a general custom of long-line fishermen to leave their lines out unattended had been proved. Assuming that this was a well-known long-line fishing ground, the defenders were bound (under the Act) if they saw lights. If they saw no lights they were entitled to assume that the ground was unoccupied. The pursuers, therefore, had lost their lines through their own fault, and could not recover.

At advising,—

Lord Young.—The only questions in this case are questions of fact. There are two questions raised—the first being, whether the fishing lines of the pursuers were destroyed by the defenders ; and the second, if they were so destroyed, whether the defenders have proved that the destruction was attributable to no fault on their part. The Sheriffs are both of opinion that the pursuers' fishing lines were destroyed by the defenders, but they differ in opinion on the other question. The Sheriff-substitute is of opinion that the defenders did not take due care to avoid the pursuers' lines, and therefore he finds them liable in damages. The Sheriff finds that the defenders have proved that the loss did not result from fault on their part, and reverses the Sheriff-substitute's decision. For my own part I think it doubtful—although, as the defenders do not now dispute the fact, I require to say no more—whether the pursuers' lines were destroyed by the defenders' trawling gear at all. I think it doubtful if it is proved that the pursuers' lines were ever set as they allege. It is curious that not a trace of the lines said to have been destroyed was ever discovered. None was found on the trawling gear, according to the evidence of those on board the trawler, and the fishermen who first examined the place where the lines were said to have been set say that they saw not a trace of them. They then went to the trawler, and I think all on board her concur as to the complaint that they made, and as to what they said—that they first claimed £2 by way of damages, and afterwards came down to £1. I see no reason for discrediting these witnesses, and that being so it is certainly remarkable that the pursuers of an action in which £120 is sought as damages should have started with asking first 40s. and then 20s., and not a trace of their lines for the loss of which they ask these sums as compensation to be

No. 60.

Dec. 18, 1886.
Leslie v.
Walker, &c.

No. 60.

Dec. 18, 1886.
Loulies v.
Walker, &c.

found anywhere. They bring their action for £120 and get only £20 from the Sheriff-substitute. I do not think that these circumstances are favourable to them. I am content, however, to put my judgment as the Sheriff has put it, and find not only that it is not proved that the trawler was in fault, but affirmatively that the import of the evidence proves that the men on board used all due care not to commit any fault. I think therefore that the judgment of the Sheriff should be affirmed, except that I am not sure that I should affirm the first finding in fact in his interlocutor. I should prefer to find that it is not proved that the pursuers' lines were destroyed by the defenders, and that it is proved that the defenders used all due care and caution, and were not in fault.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—In my opinion the interlocutor of the Sheriff-principal is in accordance with the evidence, and in accordance with the law applicable to this case, and I am entirely satisfied with the reasons which he gives for it. With reference to the question whether the lines were set, and if set were destroyed by the trawler, I do not express an opinion. The case was presented to us on the assumption that the lines had been set, and had been destroyed by the trawler.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am rather inclined to arrive at the opposite conclusion. I think that it is sufficiently proved that the lines were set in the sight of the trawler, that she did not use due care to avoid going over the ground where they were laid, and that she destroyed them. That is my impression of the result of the evidence.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I confess I participate to some extent in the doubts expressed by Lord Rutherford Clark, and I should hardly be prepared to affirm that the lines were not set, or that they were not destroyed by the trawler. But these matters are not in question now. We are asked to find that it is proved that the trawler did not take sufficient care to avoid destroying those fishermen's lines. There is a conflict of evidence on that point, but I am hardly prepared to affirm that the precautions taken on board the trawler were insufficient. I am further moved by the fact that the fishermen might have taken the precaution, which they did not take, of informing the trawler that they had set lines. Then again, they left the lines as soon as they had set them, and went on shore, no doubt they say for a very good reason, on account of the threatening state of the weather, but they did leave their lines without anyone to warn passing vessels off, and the marks which they put up were insufficient to warn the trawler from going over the ground. In these circumstances, I am disposed to agree in the result at which the Sheriff has arrived.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that on the night of the 20th May 1885 the pursuers' fishing lines were damaged as alleged by the trawler 'St Clement,' but that the defenders have proved that the loss sustained did not result from their fault: Therefore dismiss the appeal, and affirm the judgment of the Sheriff appealed against," with expenses.

THOMAS CARMICHAEL, S.S.C.—TODD, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—Agents.

THOMAS M'CAIG (Maitland's Judicial Factor), Pursuer and Nominal Raiser. No. 61.

ELPHINSTONE VANS AGNEW MAITLAND, Claimant (Reclaimant).—

Sol.-Gen. Robertson—Rankine.

Jan. 5, 1887.

MRS MATILDA FRANCES HARRIET BUCHANAN OR MAITLAND (Maitland's Executor), Real Raiser and Claimant (Respondent).—Murray—

M'Caig v.
Maitland.

G. R. Gillespie.

Res judicata—Identity of parties.—A plea of res judicata sustained against a claimant in a multiplepinding claiming upon a title upon the future and contingent possession of which another person had founded unsuccessfully in a previous process with reference to the same fund.

A lady left the residue of her estate, burdened with certain annuities, to the heir in possession of the family estates. In a multiplepinding brought soon after her death A, the heir then in possession, claimed the residue as vested in him at the testator's death. B, a remoter heir, claimed to have the residue retained till the death of the last annuitant, pleading that vesting was postponed till that event. The Court found that A was entitled to the whole residue after payment of the annuities, and sustained his claim for payment thereof so far as not necessary to be retained by the trustees to meet the annuities. In a multiplepinding brought on the death of the last annuitant to distribute the fund retained competing claims were lodged by A's executor and C the heir then in possession of the family estates. Plea of res judicata sustained against C.

In 1861 Alexander Smith, W.S., sole surviving executor of Miss Mary^{2D} Division.
Turner Maitland, raised a multiplepinding to determine the right of suc- Lord M'Laren.
cession to "the whole moveable and personal estate and effects" of that I.
lady. She had left a number of testamentary writings, the precise terms of which are quoted in the report of that case at 2 Macph. 417, the questions raised for determination there being, first, had she died testate or intestate? and second, was her estate, supposing these testamentary writings were valid, vested a morte testatoris, or was vesting postponed?

The gist of the provisions, which gave rise to these questions, was as follows—viz., Miss Maitland nominated her nephew, Patrick, to be her heir, and desired that everything not specifically bequeathed otherwise should go to him, as the head of the house of Maitland of Freugh and Balgreggan. She also left a number of annuities, and she then provided,—"I think you will find the spirit of all the same—that eventually the Capital of what I possess should go to the support of my Father's House, tho' I dispose of the interest to many lives. So far does that spirit go, that should any circumstances occur to cause the sale of the Estates of Freugh & Balgreggan, I desire the Capital to be divided (after all the life annuities fall) as the Law directs amongst the descendants of my Father, but as long as they remain, the Capital to revert to the possessor first to my Nephew, Pat^k. Maitland of Freugh and his children; failing them, to my Nephew, John Maitland."

Patrick predeceased his aunt, leaving a son, John, who was in possession of Freugh in 1861; and two younger sons. The next heir of line to the estates was Patrick's brother, Colonel John Maitland.

John of Freugh claimed "present payment to the claimant of the residue of the testatrix's executry estate, under burden of the annuities charged thereon. Or, alternatively and in the event of the claimant being unsuccessful in the first alternative of this second claim, retention by the pursuer, as executor aforesaid, of the capital of said residue until the death of the last surviving annuitant, to be then paid to the claimant if said family estates shall remain unsold; or, in the event of said estates

No. 61.

Jan. 5, 1887.
M'Caig v.
Maitland.

having been sold, to be divided among the descendants of the testatrix's father according to the legal rules of distribution."

He pleaded;—According to the sound construction of said writings it was also the meaning and intention of the testatrix that the whole residue of her executry estate, but "deeply burdened" with annuities, should at her death be made over to her nephew Patrick Maitland, whom failing, to his heir-at-law, if in possession of the family estates.

Colonel John Maitland, his uncle, besides claiming on the footing of intestacy, claimed,—“3. The claimant, John Maitland, failing all the children of his brother, the said Patrick Maitland, claims that at the death of the last surviving annuitant he shall be ranked and preferred to the fund in medio, as it shall exist at that time, if the estates of Freugh and Balgreggan shall then remain unsold.”

He pleaded;—3. On a sound construction of the will of the testatrix, the claimant, John Maitland, failing children of his brother, Patrick Maitland, will be entitled, at the death of the last surviving annuitant, other than himself, to be ranked and preferred to the fund in medio, as it shall then exist, if the estates of Freugh and Balgreggan shall at that time remain unsold, and he should now be contingently ranked accordingly, as craved in his claim.

On 10th February 1863 the Lord Ordinary (Ormidale) pronounced this interlocutor:—“Finds that, according to the sound legal construction of the said testamentary writings, the claimant John Maitland, as the heir-at-law of the late Patrick Maitland of Freugh, and, as such, now in possession as proprietor of the estates of Freugh and Balgreggan, is entitled to the residue remaining of the testatrix Miss Maitland's means and estate, after payment of all the specific legacies and annuities left by her . . . Sustains the claim for John Maitland of Freugh, for immediate payment of the residue of the testatrix's executry estate, so far as not necessary to be retained by the raiser, Mr Smith, as executor of Miss Maitland, to meet the annuities still remaining charged against it; reserving to the said John Maitland, and all others whom it may concern, his or their claims on the remaining portion of said residue, which, in the meantime, is to be retained by the pursuer, as Miss Maitland's executor: Repels the claims for all the parties so far as not now sustained, subject always to said reservation, and decerns.”

On a reclaiming note the First Division, on 15th January 1864, adhered to this interlocutor (reported 2 Macph. 417, 36 Scot. Jur. 204).

John of Freugh having died shortly afterwards, the whole residue of the estate was paid over to his mother, Mrs Matilda Frances Harriet Maitland, who had been confirmed executor-dative to him, under reservation of a sum of £7000 retained to meet the outstanding annuities.

John was succeeded in Freugh by his younger brother William; he died unmarried in January 1881, leaving a disposition by which he conveyed his whole personal estate and the liferent of Freugh to his mother, and the fee of Freugh to his uncle, Colonel John Maitland.

Colonel John Maitland died in March 1881, leaving a conveyance of his estates in favour of his three daughters, who subsequently conveyed Freugh to their brother Elphinstone Vans Agnew Maitland. He also made up a separate title by serving himself heir to his father.

In 1886, the whole residue being then available for division, Mrs Maitland raised a new action of multiplepounding in name of Mr Thomas M'Caig, who had been appointed judicial factor on the fund on Mr Smith's death, for distribution of the estate.

She claimed the whole fund, founding on the judgment in the former action. Elphinstone Vans Agnew Maitland also claimed the whole fund, pleading that the residue did not vest till the time of distribution, and that he was entitled to the residue in terms of the settlement as the head of the house in possession of the estate of Freugh at the date of vesting.

No. 61.

The Lord Ordinary (M'Laren), on 13th July 1886, ranked and preferred the claimant Mrs Maitland to the whole fund. The question chiefly debated before his Lordship and in the Inner-House upon a reclaiming note was whether Lord Ormidale in the former action had disposed of the whole fund, or only of so much of it as was then available for payment. In the course of the argument in the Inner-House doubts were expressed upon the bench whether Elphinstone Maitland and his father, Colonel John, were so identified one with the other that the former was open to the plea of res judicata in respect of the judgment pronounced against the latter.

Jan. 5, 1887.
M'Caig v.
Maitland.

It was argued for Elphinstone that there was no person in existence at the date of the former action who held the character which he now held, and even if Colonel John Maitland had assumed that character, the present claimant did not take through him, and, indeed, could not, for the Colonel had never held the character on which the present claimant founded.

Argued for Mrs Maitland;—There did not require to be identity of persons to found a res judicata, but merely identity of legal title. A judgment against one heir of entail bound the whole series in matters affecting the entailed estate,¹ and a judgment against one member of the public bound all in a question of public right.² [LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—But take the case of a claim lodged by trustees in a multiple-poining that they are entitled to retain the fund to await certain contingencies, is a judgment against them res judicata against all claimants to the fund, who might put forward the same pleas as they have put forward?] Yes. That was a case very much like the present, and although no authority could be cited for it, the principle of res judicata demanded that, when a question had been fought out between parties having a title and interest to fight it, either de facto or, as here, ex concessis, the judgment between them should be regarded as putting an end to that question between parties who had no new title and no new arguments to advance. Here Elphinstone Maitland could say nothing that might not have been said by Colonel Maitland.

In reply, the Solicitor-General, for Elphinstone Maitland, confined his argument to the question whether Lord Ormidale had disposed of the whole fund or not. In answer to the Court he stated that he was prepared to concede the other point.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think it is impossible that this party, who simply represents the position which Colonel John Maitland held in the former process, should be again allowed to raise the question of John Maitland's right to the whole residue which, I think, was finally and conclusively determined.

LORD CRAIGHILL and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

J. & A. FORMAN & THOMSON, W.S.—TODD, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—Agents.

¹ Earl of Leven v. Cartwright, June 12, 1861, 23 D. 1088, 33 Scot. Jur. 521.

² Cf. Jenkins v. Robertson and Others, April 5, 1867, 5 Macph. (H. of L.) 27, 39 Scot. Jur. 384.

No. 62.

ALEXANDER MACLEOD AND ANOTHER, Pursuers (Respondents).—

*D.-F. Mackintosh—T. R. Clark.*JAMES M. DAVIDSON AND OTHERS, Defendants (Appellants).—Scott—Rhind.

Jan. 6, 1887.
 Macleod, &c. v.
 Davidson, &c.

Process—Expenses—Citation Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. 77)—Service by officer of Court.—In taxing an account of expenses the cost of service by an officer of Court in ordinary form will be allowed where the party cited does not reside in a postal delivery district, and where it is improbable that a letter of citation will reach him.

2D DIVISION.
 Sheriff of Inverness, Elgin,
 and Nairn.
 1.

(SEQUEL to Macleod, &c. v. Davidson, &c., Nov. 17, 1886, supra, p. 92.)

In taxing the pursuers' account of expenses the Auditor disallowed a sum of £31, 14s. 6d. charged under date 27th November 1884. This sum represented the cost incurred in serving on the defenders the petition and the deliverance thereon granting interim interdict. The service was made by a Sheriff-officer sent from Inverness, all the Sheriff-officers in Skye having resigned their offices. In place of this sum the Auditor allowed £1, 18s. 10d., being the amount of fees of service by registered letter in terms of the Citation Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. 77). The pursuers lodged objections to the Auditor's report.

It was admitted that the defenders did not reside within a postal delivery district.

Argued for the pursuers;—There was no delivery from the post-office at Staffin by letter-carriers, so that a registered letter could not have been tendered to the defenders. There was no probability that they would call for these letters of service at the post-office. There were a large number of defenders, and if one of them even had failed to call for his letter the case could not proceed. The Act only intended to introduce the machinery of the post-office so far as suitable for the purpose, but where, as here, it would have been quite unsuitable, the Act did not apply. The pursuers really had only one way open to them, namely, to serve by an officer in person, as notoriously the state of feeling in Skye at present in regard to proprietary rights was such that the defenders would have taken care not to call for letters which they knew to contain citations. But even if citation by post were possible, it would undoubtedly have been very uncertain, and the pursuers were entitled to take the only way likely to be effectual.

Argued for the defenders;—Section 4 (subsection 5) of the Act provided for such a case as this, where there was no delivery by the post-office. If not called for within twenty-four hours, the letter is to be returned. The pursuers were bound in the first instance to have tried service by post before incurring such expense in service by officer, and there was no pressing hurry in the case, as the trespass complained of had happened months before the action was raised. Section 6 provided that only fees for service by post should be allowed on taxation unless it were not expedient in the interests of justice that such service should be made.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question here is whether the successful party is to be allowed the expense of serving the summons of interdict by means of a Sheriff-officer, who went and served the writs personally, or whether he is only entitled to the expense of serving the writs through the post in terms of the recent statute.

But it is averred, and it is admitted, that the post-office in this district does not deliver letters. If persons call for them they receive them, and if these letters had been called for they would have been received. But the probability is that they would not have been called for, and therefore it is probable that that would not have been an effectual method of serving this important writ. There are provisions, no doubt, in the Act of Parliament for the event of notices not reaching the party to whom they are addressed. These are natural and proper provisions in cases to which the statute properly applies, but not in cases where it is an admitted fact that the mode indicated by the statute is not a certain or safe mode of transmission, and that the probability is that the writs would not have reached the parties. I am therefore for sustaining these objections.

LORD CRAIGHILL and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT sustained the objections.

SKENE, EDWARDS, & BILTON, W.S.—WILLIAM OFFICER, S.S.C.—Agents.

THE PROPERTY INVESTMENT COMPANY OF SCOTLAND, LIMITED, Pursuers
(Respondents).—Gloag—G. W. Burnet. No. 62.
ALEXANDER DUNCAN, Defender (Reclaimer).—Scott—Jameson.

Jan. 6, 1887.
Macleod, &c. v.
Davidson, &c.

ALEXANDER DUNCAN, Petitioner.—Scott—Jameson.

THE PROPERTY INVESTMENT COMPANY OF SCOTLAND, LIMITED, Respondents.
—Gloag—G. W. Burnet.

Company—Transfer of shares—Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 89), sec. 35—Unnecessary delay in registering transfer—Rectification of register.—A shareholder transferred fifty shares in a company, the stock in which was then unsaleable, to his wife, whose sole separate estate consisted of an alimentary annuity of £150 a-year. The transfer was intimated to the company in December 1883. The transfer was not considered at the first meeting of directors, which took place in January, but at the next meeting, which took place in April, the directors, in the exercise of a power given to them by the articles of association, declined, without cause assigned, to register the transfer, and the rejection was communicated to the holder.

In an action for payment of subsequent calls against the original shareholder, the defender maintained that in consequence of the unnecessary delay of the directors in dealing with the transfer he was no longer liable for calls. The defender also presented a petition for rectification of the register. Held (1) that there had been “unnecessary delay,” in the sense of the 35th section of the Companies Act, 1862, in the directors not disposing of the transfer at their first meeting, but that this did not of itself entitle the defender to have the transfer registered; and (2) that although the defender might have been entitled to have the register rectified if he could have shewn that he had been prejudiced through the delay of the directors in dealing with the transfer, he had failed to instruct such prejudice, the shares having been unsaleable during the whole time. The Court therefore gave decree for the calls, and refused the petition.

ALEXANDER DUNCAN, S.S.C., held fifty shares of £10 each—on which £1 had been paid—in the Property Investment Company of Scotland, Limited. In consequence of a heavy fall in the value of these shares he determined to get rid of them, and instructed his broker, Mr Denholm, to this effect. No other purchaser having been found, they were, on 22d December 1883, sold to his wife, Mrs Duncan, at sixpence per share, and on the same day Mr Denholm sent the transfer to the company's secretary for registration, and asked him to forward the certificate with as little delay as possible, at the same time enclosing the registration fee.

1st Division.
Lord Fraser.
B.

No. 63.

Jan. 6, 1887.
Property Investment Co.
of Scotland,
Limited, v.
Duncan.

The first meeting of the directors of the company took place in January 1884, but the transfer was not taken into consideration until the next meeting on 9th April thereafter, when it was declined by the directors, under the power conferred by the 32d article of association.* Intimation to this effect was made on 14th April by the secretary to Mr Denholm, and the certificate, transfer, and registration fee were returned. This was notified to Mr Duncan by Mr Denholm.

In March 1886 an action was brought by the company against Mr Duncan concluding for payment of calls made since the date of the transfer.

The defender stated that he had sold the shares as above narrated to his wife, who had separate estate not subject to the defender's debts or deeds, and that there had been "unnecessary delay" within the meaning of the 35th section of the Companies Act, 1862,† on the part of the company in not dealing with the matter between December 1883 and April 1884. "The pursuers grossly neglected their said duty, and by such neglect the defender was precluded from redispensing of said shares, and otherwise sustained loss."

The defender pleaded;—The pursuers not having dealt with the defender's transfer at their first ordinary business meeting, or at least without any unnecessary delay, the defender is not liable for payment of said calls.

A proof was led in which the facts narrated above were proved, and from which it further appeared that in January 1884, when Mr Duncan's transfer was sent to the bank, the company's shares were not saleable,—they had remained unsaleable ever since,—and were removed from the Stock Exchange list shortly afterwards. The neglect of the directors to consider Mr Duncan's transfer at the first meeting after intimation of it was stated by their secretary to have been an omission on the part of the clerk.

It appeared that Mrs Duncan was in right of an alimentary annuity of £150 a-year. This income ceased with her death, which took place before this action was brought.

The Lord Ordinary (Fraser), on 7th July 1886, gave decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons.‡

* "The board shall have power to decline registering any transfer in favour of any person whom they may consider it against the interest of the company to admit as a shareholder, and that without any cause expressed or assigned."

† The 35th section of the Companies Act, 1862, enacts,—“If the name of any person is, without sufficient cause, entered in or omitted from the register of members of any company under this Act, or if default is made, or unnecessary delay takes place in entering on the register the fact of any person having ceased to be a member of the company, the person or member aggrieved, or any member of the company, or the company itself, . . . as respects companies registered in Scotland may by summary petition to the Court of Session, . . . apply for an order of the Court that the register may be rectified, and the Court may either refuse such application . . . or it may, if satisfied of the justice of the case, make an order for the rectification of the register, and may direct the company to pay all the costs of such motion, application, or petition, and any damages the party aggrieved may have sustained,” &c.

‡ “OPINION.— . . . The defence in the present action is that the case must be dealt with on the footing that the transfer was duly registered. The pursuers have assigned no reason for not registering the transfer, except that they consider it for the interest of their company not to make the registration, and they found upon the 32d section of their articles of association. And the 29th section provides that ‘the instrument of transfer of any share in the company shall be executed both by the transferor and transferee, and the transferor shall be deemed to remain a holder of such share until the name of the transferee is entered in the register-book in respect thereof.’ Now, it is no

No. 63.

Jan. 6, 1887.
Property Investment Co.
of Scotland,
Limited, v.
Duncan.

The defender reclaimed.

On 19th August following he presented a petition, under the 35th section of the Companies Act, 1862, for rectification of the register, and answers were thereafter lodged by the company. The averments made therein were similar to those founded on in the action, and the proof was held by the parties as applicable to both processes.

When the case came on for hearing in the Inner-House, the reclainer and petitioner argued;—Admitting the power of the company to decline to register the transfer, there was undue delay on their part from December to April to take it into consideration.¹ The declinature to entertain objection to the action of the directors of the pursuers' company that they have assigned no reason for their declinature to register the transfer, for they have by their articles of association power to do so.—(See In re Gresham Life Assurance Society, ex parte Penney, 20th December 1872, L. R., 8 Chanc. App. 446.)

“But it is further said that the pursuers are barred from pleading that the transfer was not registered in favour of the transferee, and this by reason of their delay in disposing of the matter. The directors had no stated days of meeting; they only met when there was business to attend to. After the transfer was sent in there was a meeting of the directors in January 1884, at which consideration might have been had of the transfer, but the matter was overlooked, and, as Mr Couper, the secretary, states, this was in consequence of the neglect of the clerk in not putting it among the agenda for that day. The next meeting of the directors took place on the 9th of April, when the resolution was come to not to register the transfer. Now, it is maintained by the defender that there was here such unnecessary delay as to entitle the defender to escape liability for the calls. The 35th section of the Companies Act, 1862, does provide a remedy against unnecessary delay in the registration of transfers. It provides that the person aggrieved may, by summary petition to the Court of Session, apply for an order of the Court that the register may be rectified. This course was not adopted by the defender, who allowed his name to remain upon the register for a whole year without any intimation being given by him to the company that he considered the refusal to register the transfer as a grievance. There have been many decisions in England holding that unnecessary delay will entitle a party to have his name removed from the register.—(See In re Joint Stock Discount Company (Fyfe's case), 9th July 1869, L. R., 4 Chanc. App. 768; In re Joint Stock Discount Company (Nation's case), 10th December 1866, L. R., 3 Eq. 77; In re Stranton Iron and Steel Company, 26th July 1873, L. R., 16 Eq. 559; In re Hercules Insurance Company (Lowe's case), 27th January 1870, L. R., 9 Eq. 589.) But these cases do not go the length of justifying the broad statement made by Mr Buckley in his Treatise on the Companies Acts, at p. 117, where he says,—‘A transfer, to which no objection is or can be made on the part of the company, ought to be confirmed by the directors at the first meeting at which, in the ordinary course of business, it can be confirmed, and thereupon registered. If not so confirmed at the first meeting at which, in the ordinary course of business, it can be done, there is “unnecessary delay” within the meaning of the section.’ This is by far too general and comprehensive, and does not take into account the special circumstances that may exist, such as, in this case, long acquiescence by the defender in his name being retained upon the register after he had got distinct notice that registration of the transfer was refused. His remedy was then by petition to the Court, which he did not adopt, and the redress he now seeks of resisting payment of calls while he is upon the register as a shareholder is not the remedy which the statute gives him. This may be added, that no special damage was sustained by the defender in consequence of the delay in dealing with the transfer. The shares were unsaleable in January equally as in April 1884, and the depression in the property market makes them unsaleable still.”

¹ Authorities quoted in the Lord Ordinary's note; also In re Joint Stock Discount Company (Hill's case), reported in the foot-note to Fyfe's case, 1869, L. R., 4 Chanc. App. 769.

No. 63.

Jan. 8, 1887.
Property Investment Co.
of Scotland,
Limited, v.
Duncan.

the transfer ought to have been intimated after the January meeting of the directors.¹ The excuse that this neglect was owing to the mistake of a clerk could not be listened to. [LORD SHAND cited the case In re Joint Stock Discount Company (Shipman's case), Jan. 20, 1868, L. R., 5 Eq. 219, and asked if the company had not a good cause for refusal, the transferee being a married lady with nothing beyond an alimentary income of £150, and who had since died.] The transfer was perfectly bona fide, and the shares had been paid for by the lady. There was no delay to take action on the part of the reclamer such as barred him from maintaining his right to have the transfer registered. He was entitled to assume that this had been, or ought to have been, done by the company when it was originally sent them.

The respondents were not called on.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The action in which Lord Fraser's interlocutor was pronounced is at the instance of the Property Investment Company, Limited, against Mr Duncan, for payment of two calls, of £1 per share, upon his holding in the company. The interlocutor is dated 7th July 1886. Subsequently the defender presented a petition, under the 35th section of the Companies Act of 1862, to have the register of shareholders rectified by the deletion of his name. The argument we have heard applies to both processes, and the defence in the action and the statements in the petition are founded upon the same grounds, and may be disposed of together, and at once.

I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is right, and accordingly that the petition must be refused. The transfer by Mr Duncan to his wife was dated in December 1883, and was presented to the directors of the company shortly afterwards, but it was not disposed of until the meeting of the directors in April following, and it is said that this constituted an unnecessary delay on the part of the directors in disposing of it, and I am very clearly of opinion that there was unnecessary delay. Undoubtedly the transfer ought to have been disposed of, at all events, at the first meeting of the directors after it was presented.

But what is the consequence of such unnecessary delay under the 35th section of the Companies Act of 1862? Nothing but this, so far as I can see, that it gives the party presenting the transfer a right to present a petition to this Court to have the register rectified if he can shew good ground for this. But unnecessary delay does not in itself constitute a ground for rectification of the register. The reasons which the directors of a company may have for refusing to register a transfer are many, and if in reply by the company to a petition for rectification founded on unnecessary delay the latter come into Court and aver, apart altogether from the particular terms of the articles of association, that the transfer is due to fraud or has been brought about by dishonest means or some such cause, it would afford a very good answer. The mere occurrence of unnecessary delay will certainly not be a good ground for an order by the Court upon the directors to register a transfer executed by a member, and the company must always be entitled to shew that although there has been unnecessary delay sufficient to justify an application to the Court, there are good reasons for not having the transfer registered.

The reason assigned here is, that the directors were of opinion that it was not for the benefit of the company that the transfer should be registered, and that, according to the articles of association, was, I think, a perfectly good reason for refusing to register it. The clause is expressed in this form,—“The board shall have power to decline registering any transfer in favour of any person whom they may consider it against the interest of the company to admit as a shareholder, and that without any cause expressed or assigned.”

¹ Buckley on the Companies Acts, 117.

No. 68.
Jan. 6, 1887.
Property Investment Co.
of Scotland,
Limited, v.
Duncan.

It is not necessary for the Court to inquire why the directors considered it was not in the interest of the company to register the transfer, for I do not think they were bound to assign any cause. But we can form a pretty shrewd guess. The transfer is by a husband in favour of his wife, and the directors were either not aware, or at anyrate were not satisfied, that the transferee, being a married woman, had separate estate. Or if it be the case that the trust-deed which we have seen was exhibited to them, they were well justified in saying that it was so doubtful whether she had separate estate or not that they would not register it. They had a good reason for declining, and whether they had a good reason or not they had a sufficient title and right to decline.

But I am bound to make this qualification. I think that if the petitioner can shew that he was prejudiced by the unnecessary delay which occurred, that might be a very good reason for insisting upon a rectification of the register. If the petitioner was in a position to say that had the transfer been considered at the first meeting after it was sent in, and the refusal then intimated, he could have found a purchaser who would have been unobjectionable, he would thus have been able to put forward a strong case of hardship which might have afforded ground for a rectification of the register. But this is not the state of the facts. The shares were entirely unsaleable, and could not have been disposed of by the petitioner even if the refusal by the directors had been timeously made. The prejudice therefore to the petitioner is entirely imaginary and fanciful.

In the English cases which have been cited on the point of unnecessary delay, the delay was always followed by liquidation, and accordingly the person who had failed to have his transfer registered was very deeply wronged, and was thereby put into the position of having his name put upon the list of contributors. Accordingly, if he could have alleged prejudice of that kind, that might have been a reason for striking his name off the register. But here there was no possibility of any prejudice being suffered. I am therefore for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor and refusing the prayer of the petition.

LORD MURE.—I am of the same opinion. There was undoubtedly some delay in the first instance on the part of the directors to consider the transfer after it had been presented for registration. Nothing was done for several months after it had been given in, and the petitioner then had it in his power to complain to the Court that the company were wrong in the course they were pursuing, and to ask to have them ordained to rectify the register. But I do not think that on the merits he would necessarily have succeeded in any such application. For the directors were entitled to refuse to register a transfer without shewing any special cause. And even if the directors had been bound to shew cause for what they did, and the matter had been brought before us at once, it rather appears to me that we should not, in the circumstances of this case, have been able to find any sufficient grounds for ordaining the directors to substitute the name of the defender's wife for that of the defender. She was merely an annuitant in an alimentary fund, and had no separate estate of her own to enable her to meet calls upon the shares for which her husband was

No. 63.

Jan. 6, 1887.
Property Investment Co.
of Scotland,
Limited, v.
Duncan.

liable. This would, I think, have been a sufficient reason for the company to assign for their refusal to register the transfer, and I am of opinion that the defences must be repelled.

LORD SHAND.—The transfer which is the subject of discussion in this case was rejected by the directors of the company on 9th April 1884, and intimation of the rejection was then sent to Mr Duncan's broker, and it was not until April 1885—a year later, and a month after the first call was made upon the shares—that any notice was given to the company by the transferee that he considered himself entitled to have the transfer given effect to. And the ground of the Lord Ordinary's judgment is that so long acquiescence in his name being retained on the register prevents him from successfully maintaining his defence to the action for payment of calls. I am not disposed to differ from the Lord Ordinary upon that point. It appears to me that if an objection on the ground of unnecessary delay on the part of a company is to be insisted in, it must be taken timeously, and if not acceded to, then insisted on in the form prescribed by the 35th section of the Companies Act, 1862, viz., by a petition for rectification of the register.

But, apart from the plea of acquiescence, I think the petition which has now been brought must be refused on other grounds. The 35th section, to which I have referred, deals with two points, with reference to which a person may make application to the Court. In the first place, if a name be, without sufficient cause, entered in or omitted from a register of members, or, in the second place, if default be made, or unnecessary delay take place, in entering on the register the fact of any person having ceased to be a member of the company, the person aggrieved may apply to the Court to have the register rectified; and then the section proceeds,—“And the Court may either refuse such application, with or without costs, to be paid by the applicant, or it may, if satisfied of the justice of the case, make an order for the rectification of the register, and may direct the company to pay all the costs.” It appears to me that the question we have to decide is whether, according to “the justice of the case,” Mr Duncan is entitled to have the register rectified. The directors, in my opinion, had a very good ground for rejecting the transfer, because the alleged separate estate to which this lady was entitled consisted merely of a fund for her maintenance, which was purely alimentary, and ceased with her life.

But further, in order to make out a case in which such an application should be granted, the petitioner must shew that he has suffered prejudice. Your Lordship in the chair has said enough to shew that there was no prejudice here to the petitioner. The shares were not in the market, and no purchaser could have been found for them. Unnecessary delay, no doubt, took place on the part of the directors, because it was incumbent upon them to have dealt with the transfer at the meeting immediately after it was sent in, but the petitioner was not prejudiced by the delay. Suppose that he had been informed after that meeting that the transfer had been rejected: Is there any reason to think that he could have found a purchaser—not a man of straw, because he would not have satisfied the directors, but a man of means? The whole circumstances of the case shew that no such purchaser could have been found. Accordingly I am of opinion that no order for rectification of the register can be granted by the Court, although I think there was unnecessary delay on the part of the company.

LORD ADAM.—I concur in the doctrine of law which is laid down by Mr No. 63.
Buckley, and is quoted by the Lord Ordinary,—“A transfer, to which no objection is or can be made on the part of the company, ought to be confirmed Jan. 6, 1887.
 by the directors at the first meeting at which in the ordinary course of business Property Init can be confirmed, and thereupon registered. If not so confirmed at the first vestment Co.
 meeting at which in the ordinary course of business it can be done, there is of Scotland, ‘unnecessary delay’ within the meaning of the section.” But then, I think Limited, v.
 that the result is that, there being unnecessary delay, the remedy of the Duncan.
 aggrieved person is to present a petition for rectification of the register under the provisions of the 35th section of the Companies Act of 1862. This has now been done by the petitioner, and what we have now to consider is, whether we are satisfied of the justice of the case which he submits to us—involving as that does all the facts and circumstances connected with it up to the date when the petition was presented. There is one most material fact in the case, viz., that so far back as April 1884 the petitioner had intimation that his transfer was not to be registered, and that he took no steps thereafter until the action for payment of calls was brought. Perhaps this might not be conclusive, but at any rate it is a most important circumstance. But when it is further apparent that the petitioner has suffered no prejudice through the delay, I have no difficulty in concurring with your Lordships in adhering to the Lord Ordinary’s interlocutor in the petitory action and in refusing the petition.

THE COURT adhered to the Lord Ordinary’s interlocutor, and further refused the petition.

WATT & ANDERSON, S.S.C.—PARTY—Agent.

WILLIAM MONCUR, Appellant.—D.-F. Mackintosh—Rhind. No. 64.
JOHN MACDONALD AND OTHERS, Respondents.—Pearson—C. J. Guthrie.

Bankruptcy—Sequestration—Election of Trustee—Sheriff.—A note of objec- Jan. 8, 1887.
 tions was lodged with a Sheriff against his confirming the election of a trustee Moncur v. on a sequestrated estate, in which the objector alleged that the person elected Macdonald, was unsuitable on various grounds, and that the cautioner proposed was insuffi- ac.
 cient. The Sheriff allowed a proof, and the trustee appealed to the Court of Session.

The Court sustained the competency of the appeal, but, without deciding as to the relevancy of the averments, refused to interfere with the Sheriff’s exercise of his discretion in ordering inquiry.

In a competition for the election of a trustee (in succession to Mr 1st DIVISION.
Charles John Munro, who had resigned) upon the sequestrated estates of Sheriff of In-Murdo Macdonald, corn-factor, Inverness, William Moncur, writer, Edin- verness-shire.
burgh, having a majority of the creditors’ votes, was elected. The security M.
 fixed by the creditors was £100.

Objections were lodged on behalf of the bankrupt, of John Macdonald, the bankrupt’s brother—who was a creditor to the amount of £114,—and of John Grant, who was a candidate for the office of trustee.

The objectors stated ;—“(1) William Moncur, first named as trustee, is entirely unsuitable. It is averred that he is an old man, who was at one time a clerk, and is now lodging in a close in the Canongate in Edin- burgh, and is without means or occupation. The person proposed as his cautioner is a clerk to Mr David Howard Smith, who is acting as agent in the sequestration. He is without means, and utterly insufficient as cautioner for a trustee in a sequestration.” (4) “The objectors allege that

No. 64.

Jan. 8, 1887.
Moncur v.
Macdonald,
&c.

the parties proposing Messrs Moncur and Anderson [who was another candidate] are purposely endeavouring to appoint a man of straw to the post of trustee, in order that actions and claims against him, which might arise out of his administration, or the proceedings taken by him, or in his name, might be frustrated by the absence of means in the case both of himself and the person put forward as cautioner. It is also averred that Mr Charles John Munro, who recently resigned office, resigned in order to escape responsibility for claims of a similar character."

The Sheriff-substitute (Blair), on 7th December 1886, found the objections relevant, and allowed the objectors a proof of their averments.

Moncur appealed to the First Division of the Court of Session, and argued;—The outstanding assets of the estate were practically nil, and consisted of some debts which the bankrupt had asked should be handed over to him, as he was the only person who could make anything of them. Mr Munro—the former trustee—had discovered that shortly before the sequestration the bankrupt had conveyed over a valuable house property to his brother for an alleged illusory consideration—which it was intended to reduce—and consequently there was a reason for not giving effect to the objections stated on the part of the bankrupt and his brother. The allegations as to the appellant's unfitness for the post of trustee were irrelevant. It was not said that he was insolvent—the term "without means" was too vague. Besides, the whole body of creditors except the bankrupt's brother were satisfied with him. The averments as to his age and place of residence were quite insufficient and irrelevant to warrant the inquiry proposed by the Sheriff.¹ Further, the basis of the claim made by the bankrupt's brother was alleged advances by the bankrupt.

The respondents at first objected to the competency of the appeal, but having regard to previous decisions which were cited on the other side,² the objection was afterwards departed from.

They argued on the merits;—Such objections as were stated to the trustee here were relevant, and such as the Court were bound to consider.³ It was intended to prove that from infirmities or otherwise the appellant was unfit for the work of trustee. Further, the creditors were not entitled to dispense with caution, or to make it elusory.⁴

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think the respondents are satisfied that their objection to the competency of this appeal could not be maintained, and therefore it is not necessary to say more than that, looking to previous authorities, it would be impossible to sustain it.

Upon the merits the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor allows an inquiry, and allows it in the shape of a proof of certain averments against the eligibility of one of the candidates for the office of trustee. That is a matter which I think the statute means to entrust to the discretion of the Judge in the Court below, and it is not desirable that this Court should lightly interfere with an order made by a Sheriff or Sheriff-substitute in the course of action taken by him in confirming the appointment of a trustee. The objections submitted by the respondents to the relevancy of the averments may no doubt have some weight, but I am not disposed to deal with these as if there was a formal record made

¹ Wylie, &c. v. Kyd, June 21, 1884, 11 R. 968.

² Tennent v. Crawford, Jan. 12, 1878, 5 R. 433; Galt v. Macrae, June 9, 1880, 7 R. 888; Wylie, &c. v. Kyd, &c., May 21, 1884, 11 R. 820.

³ Bell's Comma. (5th ed.) ii. 371; Threshie, Petitioner, May 30, 1815, F. C.

⁴ A. B., Petitioner, Feb. 19, 1833, 11 S. 412; Bell v. Carstairs, Dec. 17, 1842, 5 D. 318 (Lord Mackenzie, p. 323), 15 Scot. Jur. 131.

up for trial. This is an incidental inquiry in the course of a proceeding taken No. 64.
with a view to the election of a trustee, and if the Sheriff-substitute thinks it is Jan. 8, 1887.
not safe to proceed without having the facts cleared up and some further in- Moncur v.
vestigation, I do not think we ought to interfere. Macdonald,
&c.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND.—The objections in the present case are personal to the proposed trustee and his cautioner, and are therefore different in character from such objections as relate to the validity of votes in an election—which the Court has sometimes had to consider. The Sheriff here holds the objections to be relevant. It is clear that as regards a final deliverance by a Sheriff confirming the election of a trustee there is no appeal, and although it has been held (as I think, on grounds which are not satisfactory) that interlocutory judgments prior to the final confirmation may be made the subject of appeal, I am disposed as far as possible to limit these.

The Sheriff being vested with the power of deciding the ultimate appointment, I do not think we should readily interfere with the exercise of his discretion in any preliminary steps he may think necessary to take. If he plainly transgresses the proper limits of that discretion, the Court will interfere, as was done in the case of Wylie (11 R. 968), but I do not think there is ground here for our interference. I further think that we must not scrutinise and weigh the averments made by the objectors in the same way as we should do under a closed record, and on the whole I am for refusing the appeal.

LORD ADAM concurred.

APPEAL refused.

D. HOWARD SMITH, Solicitor—JOHN C. BRODIE & SONS, W.S.—Agents.

BENJAMIN BREATCLIFF AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Chisholm. No. 65.
JOHN SMITH AND ANOTHER (Bransby's Trustees), Defenders (Respondents).—Murray—G. R. Gillespie.

Jan. 11, 1887.
Breatcliff, &c.
v. Bransby's
Trustees.

Trust—Investment of trust-funds—Real security.—Held that an English will authorising investments on "real security" authorised investment on a railway mortgage.

By a will in the English form Mrs Mary Bransby of Bramham, York-2^d Division.
shire, bequeathed her whole personal estate to the Rev. Samuel Martin, Lord Kinnear.
Bathgate, and James Freeland, Bathgate, "their executors, administrators, M. and assigns," in trust for certain purposes, giving them power to invest "upon Government or real securities." The will was dated in 1844, and Mrs Bransby died on 3d April 1845.

The beneficiaries in the trust now pursued trustees who had been assumed in 1867 upon the death of the original trustees, concluding for declarator that "the investment made by the defenders, on or about 1st November 1876, of £800 of the trust-funds on mortgage of the Girvan and Portpatrick Junction Railway Company was not an investment authorised by the said will or by statute, and was ultra vires of the defenders as trustees foresaid, and that the defenders should be found and declared to be liable as individuals for all loss arising from said investment," with a corresponding conclusion for accounting and repayment.

The pursuers stated,—“No interest has been received from the said company since Martinmas 1878 except a sum of £8, 16s. on 3d Novem-

No. 65. ber 1884, and the said mortgage is much depreciated in value, if not unrealisable. This investment was not authorised by the said will or by statute, and was ultra vires of the trustees. The pursuers have sustained loss through this investment having been made, and the defenders are personally liable for the loss sustained."

Jan. 11, 1887.
Breatcliff, &c.
v. Bransby's
Trustees.

Their plea was,—(1) The said investment not being authorised by the said will or by statute, was ultra vires of the defenders as trustees fore-said, and they are bound to make good the loss thereby occasioned.

The defenders stated,—“At the time of the purchase the said mortgage was a perfectly good security, and was secured to replace debentures of the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company, which had been bought by the original trustees, and had been paid up by the company.”

They pleaded that, the investment being within their powers, they ought to be assolizied.

On 23d July 1886 the Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) sustained this plea, and assolizied the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, other than the conclusions for accounting.*

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued,—This was not a real security in the sense of the will, although there might be some elements of a heritable security in it. It was rather an investment in the business of a trading concern, and such an investment had been condemned.¹ Even if it were a real security, it was one of a bad class, and such as the Courts in England had refused to sanction,² the principal reason being that the investor had not the ordinary remedies of a heritable creditor, viz., entering into possession and realisation. No. 65.

* “NOTE.—The only question argued was whether the investment of a portion of the trust-funds on the security of a mortgage by a railway company, assigning the undertaking in the usual form, was authorised by the trust-deed. The trustees are empowered to invest the estate upon Government or real securities; and the question is, whether a mortgage of the Girvan and Portpatrick Railway Company is a real security within the meaning of the power. I think it is, because it gives to the mortgagee the security of the whole undertaking,—that is, of the whole real and moveable property of the company. It is true that it is a security which cannot be made available to the creditor by the ordinary diligence of the law. But he has a different kind of diligence in his right to obtain the appointment of a judicial factor, through whose administration the undertaking may be managed or disposed of for the benefit of the company's creditors. The mortgagee has therefore the security of the real property, which is what is meant by a real security. The pursuers, however, maintain, on the authority of Mant v. Leith, 15 Beavan, 524, that a railway mortgage is not within the power given to the trustees, even assuming it to be a real security. There is much weight in the considerations stated by the Master of the Rolls against the eligibility of such securities. But it cannot be held in Scotland that they are improper investments so as to infer personal liability against the trustees, who have selected them in the exercise of a power expressly conferred by the trust-deed, since they are investments which the Legislature has empowered all trustees to make, unless they are expressly prohibited by the deed. It may be that the investment in question could not be supported by the subsequent enactment of the Trusts Amendment Act if it were not within the class of securities authorised by the trust itself. But the Act appears to me to suggest a sufficient answer to the argument founded on Mant v. Leith, that a railway mortgage is in its nature so improper an investment that trustees will not be justified in selecting it even if it be shewn to fall within a general power conferred upon them by the trust. It is not suggested that if they were entitled to invest in railway mortgages at all, the defenders were negligent in their selection of the mortgage in question, or that the Girvan and Portpatrick Railway Company was not in good credit when the investment was made.”

¹ Whitely v. Learoyd, March 1886, L. R., 32 Ch. Div. 196.

² Mant v. Leith, March 1852, 15 Beav. 524.

Argued for the respondents;—Assuming that real security meant, as it was understood to do in England, heritable security, this was a heritable security, the whole undertaking, stations, ground, &c. being mortgaged. Was it an eligible investment? No doubt the Courts of Chancery had held that it was not, but their rules were much stricter than the rules of the Scots law, since, until authorised by statute, trustees would by them have been prohibited from investing in mortgages at all. But even their rules had been much relaxed, for it was now by statute permissible to invest funds in manibus curiæ in railway mortgages.¹ Moreover, there was direct authority in Scotland to shew that the Court approved of such investments for judicial factors,² and that judgment had been followed by a circular by the Accountant of Court declaring that such securities would be accepted in factories if good of their kind.³ It was not said that this investment was anything but good when it was made.

Jan. 11, 1887.
Breatcliff, &c.
v. Bransby's
Trustees.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think there is no ground for interfering with the Lord Ordinary's judgment. The procedure referred to by Mr Gillespie is a very strong commentary with regard to this matter. There is no doubt that there is a great deal of sound investment to be had in securities of this kind, and the Legislature and the Court have sanctioned them. The question is whether this is a real security, such as is permitted by the will. I think it is, both in the sense that it is something more than personal security, and also in the sense that it embraces a large quantity of heritable property.

LORD CRAIGHILL and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

WALLACE & BEGG, W.S.—TAIT & JOHNSTON, S.S.C.—Agents.

MRS CATHERINE MULLEN OR CONGLETON, Pursuer (Respondent).—
Macfarlane—P. Smith.

No. 66.

JAMES ANGUS, Defender (Appellant).—Ure.

Jan. 12, 1887.
Congleton v.
Angus.

Reparation—Master and Servant—Fellow-servant.—A grain-mERCHANT employed a carting contractor to carry a quantity of grain from a ship to be stored with a storing agent. One of the bags of grain, while it was being hoisted into the store, fell upon the carter employed by the contractor and killed him. Its fall was due to the fault of a servant of the storekeeper. Held that the carter and the storekeeper's servant being engaged in common labour for a common object, the storekeeper was not liable to the carter's representatives for the consequences of his servant's fault.

Woodhead v. Garriess Mineral Co., Feb. 10, 1877, 4 R. 469, and Maguire v. Russell, June 10, 1885, 10 R. 1071, followed.

WILLIAM CONGLETON, a carter working for Robert Buchanan & Son, 2^d Division, carting contractors in Glasgow, was engaged in carrying a cartload of bags of grain from the ship's side to the store belonging to James Angus, forwarding agent and general storekeeper in Glasgow. While the bags were being hoisted into the fifth storey of Angus' warehouse, one of them was allowed to fall through the fault of one Gilchrist, a servant of Angus. It fell upon Congleton and killed him. Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
I.

¹ 45 and 46 Vict. c. 38 (Settled Land Act, 1882), secs. 21 and 32.

² Accountant of Court v. Lloyd, Dec. 1, 1877, 5 R. 289.

³ Quoted in Fraser's Thoms on Judicial Factors, p. 76.

No. 66.

Jan. 12, 1887.
Congleton v.
Angus.

Robert Buchanan & Son were carrying the grain to the store under contract with David Bannerman, a grain merchant, to be stored there for him.

Congleton's widow raised an action to recover damages from Angus in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire.

She pleaded that the action had been caused by the fault of the defender, or of those for whom he was responsible.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The pursuer is not entitled to damages for the death of the deceased, seeing that it was due to the fault or negligence of a person or persons engaged in a common employment with him.

The Sheriff-substitute (Lees), on 23d June 1886, repelled the defences, and decerned against the defender for £100.*

The defender appealed, and argued;—The principle of Woodhead's case¹ ruled the present, and overruled former cases which might be quoted for the pursuer.² The case of *Abraham*³ had been overruled in the subsequent case of Rourke.⁴ The principle of Woodhead's case had been carried out subsequently in such cases as Wingate,⁵ where a surveyor's clerk had been held to be a member of the organisation of a mine, and Maguire,⁶ where a workman laying tiles in a house had been refused a remedy against the master of a plumber who was working on the roof.

The pursuer argued;—The case did not disclose any common organisation such as Woodhead's case demanded. The present case was closer to the cases of Abraham and Wyllie, which were not overruled in Woodhead's case, but were distinctly said to be law, and capable of standing along with that of Woodhead. The effect of Rourke's case upon Abraham had also been considered in Woodhead's case. The recent case of *Gorman*⁷ was nearer the present in its circumstances than Maguire's case.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—The circumstances of the case are these: A Mr Bannerman, a corn-merchant in Glasgow, employed Buchanan & Son to carry from the place in which for the time it was stored a quantity of wheat to a store in Robertson Street, Glasgow, belonging to the defender. There were two contracts for the performance of this work. One was with Robert Buchanan & Son, carting contractors, and the other with the defender. The work to be done by Buchanan & Son was not merely to carry wheat to the building of which the store was a part, but to assist in raising the wheat from the lorry to the store, which was on the fifth floor of the building. Under the other con-

* "NOTE.— The defender further urges that the two deceased were in a common employment,—that is, I presume, in his employment. The principle of common employment has certainly been extended so as to cover a good deal, but I am not aware of any case in which it has been stretched to this extent. The recent case of Gorman v. Morrison seems adverse to this view; and I may also refer to the cases of Wyllie v. Caledonian Railway Company, 9 M. 463; Calder v. Caledonian Railway Company, 9 M. 833; and Adams v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company, 3 R. 215; and to the case of Barclay v. Paton, Brown, & Co., in this Court."

¹ Woodhead v. Gartness Mineral Co., Feb. 10, 1877, 4 R. 469.

² Wyllie v. Caledonian Ry. Co., Jan. 27, 1871, 9 Macph. 463, 43 Scot. Jur. 220; Gregory v. Hill, Dec. 14, 1869, 8 Macph. 282, 42 Scot. Jur. 132.

³ Abraham v. Reynolds, Jan. 12, 1860, 5 Hurl. and Nor. 143.

⁴ Rourke v. Whitmoor Colliery Co., 1876, L. R., 1 C. P. Div. 556.

⁵ Wingate v. Monkland Iron Co., Nov. 8, 1884, 12 R. 91.

⁶ Maguire v. Russell, June 10, 1885, 12 R. 1071.

⁷ Gorman v. Morrison & Son, June 10, 1885, 12 R. 1073.

tract the wheat was not merely to be stored, but assistance was to be rendered by the defender in raising it from the lorry to his premises. And thus it came to pass that there was in the raising of the wheat to the loft a contribution of service by Buchanan & Son and a contribution of service by the defender, each through his servant assisting in raising the wheat from the cart to the store. In other words, this part of the contract was a joint work, or a work which constituted a joint employment.

No. 66,

Jan. 12, 1887.
Congleton v.
Angus.

Such were the contracts and such the work to be done. The husband of the pursuer was a carter employed by Buchanan & Son. He carted a quantity of wheat on the day on which the accident occurred to the premises of the defender. He assisted in the raising of the sacks, and Gilchrist, a servant of the defender, was also employed in this work—his part being to receive the bags as they severally were raised, to release them from the sling in which they were hoisted, and then to place them in the part of the loft where they were to be kept. One of the bags had been raised to the level of the loft. Gilchrist caught the bag, but through some fault on his part the bag, in place of being brought into the loft, slipped from Gilchrist's hands, fell upon the pursuer's husband, and injured him so that he died. Damages are now sued for, and the question is, whether, in these circumstances, the pursuer is entitled to recover? Two grounds of liability are alleged. The first is, that Gilchrist was not fit for the work to which he was put by the defender. Were this established, personal fault would be brought home to the defender, and the liability of the latter would be a necessary result. But what has been alleged has not been proved. Indeed the contrary has, I think, been established. The other ground of liability is that there was fault on the part of Gilchrist in allowing the bag to slip from his hand, and that for this fault the defender must answer. That there was fault on the part of Gilchrist was not disputed at the debate. What was insisted on by the counsel for the defender was that as Congleton, the pursuer's husband, and Gilchrist were engaged in a common work or employment, the master of the one servant is not answerable to the servant of the other. This view of the law appears to me to be supported by the case of Woodhead, Feb. 10, 1877, 4 R. 469, by the case of Wingate, Nov. 8, 1884, 12 R. 91, and by the case of Maguire, June 10, 1885, 12 R. 1071. The principle upon which these three cases were decided—and they are the latest decisions upon the subject—covers the present case, and consequently I think that the interlocutor complained of by the defender must be recalled, and the appeal dismissed. There are, no doubt, earlier cases, the application of some of which to the present would not only justify but call for an opposite decision, and an ingenious attempt was made on the part of the respondent to shew that not the more recent but the earlier cases ought to govern the decision on the present occasion. In this, however, he did not succeed. The applicability of the more recent cases to the present seems to me to be perfectly plain, and unless these are to be disregarded our decision must be in conformity with the views of the law upon which they were determined. Once a plain ground of judgment has been adopted by the Court, not on one but on several occasions, trivial differences of facts not affecting the principle of decision are not a ground on which a different judgment should be pronounced.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I cannot distinguish this case from Woodhead and Maguire.

No. 66. LORD TRAYNER.—Neither can I.

Jan. 12, 1887.
Congleton v.
Angus.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD YOUNG were absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find (1) that in September 1885 David Bannerman, grain merchant in Glasgow, employed Robert Buchanan & Son, carting contractors there, to deliver at the defender's store in Robertson Street, Glasgow, a quantity of wheat in bags; (2) that William Congleton, then in the service of the said Robert Buchanan, accordingly carted the said wheat to the said store; (3) that it was his duty to deliver it there, and in doing so to sling the bags before they were hoisted from the cart or lorry to the fifth storey of the building, in which they were to be stored, and to guide the guy-rope of the chain by which they were hoisted; (4) that John Gilchrist, a servant of the defender's, received the bags as they were hoisted to the said storey, and while so engaged allowed one of them to slip from his hold, when it fell upon Congleton and so injured him as to cause his death; (5) that this fault on the part of Gilchrist was the cause of the accident, as at the debate was admitted by the defender; (6) that the employment in which he and Congleton were thus engaged was a common employment, and for a common purpose, and was undertaken by Congleton with all its risks: Find in law that, these being the facts, the defender is not responsible for the injuries sustained by Congleton, and is not liable in compensation to the pursuers as representing him: Therefore sustain the appeal, recall the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute appealed against, assoilzie the defender," &c.

W. R. PATRICK, L.A.—DRUMMOND & REID, W.S.—Agents.

No. 67. JOSEPH FINDLAY, Pursuer (Respondent).—Jameson—G. W. Burnet.
GEORGE ANGUS, Defender (Appellant).—G. R. Gillespie.

Jan. 14, 1887.
Findlay v.
Angus.

Reparation—Precautions for safety of public—Fastening of a shed.—The front of a peat shed was closed by a door or shutter, 6 feet 3 inches in height, and 2½ cwt. in weight. This door was not hinged, but fitted into a frame, and was lifted bodily out when it was desired to open the shed. It was fitted with louvre boards, which could be opened from the outside, and which, when opened, enabled children to climb up the face of the door. The only fastening which prevented the door from falling outwards was an iron drop-bar, 3½ inches long, at the top. While this was in its place the door could not be opened. The shed stood on waste ground open to the public and frequented by children.

As three children of about ten years of age were playing about the shed, two of them climbed on the front of the door, and lifted the drop-bar, the consequence being that the door fell out and injured the third. Held that the owner of the shed was liable in damages, the fastening of the door not being sufficient for a shed standing in such a public place.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Aberdeen.
I.

GEORGE ANGUS, merchant and fish-dealer in Aberdeen, had, by leave of the Magistrates of Aberdeen, erected upon certain waste ground, reclaimed by the operations of the harbour commissioners at Aberdeen, a wooden shed for storing peats. The shed was a lean-to, its back being formed by the masonry of one of the railway arches. The front of the shed was secured by a door or shutter, 6 feet 3 inches in height, upwards of 8 feet in length, and 2½ cwt. in weight. This door did not move on hinges, but fitted into a frame, and when it was desired to open the shed it was lifted bodily out. The front of the door was fitted with louvre boards for the sake of ventilation, which could be opened or shut, somewhat in the manner of a venetian blind, by a person on the outside of the shed, without stirring the door from its place. These louvre boards, when open, gave a foothold on the front of the door. The door, when fitted into its frame, was kept from falling outwards by an iron pin, 3½ inches long, which hung down from the beam at the top of the frame, and swung upon a nail. When it was desired to open the door this pin was pushed to one side, and the door was pulled forward till it was clear of it. Until the pin was pushed aside the door could not be taken out or fall out.

There was no thoroughfare over the waste ground on which the shed stood, but children were in the habit of resorting to it in the evening to play, and there was no wall or fence to keep them out.

On the 4th August 1886 Angus' workmen shut the shed, let the pin fall into its place, and left their work soon after six o'clock. Shortly after that a little girl, Rachel Findlay, ten years old, and two boys of the same age, came to the ground, and proceeded to play about the shed. In their play they collected pieces of peat they found lying about the shed. Wishing to get more peat, they began to shake the louvre boards of the door, and the two boys to climb on the face of the door. No one saw them remove the pin, but they were seen by several people climbing on the door and reaching up at it. The door fell out, and broke Rachel Findlay's leg.

Her father raised an action of damages against Angus. He pleaded that the defender was in fault, in respect he had not provided proper fastenings for the door.

The defender denied fault, pleading that the accident had been caused by the fault of the pursuer's daughter herself.

After a proof, in which the foregoing facts were disclosed, and were not seriously disputed, the Sheriff-substitute (Brown), on 2d April 1886, found that the pursuer had failed to prove fault in the defender, and assoilzied him.*

* "NOTE— I do not see that there is any room for doubt that it was the action of the boys that proximately caused the door to fall. The pursuer, however, contends that the fastening of the door was an insufficient one, and was not a reasonable precaution for the safety of the public in a place, where, if they had no right to be, they were at least tolerated both by the defender and the police authorities. The evidence, in my opinion, does not sustain the suggestion that the girl and her companions were in the proper sense of the word trespassers, for there is nothing to show that access to the open space on the reclaimed ground upon which the defender's premises are erected was restricted. But, on the other hand, I think it cannot be maintained that she met her injuries in a place which can at all accurately be described as a thoroughfare even for foot-passengers, and it seems to me that that is a circumstance to be taken into account in judging of the precautions which the defender used in securing his property so as to prevent accidents. The evidence is conflicting upon the question of the sufficiency of the fastening of the door. The opinions expressed on both sides are entitled to much weight, but while I should be disposed to hold that the balance of testimony is against the security of the door as being a mechanical contrivance absolutely perfect, I am on the other hand of opinion that the weight of the evidence proves that it was perfectly sufficient, if not tampered with, for at least the safety of the public; that some of the modes of security suggested by the pursuer are either impracticable or would seriously impede the defender's business, and that there was nothing unusual in the fastening of the door. I myself attach no value to the speculative risks so earnestly pressed by the pursuer, said to be involved in the suspension of such a heavy door on the resistance of an inadequate screw. It is time enough to deal with that case when the failure of such a security is the point actually in issue in a lis pendens. But it does appear to me to be very

No. 67.

Jan. 14, 1887.
Findlay v.
Angus.

No. 67.

Jan. 14, 1887.
Findlay v.
Angus.

On appeal the Sheriff (J. G. Smith) found "that the injury sustained by the pursuer's daughter is attributable to the faulty condition of the door mentioned on record, and that the defender is liable in damages," and assessed the damages at £50.*

The defender appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—If the defender had taken sufficient precautions he was free from liability. The sufficiency of the precaution was tested by this, that no accident could occur unless the safeguard were intentionally removed. That was the law of *Macgregor's*¹ case, and the facts here shewed that the boys had wilfully undone the door. Whatever the girl's remedy against the boys might be, she had no action against the defender. The case of Beveridge,² on which the Sheriff relied, had no application. There an accident occurred in the course of using a building for its ordinary commercial purpose, a use which all might have foreseen.

Argued for the pursuer;—The construction and fastening of the door pertinent to consider in this question of sufficient fastening, first, that it was a precaution for safety adapted to the defender's business carried on in a locality which was at least not a resort of the public; and, secondly, that the security of the door was so far removed from the ordinary access of the public that interference with it would be properly described not only as deliberate but an act of sheer wantonness. In many respects the case bears a strong resemblance to that of Balfour v. Baird, December 5th, 1857, 20 D. 238, and looking to the grounds of judgment, especially those adopted by Lord Young in Macgregor v. Ross, March 2, 1883, 10 R. 725, I feel myself unable to arrive at any other result than one adverse to the pursuer's claim. Contributory negligence on the part of the injured girl is not pleaded, the case being that there was no fault of any kind on the part of the defender, and that the pursuer had herself to blame, in which is necessarily included the fault of her companions. In these circumstances I do not feel myself justified in finding contributory negligence, but the facts speak for themselves."

* "NOTE.— . . . I have no difficulty in holding the defender answerable for the occurrence. The owner or occupant of a building adjoining a public street or highway—or as in this case a place of public resort, and known to be so—is under a legal obligation to take reasonable care that it shall be so framed and maintained as to do no injury to passers-by. He is therefore answerable for the fall of a sign-board insecurely fastened (Moak's Torts, 247), the fall of a lamp suspended over the door in consequence of inherent decay (Torry v. Ashton, L. R., 1 Q. B. D.), or the fall of a broken down door in one flat caused by the swinging against it of a bale of goods which was being lowered from an upper flat (Beveridge v. Kinnear & Co., 11 R. 387). In this last case Lord Young said the defenders were bound 'to have the door in such a condition as to resist all the ordinary pressure to which it was likely to be exposed'—a principle which entirely disposes of the defender's plea that but for the meddlesomeness of the children and if the door had been let alone the accident would not have happened. He knew, or ought to have known, that children were in the habit of playing about the premises, and he should have provided against their giving way to their natural instincts by making his door strong enough to be proof against every form of juvenile assault. What may be contributory negligence in a grown-up person is excusable as mere thoughtlessness on the part of a child; and a man ill performs his duties to the public who contents himself with so securing a heavy door like this as to be safe enough 'if let alone.' The case of Balfour v. Baird which was relied on by the defender, and referred to by the Sheriff-substitute, was the case of an accident which befell some boys when clambering over a pile of battens. The battens being properly piled in a place where the boys had no right to be, the owner of the timber was rightly found to be free from blame, but the decision has no bearing on the present question."

¹ Macgregor v. Ross & Marshall, March 2, 1883, 10 R. 725.

² Beveridge v. Kinnear & Co., Dec. 21, 1883, 11 R. 387.

were faulty; nothing could be more certainly expected than that children would climb on this door, and if so dangerous a thing were left unguarded in a public place the owner was liable.¹ Precautions in such a case must ensure safety, not merely make it probable, and he who by insufficient precaution put it in the power of any idle or malicious person to do mischief was liable for the consequences.²

No. 67.

Jan. 14, 1887.
Findlay v.
Angus.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—These are always distressing cases, and this one is certainly very narrow. If the Sheriff had decided otherwise I do not know that I should have been in favour of altering his judgment. But as the case stands, the tendency of my opinion is entirely with the Sheriff-principal, and against the view of the Sheriff-substitute. My impression is that if this shed had been on private property, where the owner was entitled to rely on the protection of his own land against trespass, I should have thought it a different thing. But where, as here, the defender puts down a shed on property which does not belong to him, but is allowed by the public authorities to be used for such purposes, and where the public are admitted to be by some kind of tolerance, and where there is the possibility of this receptacle for peat being tampered with by children, I think that he is bound to take that into view in considering the nature of the fastenings which he places on this receptacle. The door was of unusual weight, and I think he is bound to take that into consideration also. It was sufficiently secured, if not tampered with, in respect of any ordinary pressure that might be exerted. But the bolt was a very slender protection, and the defender must have known that if tampered with there was a strong probability of the door falling so as to cause injury as in the present case. I think that the fact that this ground was public, or quasi-public, makes greater precaution necessary than in the ordinary case of operations on private ground, where the proprietor is entitled to exclude the public. There may be no danger in things if left to themselves—spring-guns will not explode if left to themselves—the question is whether these things ought to be put where they have been. I do not think it a sufficient answer to this claim that if the door had been left alone it might not have fallen.

LORD YOUNG.—I regret that this case did not take end in the Sheriff Court. My opinion entirely concurs with that expressed by your Lordship, which is in substance this,—that the door was insufficient with respect to its fastening having regard to the risks to which in the locality where it was it was exposed. The shed was on vacant ground,—temporarily vacant,—and it was explained to us that the owners tolerated the defender's presence there with his shed, just as they tolerated children playing there. The construction, therefore, of the shed and of the door and of the fastenings ought to have been such as to be sufficient looking to the risks to which in that place they were exposed. I agree in thinking that this was not the case, and in that respect that the defender was to blame. There is no more particular question raised here than this, whether, looking to the circumstances, the defender has or has not done his duty to others, and here I think he did not do his duty.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—This is a narrow case, and my mind has vibrated during the discussion between the interlocutor of the Sheriff and that of the Sheriff-substitute. In the end I have come to think that the conclusion at which your

¹ Campbell v. Ord & Maddison, Nov. 5, 1873, 1 R. 149.

² Clark v. Chambers, April 5, 1878, L. R., 3 Q. B. Div. 327.

No. 67. Lordships have arrived should be adopted. The defender can only be held liable if fault is established against him. The question is whether or not in having the door fastened in the way it was he did all that was reasonable against the possibility or probability of accident. These louvre boards could be converted into a ladder, and this ladder used for the purpose of reaching the bolt that fastened the door, and that which it is in the nature of boys to do would be done. The defender was bound to take that into contemplation in considering probabilities. On this ground I agree that the interlocutor of the Sheriff should not be disturbed.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced :—"Find (1) that the defender's building mentioned in the record is placed on ground not belonging to him, and in a locality open to the public, and to which the public resort; (2) That having regard to the risks to which it was thus exposed, the fastening of the door of the said building was insufficient: Find in law that in these circumstances the defender is responsible for the injury sustained by the pursuer's daughter, and is liable in damages accordingly: Therefore dismiss the appeal, and affirm the judgment of the Sheriff appealed against."

HENRY & SCOTT, S.S.C.—JOHN MACPHERSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 68.

THE PULSOMETER ENGINEERING COMPANY, LIMITED, Pursuers (Respondents).—Jameson—Younger.

ROBERT GRACIE, Defender (Appellant).—Low.

Jan. 14, 1887.
Pulsometer
Engineering
Co. Limited,
v. Gracie.

Lease—Hypothec.—The landlord's hypothec does not extend to articles sent to a commission-agent for exhibition as samples.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
I.

GILBERT BOGLE & COMPANY, commission-agents, at 6 Waterloo Street, Glasgow, acted as agents for the Pulsometer Engineering Company, Limited. They were also yacht-agents, and the pulsometers manufactured by the pulsometer company were a kind of pump suitable for yachts; samples of them were on exhibition in the premises in Waterloo Street, and in consideration of the room they required Bogle & Company received from the manufacturing company, besides their commission on sales, a sum of £30 towards payment of their rent. The pulsometers shewn in Bogle & Company's premises were not for sale, but merely samples for exhibition. Besides these articles there was on the premises a very small quantity of ordinary office furniture.

Robert Gracie, who was factor for the owners of the premises, having raised a process of sequestration for rent against Gilbert Bogle & Company, attached the pulsometers. The pulsometer company presented a petition in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire craving interdict against the sale. They pleaded that Gracie had no right over these articles. Gracie pleaded that they were subject to the landlord's hypothec, being the sole stock and plenishing on the premises.

On 27th July the Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie) pronounced this interlocutor :—"Finds that the engines, &c., set forth in the prayer of the petition, belong to the petitioners, and are not subject to the hypothec of the landlord, represented by the respondent: Therefore continues the interdict already granted, and declares the same perpetual."*

* "NOTE.—The following propositions as to hypothec in urban tenements are, I think, well settled, and are to be found in Bell's Commentaries, ii. 30, and Principles, 1275 and seq., in the recent case of Nelmes & Company v. Ewing,

The defender appealed, and argued;—The true principle was stated by Lord Moncreiff in Jeffray's case,¹ viz., that articles brought into a house

No. 68.

Jan. 14, 1887.
Pulsometer
Engineering
Co. Limited,
v. Gracie.

11 R. 193, and Bell v. Andrews, 12 R. 961, where the authorities are fully cited:—

"1. The landlord of urban subjects has a hypothec for his rent over all moveables brought into the place let.

"2. The hypothec as a rule applies only to articles belonging to the tenant; and therefore not to articles deposited with him for temporary purposes or in the course of his ordinary business, as things left with a jeweller or carpenter to be repaired.

"3. But in a question with the landlord, things necessary for the tenant's proper enjoyment of the place let according to its intended use, although not belonging to him, are presumed to be his, and are subject to the landlord's hypothec: and the true owner is held by reason of his having allowed them to be so brought into the place let, to have taken the hazard of the rent, and assented to the landlord's hypothec. When these things are the whole 'plenishing' of a house or factory or shop, to which the landlord looks as security for payment of his rent, and which if wanting he might insist on the tenants putting into his premises on the pain of removing, it does not appear in principle to be material whether the owner lends them for hire or gratuitously, yet, if they are let for hire it has been thought to be an additional ratio for the hypothecation that the lender takes or may take the risk into account in fixing the hire.

"4. This extension of the hypothec beyond the tenant's own moveables does not affect single articles lent or belonging to lodgers or members of the tenant's family, and not forming part of the permanent and ordinary furnishing of the house or shop. Thus in the latest case a daughter's pianoforte was held exempt, and in many Sheriff Court cases, pianofortes and sewing machines have been held not subject to hypothec though hire was paid for them. There is no authority for this practice where hire is paid beyond certain general dicta of Lords Moncreiff, Deas, and others, and indeed it is rather contrary to the case of Penson v. Robertson, June 6, 1820, F. C. It seems, however, to proceed on grounds of expediency and on the existence of a generally-known custom of hiring out such articles which precludes the landlord's reliance on them as securing his rent. In the latest cases the Court has avoided giving any opinion on the point whether such single hired articles are subject to hypothec; but the inclination of the judges in Bell v. Andrews is favourable to freedom, and Lord Shand doubts Penson v. Robertson. I think, therefore, that the first sentence of this paragraph may be taken as applying to single articles lent for hire.

"5. The landlord's hypothec extends over the goods in a shop—the rights of bona fide buyers being protected.—Bell's Commentaries, ii. 31, Principles, 1276-7.

"6. It does not affect the goods in a store or warehouse for which the owner pays store rent, or the cattle on a grazing farm for which the owner pays grazing rent (Bell's Commentaries, ii. 31, Principles, 1276) on the obvious ground that the business for which the warehouse or farm is let involves the temporary occupation of the premises by the cattle or goods of third parties, and that it would be inconsistent with the implied terms of the lease to allow a hypothec except over the unpaid store rent or grazing rent.

"7. The hypothec does not extend over the effects of a subtenant beyond the amount of the subrent unpaid, unless in urban subjects subletting be expressly excluded by the lease.

"Although this case does not quite readily fall under any of the propositions above set forth, it seems to me that, upon the whole, there is no ground of principle on which the landlord is entitled to these machines as falling within his hypothec. There is no question as to the property of the engines, but only as to the footing on which they were brought into the premises. They were ¹ Jeffray v. Carrick, Nov. 18, 1836, 15 S. 43.

No. 68.

Jan. 14, 1887.
Pulsometer
Engineering
Co. Limited,
v. Gracie.

with the owner's consent, even although lent gratuitously, fall under the hypothec. That principle was also laid down in the case of Wilson v. Spankie,¹ a case cited by Sheriff Hunter as establishing the rule that a house is let on security of the furniture, which according to appearance belongs to the tenant.² The articles here in question were the entire plenishing of the premises, a very material consideration for the application of the doctrine.³

Counsel for the respondent were not called on.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Mr Low has stated everything that could be stated for his client in this question, but I do not think he has succeeded in giving us either principle or authority for setting aside the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute.

These articles which are said to fall under the landlord's hypothec were not the property of the tenant, they were not his stock in trade, nor were they intended for residential occupation of the premises. This person has taken the premises as agent for the patentee of the pulsometers, but he is not an agent for sale, but an agent to exhibit samples that customers might purchase, not from him but from his principals. His chief business is that of a yachting-agent, and as incidental to that business he undertakes to exhibit these pulsometers.

Mr Low has failed to shew that these articles came under any exceptions to the general rule of the law of hypothec, viz., that the property of third parties does not fall under the landlord's right. The principle of the exceptions depends upon the articles found in the tenant's premises being subservient to the contract of lease. House furniture for example is presumed to be used for the purposes of occupation. But the nature of the possession of the tenant here was altogether apart from that, and did not relate to the contract of lease.

LORD YOUNG, LORD CRAIGHILL, and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that the engines specified in the prayer of the petition belong to the petitioners, and are not subject to the hypothec of the landlord, represented by the defender: Therefore dismiss the appeal, and affirm the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute appealed against; of new grant interdict as craved," &c.

J. & J. Ross, W.S.—MENZIES, COVENTRY, & BLACK, W.S.—Agents.

certainly not in the position of hired or lent furniture, for they were not there for the use and enjoyment of the tenant, nor did he pay hire for them. On the contrary, he got a substantial payment from the owners for standing room, and I would class the respondents rather with owners of goods stored in a warehouse, or with subtenants, than with a lender or hirer. The letting of an office or warehouse for the exhibition and sale of the miscellaneous articles in which a commission-agent deals involves in varying degrees the possession of property belonging to third parties. The general rule, as Lord Moncreiff says (15 S. 43), applies properly only to the tenant's own property. There is as yet no authority for extending the hypothec to the goods of third parties in such circumstances as we have here; to admit it would be inconsistent with the character of the business for which the place was let, and inconvenient for trade."

¹ Dec. 17, 1813, F. C.

² Hunter, ii. 378; cf. also Lord Deas in Adam v. Sutherland, Nov. 3, 1863, 2 Macph. 6, 36 Scot. Jur. 7.

³ Nelmes v. Ewing, Nov. 23, 1883, 11 R. 193.

MAGISTRATES OF GLASGOW, Complainers (Respondents).—

Sol.-Gen. Robertson—G. W. Burnet.

DAVID Hall (Collector for Glasgow City Parish), Respondent (Reclamer).—D.-F. Mackintosh—Dickson—Younger.

No. 69.

Jan. 14, 1887.
Magistrates of
Glasgow v.
Hall.

Valuation of Lands Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. c. 91)—Valuation-roll—Review by Court of Session—Poor-Law (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 83), sec. 37.—A parochial board assessed for poor-rates the owner and occupier of water-works on the annual value of the subjects appearing in the Valuation-roll without allowing deduction of the average cost of repairs, insurance, &c., in terms of the 37th section of the Poor-Law Act, on the ground that the assessor in preparing the Valuation-roll had already made these deductions.

In a suspension held (1) that for the purposes of assessment under the Poor-Law Act, 1845, the Valuation-roll as completed in terms of the Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Act, 1854,* was conclusive as to the yearly rent or value of lands and heritages entered therein, and that the Court of Session had no jurisdiction to review the process by which the entry there made was reached, and (2) that before assessment the suspender was entitled to have the above deductions made from the sum entered in the Valuation-roll.

* The 6th section of the Valuation of Lands Act enacts,—“In estimating the yearly value of lands and heritages under this Act, the same shall be taken to be the rent at which, one year with another, such lands and heritages might in their actual state be reasonably expected to let from year to year,” &c.

The 33d section enacts,—“Where, in any county, burgh, or town, any county, municipal, parochial, or other public assessment, or any assessment, rate, or tax under any Act of Parliament, is authorised to be imposed or made upon or according to the real rent of lands and heritages, the yearly rent or value of such lands and heritages, as appearing from the Valuation-roll in force for the time under this Act in such county, burgh, or town, shall, from and after the establishment of such valuation therein, be always deemed and taken to be the just amount of real rent for the purposes of such county, municipal, parochial, or other assessment, rate, or tax, and the same shall be assessed and levied according to such yearly rent or value accordingly, any law or usage to the contrary notwithstanding,” &c.

The 34th section enacts,—“In all questions and proceedings under any Act of Parliament relating to the franchise, or to the representation of the people in Parliament, it shall be sufficient to refer to an entry in the Valuation-roll in force for the time, or last in force under this Act in any county or burgh, and such entry shall be received and taken in all such questions and proceedings as conclusive proof that the gross yearly rent or value of the lands or heritages specified therein is at the date of such reference, and has been from the commencement of the year to which such Valuation-roll applies, of the amount therein set forth; and it shall be competent in all cases, notwithstanding anything in any existing Act of Parliament to the contrary, to refer to such Valuation-roll in such Appeal Court, although such Valuation-roll may not have been produced or referred to in the Registration Court,” &c.

The 41st section enacts,—“Nothing contained in this Act shall alter or affect any classification or power of classification, or any deduction or allowances, or power of making deductions or allowances, from gross rental, made or possessed by any body, persons or person, entitled to impose or levy assessments, but the same shall not affect the value to be inserted in the Valuation-roll in terms of this Act; and nothing contained in this Act shall exempt from or render liable to assessment any person or property not previously exempt from or liable to assessment.”

† The 37th section of the Poor-Law Amendment (Scotland) Act enacts,—“That in estimating the annual value of lands and heritages, the same shall be taken to be the rent at which, one year with another, such lands and heritages might in their actual state be reasonably expected to let from year to year, under deduction of the probable annual average cost of the repairs, insurance, and other expenses, if any, necessary to maintain such lands and heritages in their actual state, and all rates, taxes, and public charges payable in respect of the same,” &c.

No. 69.

Jan. 14, 1887.
Magistrates of
Glasgow v.
Hall.

1st Division.
Lord M'Laren.
B.

Observations (per Lord Shand) upon the method of reaching the annual rent or value of water-works and such subjects for the purposes of entry in the Valuation-roll.

THE GLASGOW CORPORATION WATER-WORKS were entered in the Valuation-roll made up by the Assessor of Railways, Canals, &c. for the year ending Whitsunday 1885 at £114,670. This sum represented the valuation as amended in terms of an interlocutor (dated 30th September 1884) of the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Kinnear), to whom an appeal had been taken against the assessor's original valuation by the Magistrates of Glasgow, acting as commissioners under "The Glasgow Corporation Water-Works Act, 1855." *

By notice, dated 9th February 1885, David Hall, collector of poor and school-rates for the City Parish of Glasgow, intimated an assessment on the corporation water-works for the year from 15th May 1884 of £563, 9s. 7d. of poor-rate, and £243, 13s. 4d. of school-rate—together £807, 2s. 11d.—upon an annual value of lands and heritages amounting to £11,696. The Magistrates objected to the terms of the notice, and intimated to the assessor that he had failed to make the deductions from the valuation which were allowed by the 37th section of the Poor-Law Amendment Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 83). In previous years, they stated, a deduction of 20 per cent had been allowed upon that head.

An offer of payment, under deduction of 20 per cent, having been refused by the assessor, he afterwards obtained a warrant for payment of the £807, 2s. 11d., with costs, and executed a poinding thereon.

The Magistrates thereupon brought a note of suspension and interdict of these proceedings, claiming that they were entitled to certain deductions under the 37th section of the Poor-Law Act, 1845.

The collector of poor-rates answered that the assessor had already, under the Valuation Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. c. 91), and in accordance with the terms of Lord Kinnear's interlocutor,* allowed all the deductions to which the complainers were entitled, and that the valuation thus arrived at fulfilled all the requirements as to deductions of the 37th section of the Poor-Law Act, 1845.

The complainers replied,—“The explanations in answer are denied, and averred that this claim is not included in or covered by the deductions allowed under the provisions of the Valuation Act in making up the Valuation-roll. Further, the provisions of the said statute, and particularly section 33 thereof, make the Valuation-roll conclusive on the question of value, and the respondent is not entitled to open up that question, or to inquire as to how the said roll has been made up, and the value entered therein arrived at, or the purposes for which any deductions claimed under it may have been allowed.”

They pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) The amount stated in the Valuation-roll, made up by the assessor as the annual value of the undertaking of the complainers, is conclusive as regards the respondent, and he is not entitled to re-open that valuation or to inquire as to the basis upon which the same was made up. (2) The complainers being entitled to the deduction allowed to all other owners of lands and heritages within the

* Lord Kinnear's interlocutor was :—“ Finds that in fixing the annual rent or value of the lands and heritages belonging to the appellants, a deduction should be allowed from the gross revenue of all necessary outlays for management, maintenance, and repairs which are properly chargeable against revenue, and not merely of a proportion of such charges ; to this extent and effect sustains the appeal ; quoad ultra dismisses the same, and remits to the assessor to amend the valuation in accordance with this interlocutor.”

City Pariah, under section 37 of the Act 8 and 9 Vict. cap. 83, for which the respondent refuses to give them credit, the proceedings complained of ought to be suspended, and interdict granted against the respondent as craved.

No. 69.

Jan. 14, 1887.
Magistrates of
Glasgow v.
Hall.

The respondent pleaded, inter alia ;—(2) The note falls to be refused, with expenses, in respect that the annual value of their lands and heritages upon which the complainers are assessed, is their annual value in terms of section 37 of 8 and 9 Vict. cap. 83. (3) All the deductions to which the complainers are entitled under section 37 of 8 and 9 Vict. cap. 83, having been allowed, the note ought to be refused, with expenses.

The complainers subsequently put in a minute, stating the several heads under which they claimed deductions from the annual value appearing in the Valuation-roll.* These heads and the different items

* These heads of deductions were—

"I.—REPAIRS.

"1. Repairs at Gorbals Works,	£1,615	7	2
"2. Alterations on Kelty bridges,	330	14	1
"3. Repairs on Corrie Burn aqueduct bridge,	95	8	11
"4. One-half of wages to inspectors and artisans, &c. in making repairs,	6,428	17	0
"5. One-half of cost of castings, ironmongery, &c. used in repairs,	1,516	4	6
"6. One-half of cost of masonry, stones, lime, &c. used in do.,	216	1	5
"7. One-half of cost of wright and wood work used in do.,	93	10	3
"8. One-half of leather and indiarubber used in do.,	24	7	8
"9. One-half of oils, paints, tallow, &c. used in do.,	67	7	6
"10. One-half of rope yarn and cotton waste used in do.,	31	3	9
"11. One-half of carriage of materials used in do.,	239	10	8

£10,658 12 11

"Deduct amount received for work and materials, 2,359 9 8

£8,299 3 3

"II.—INSURANCE.

"On buildings, 27 1 9

"III.—OTHER EXPENSES, not included in the foregoing, viz :—

"1. One-half of horses' keep, saddlery, &c.,	£136	10	9
"2. One-half of rent, &c. of workmen's houses,	131	4	3
"3. Compensation to owners of fishings on rivers Forth and Teith,	120	0	0
"4. Charges for general law business,	82	17	11
"5. Parliamentary expenses, general,	102	3	11
	572	16	10

"IV.—RATES, TAXES, and PUBLIC CHARGES payable in respect of the subjects assessed.

"1. One-half of rates and taxes,	£4984	15	11
"2. One-half of fee to public assessor for Valuation-roll, &c.,	51	7	6
"3. Stamps for mortgages,	18	12	6
	5,054	15	11
	£13,953	17	9

"And further, the complainers crave to be allowed the following deductions for depreciation or deterioration of the subjects belonging to them, viz :—"—

Four items, amounting in all to £2614 8 4

[The whole deductions claimed amounted accordingly to £16,568, 6s. 1d.]

No. 69.

Jan. 14, 1887.
Magistrates of
Glasgow v.
Hall.

brought out as representing each were most of them identical with the particular deductions which had been already given effect to by the assessor under the 33d section of the Valuation Act, 1854, and which amounted in all to £16,733, 15s. 4d.

After a proof, at which evidence was led as to the method of valuing water-works, the Lord Ordinary (M'Laren), on 20th May 1886, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the complainers are entitled to deduction of the estimated or probable annual average cost of the repairs, insurance, and other expenses which are necessary to maintain the water-works and others constituting their undertaking in their existing state, and all rates, taxes, and public charges payable in respect of the same: Finds that the complainers are liable to be assessed for the relief of the poor on the annual value of their undertaking as appearing on the Valuation-roll, videlicet, on the sum of £114,670, under deduction as aforesaid: Finds the circumstances stated, shewing that the various elements of deduction here specified were to certain effects taken into account by the Court in fixing the annual value of the said undertaking, do not constitute a relevant answer to this complaint; and appoints the case to be further heard on the question of the amount of the deduction to be made, in terms of the preceding findings and of the Poor-Law Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1845."*

* "OPINION.— . . . The defence, shortly stated, is that under an appeal to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills against the assessor's valuation, Lord Kinnear, the Lord Ordinary officiating in the Bill-Chamber, after hearing counsel, reduced the assessable value by taking off a sum which his Lordship held to be the equivalent of the cost of maintenance, repairs, public burdens, and other outgoings. Thus, it is said for the defender, the complainers have already received the benefit intended by the statute in another form, and are not entitled to a second deduction in respect of the same outgoings.

"The apparent reasonableness of this contention appeared to me to recommend it to favourable consideration; but while willing, if possible, to give effect to it, I have not been able to remove the impression I originally formed of its essential unsoundness.

"I cannot adopt the suggestion that the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, in reducing the assessor's valuation to a lesser figure, was making the deduction contemplated by the Poor-Law Amendment Act.

"It is settled by decisions of this Court, and is matter of familiar and unvarying practice, that the deductions authorised by the Poor-Law Act of 1845 are deductions to be made in diminution of the sum in the Valuation-roll. This was of course known to the counsel who argued the case, and to the Lord Ordinary; and in the report of the case which has been furnished to me, there is nothing which suggests in the faintest degree that the Lord Ordinary was asked to anticipate, or meant to anticipate, the Poor-Law Act deductions from rental.

"The fixing of the annual value is very much a discretionary proceeding; the Judge is not bound by any fixed rules, and his decisions have not been considered always to have the same finality, as regards future valuations, which we are accustomed to attribute to the decisions of a Judge on strictly legal questions. It is therefore for consideration whether in this question I ought to look to the grounds of the Lord Ordinary's decision at all, or to look at anything except the sum in the Valuation-roll; taking that sum as a gross valuation from which certain statutory deductions are to be made.

"I may say, however, that I have carefully considered the note of Lord Kinnear's opinion, and that in my apprehension it does not support the respondent's contention.

"I understand that his Lordship expressed the difficulty, which has been felt in similar cases, of realising the case of a hypothetical tenant who would take over such an undertaking as the Glasgow Water-works at a yearly rent, especiall

No. 69.

On 9th June following the Lord Ordinary further found that the claimers were entitled to deduction of all the sums claimed in their minute under the head of repairs, insurance, rates, taxes, and public charges, but not of the sum paid in compensation to owners of fishings and charges for law and parliamentary expenses, nor in respect of depreciation or deterioration of the subjects, and accordingly that the value on which the claimers ought to be assessed was £102,478.

Jan. 14, 1887.
Magistrates of
Glasgow v.
Hall.

The respondent reclaimed, and argued ;—His main object was to obtain the judgment of the Court upon the question whether the double deductions which had been allowed were rightly so allowed or not. This had been a disturbing question for many years, and it had been impossible to get it settled, owing to the fact that one Lord Ordinary took one view and another another. There was no dispute as to the facts. They practically came to this, that deductions were given for the same items twice over, once in fixing the revenue, on the amount of which the entry in the Valuation-roll depended, and again in fixing assessable value under section 37 of the Poor-Law Act. It was important to inquire how the matter would have stood prior to the passing of the Valuation Act in 1854. Under section 37 of the Poor-Law Act the parochial board had had the same duty to perform as now fell upon the Judges in the Valuation Appeal Court under the 6th section of the Valuation Act, viz, to fix the rent for which, one year with another, lands and heritages would let. The board had then to consider what further deductions ought to be made, and if the Lord Ordinary was right in saying that a double deduction was legitimate now, then it was equally so before 1854.

in view of the statutory provision to the effect that the proprietors of the undertaking are not to make a profit by the sale of the water beyond the surplus which they are authorised to set aside as a sinking fund.

"It is plain enough, and it is known to the profession, that the application of the Valuation Act to public undertakings is difficult, and that the value of such concerns is arrived at by a highly artificial system of rules, which, as I have said, are not strictly obligatory, but are used as guides to the ascertainment of a reasonable value. In ascertaining the rent to be given by the hypothetical tenant, every element is taken into account which a tenant would consider preparatory to making his offer. Amongst these, repairs, insurance, maintenance, rates, and taxes are of course considered ; because no tenant, in considering what rent he could afford to give, would omit to take account of such outgoings. The larger the outgoings, the less rent would the tenant be able to give, other circumstances being supposed equal ; and therefore outgoings are rightly and necessarily allowed for in making the valuation as deductions from the gross income of the hypothetical tenant. But a deduction from gross income and a deduction from assessable value are very different things, and the Lord Ordinary in making the first of these deductions left the second entirely unaffected.

"The same distinction might, indeed, be taken respecting private property. I can imagine a tenant, anxious to remain in his house, warehouse, or farm, making a calculation to find what was the highest rent he could afford to offer, on the footing that he was to undertake repairs, taxes, insurance, and charges. He would certainly consider such repairs, taxes, &c., as elements of deduction from gross profits before he could arrive at the sum available for rent. But none the less would he be entitled, when he came to settle with the inspector of poor, to claim that these very elements should be deducted from the actual rent stated in the Valuation-roll, and to pay poor-rate only on the difference.

"It appears to me, indeed, that there is no real inconsistency between the judgment I propose and that which was given in the Valuation-roll appeal case, nor is there in reality a case of double deduction. The same elements undoubtedly enter into the two computations, but they enter these in different ways, and for different purposes. . . ."

No. 69.

Jan. 14, 1887.
Magistrates of
Glasgow v.
Hall.

It would surely have been a strong thing to say that, in the first place, landlord's taxes were to be deducted in fixing the rent at which the subjects were let from year to year, and again to deduct them as specifically authorised to be done by the latter part of the same section 37. Surely the rent was something apart from landlord's taxes and such like obligations, whether it was the rent of a tenant actually paying rent, or the hypothetical rent paid by a party who himself occupied his lands. Rent could not be so ascertained, because such taxes were only exigible upon rent, and after it was fixed. In other words, the rent there meant was gross rent, which a tenant paid on the footing of the landlord performing his ordinary obligations, including, of course, the payment of taxes. Nor could the particular kind of subject to be dealt with make any difference. For instance, when land was in a proprietor's own occupation, the valuation tribunals did not permit a deduction for landlord's repairs and such like in order to reach the gross rent.¹ The fact that no tenant's profits were possible, or at least were allowed to be made, in a subject like the present, did not justify a deduction for taxes such as had been allowed, which was inconsistent with the nature of rent, and not contemplated as regarded any other description of subject; yet this was what Lord Kinnear had done.

But, in the next place, was it really the case that the water-works in question could not, in a statutory sense, be let? The statute gave a right to levy water-rates, and the collection of these assessments could be farmed out; and the question under the Valuation Act was, What would a hypothetical tenant pay for the right of collecting these rates? He would pay the full amount of rates, less tenant's profits. These profits would just be a reasonable remuneration for the cost of collection. This was the view taken in England, and particularly by Lord Blackburn in the case of the Mersey Docks.² Suppose one Judge was to perform both functions, i.e., was first to ascertain the rent, and, having ascertained it, was then to make the deductions specified in the latter part of clause 37 of the Poor-Law Act, he would surely decline to make the same deductions twice, whatever his views might be as to the one stage at which they ought to be made. That case had actually occurred,³ and the principle was there recognised that double deductions ought not to be allowed.

If the present question had arisen prior to 1854, gross rent would first have been struck and then the deductions specified in section 37 would have been allowed—or if the deductions had been allowed before gross rent was struck, then they would not have been allowed a second time. The Act of 1854 established two tribunals instead of one, but the Legislature did not intend to alter the principles of assessment. It was not provided that for all purposes of assessment rent must mean the amount in the Valuation-roll. At least that was not to be presumed. The sections of the Valuation Act which bore upon this matter were sections 6, 33, 34, and 41. The term "gross rent" occurred twice, viz., in sections 34 and 41. If sections 6 and 33 had stood alone they would have swept away the right to deductions altogether. They declared the Valuation-roll conclusive merely as regarded assessable rental, and made it the basis of assessment, without reference to deductions. But for section 41 the effect of section 33 would have been to repeal all other modes of ascertaining assessable value, except that provided by it. It was on section 41 that the other side relied. But in order to prevail, they must shew that the deductions provided for in section 41 were deductions from gross rental. But the deductions which had been allowed by Lord Kinnear in order to reach the amount now entered in the Valuation-roll made that amount something different from gross rental. His Lordship had virtually held that while the amount entered in the Valuation-roll was gross rental in the case of all ordinary subjects, yet, that where a special subject like the present was being dealt with, it was not gross but net rental that was meant.

¹ North British Railway Co. v. Assessor for Leith, Feb. 9, 1884, 11 R. 558.

² Mersey Docks v. Liverpool, Nov. 19, 1873, L. R., 9 Q. B. 84 (Lord Blackburn, p. 92).

³ Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Co. v. Adamson, June 28, 1855, 17 D. 1007.

No. 69.
Jan. 14, 1887.
Magistrates of
Glasgow v.
Hall.

—A further question was, whether, assuming that there was a double deduction in the present case,—off revenue first to arrive at the valuation, and then off that valuation, in respect of the provisions of the Poor-Law Act,—the Court could get behind the supposed finality of the Valuation-roll. It was no doubt true that this Court had no jurisdiction to deal with questions of valuation, but it could review and regulate assessment, and the roll was the basis of the assessment which was here in dispute.¹ Practically Lord Kinnear's decision came to this, that the entry in the Valuation-roll represented net and not gross rental, because he had deducted landlord's taxes and repairs. His Lordship had apparently so decided in ignorance of the fact that the same question had been fully considered by Lord Craighill and Lord Curriehill in the Valuation Court, and decided in a different way some years ago.² So, too, Lord Trayner in two recent cases³ had declined to allow the deduction of landlord's taxes, and Lord Kinnear had proceeded in another case upon the same footing.⁴

The respondents argued;—The position taken up by the reclaimer was irrelevant, (1) because it was not possible for the Court to which he was appealing to get behind the Valuation-roll, which constituted for the purposes of assessment conclusive evidence of the rent or value of the subjects to be assessed, and (2) because it was no answer to a claim for deduction from ascertained rent that the same deductions had been previously made from revenue in fixing the rent.

I. The duty of the assessing body under section 33 of the Valuation Act was to take the rent entered in the Valuation-roll and from that rent to make deductions under the 37th section of the Poor-Law Act.⁵ The statutory separation of the two functions was at the root of the question involved in the case. The argument upon the other side really came to this, that the parochial board—the assessing body under the Poor-Law Act—were entitled to review the actings of the assessor under the Valuation Act, or of the Lord Ordinary to whom there was an appeal. De jure the valuation found in the Valuation-roll must be held to have been arrived at as the gross rent of the subjects, and the deductions were made from something else than gross rent before gross rent was struck.

II. De facto, also the sum entered in the Valuation-roll was gross rent, being revenue with certain rough deductions made therefrom. The method adopted by the assessor might not have been the best method. He had ¹ Sharp v. Parochial Board of Latheron, July 12, 1883, 10 R. 1163.

² Dundee Gas Commissioners, Jan. 12, 1881, 9 R. 1240.

³ The City Parish of Glasgow v. The Assessor of Railways and Canals, Sept. 29, 1885, 24 S. L. R. 3; Magistrates of Glasgow, &c., Oct. 3, 1884, 12 R. 3.

⁴ Caledonian Canal Commissioners v. Assessor of Railways, Sept. 29, 1886, 24 S. L. R. 80. Other authorities cited.—Local Authority of Dalbeattie v. Assessor for Kirkcudbright, March 1, 1882, 10 R. 23; City Parish of Glasgow v. Assessor of Railways, Sept. 29, 1885, 24 S. L. R. 3.

⁵ Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Co. v. Meek, Dec. 10, 1864, 3 Macph. 229, Lord President Colonsay and Lord Curriehill, p. 236, 22 Scot. Jur. 17.

No. 69.
 Jan. 14, 1887.
 Magistrates of
 Glasgow v.
 Hall.

taken as his basis for arriving at the rent or value the gross amount of water-rate levied under the statute, with deduction of all necessary outlays for management, maintenance, and repairs. There was nothing in the Act of Parliament suggesting such a proceeding. It was a purely artificial system which had been brought into use in order to meet the exigencies of the formula prescribed in the 6th section of the Valuation Act. It might be that the formula was inapplicable to such undertakings as the present, and that very little was now left of the hypothetical tenant beyond his name,—the position here really being that such a tenant would give nothing by way of rent, inasmuch as profits being precluded and the available income being applied to other purposes than tenant's profits, the subject yielded nothing. The revenue, therefore, which was taken by the assessor as a basis, had no relation to rent, or the value of the subjects. It was an artificial basis for working upon by means of abatements and calculations. The contention of the reclamer that no deductions should be allowed by the assessor before fixing gross rent came to this, that the hypothetical tenant would have to undertake the management of the concern at a loss, because he would have to pay whatever outlays there were out of his own pocket.¹ The Act of Parliament could scarcely require the hypothetical tenant to act simply as the administrator of the proprietors of the undertaking. The only deduction which it was proposed to concede was an allowance for collection. But it must be kept in view that the subject remained in the hands of the proprietor. The hypothetical tenant or the farmer of the revenue did not enter into possession. Accordingly, the proprietor had to keep up the subjects, and Lord Kinnear was therefore right in deducting taxes and maintenance, and cost of collection. Whether the method was a good or a bad one, it was a roundabout way of striking gross rent. It was not necessary to say there was any double deduction. The assessor rather deducted a lump sum in name of burdens. It was said that the Mersey Docks case² was an authority to the opposite effect. But the importance both of that case and of the Worcester case³ was overrated, even assuming that the English and Scottish Statutes were identical, which they were not. The Mersey case merely decided that tenants' profits were not to be deducted, on the ground that the making of profits was not allowed by the statute. Accordingly, Lord Kinnear's judgment was quite consistent with that case.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a suspension by the Magistrates and Council of Glasgow, as Commissioners under the Glasgow Corporation Water-Works Act of 1855, against the collector of poor's-rates of the City Parish, and the ground of complaint is that, in charging the lands and heritages belonging to these commissioners for poor's-rates, the collector has not deducted the average cost of repairs, insurance, and other expenses necessary to maintain the lands and heritages in their actual state, and the rates, taxes, and public charges payable in respect of the same, under the provisions of the 37th section of the Poor-Law Amendment Act, 1845. The answer which the collector makes to this complaint is that these deductions have already been made to a greater or less extent in making up the Valuation-roll, and ascertaining the annual value of lands and heritages in terms of the Valuation Act, 1854. No. 69.

¹ Caledonian Canal Commissioners v. Assessor of Railways, Sept. 29, 1886, 24 S. L. R. 80.

² L. R., 9 Q. B. 84.

³ Corporation of Worcester v. Droitwich Assessment Committee, 1876, L. R., 2 Exch. Div. 49.

I am of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that this is not a relevant answer to the complaint. But, as I do not arrive at that conclusion on the same grounds as the Lord Ordinary, I think it necessary to explain precisely the view I take of these statutes—I mean the Poor-Law Act, 1845, and the Valuation Act, 1854. Jan. 14, 1887.
Magistrates of
Glasgow v.
Hall.

The 37th section of the Poor-Law Act, 1845, imposed two duties on the collector of poor's-rates or on the parochial board. It provided that, "in estimating the annual value of lands and heritages, the same shall be taken to be the rent at which, one year with another, such lands and heritages might, in their actual state, be reasonably expected to let from year to year." That rent having been ascertained, the board was then directed further to make the deductions which I have already mentioned.

The effect of the Valuation Act (17 and 18 Vict. c. 91) was to transfer the first of these duties from the assessing board to the assessor created by the statute. The parochial board and its officers have no longer anything to do with estimating the annual value of lands and heritages. They have only to take the estimate of the value of these lands and heritages as it appears in the Valuation-roll of the year, and then to make the deductions specified in the 37th section. The Valuation Act proceeds upon this consideration, that "it is expedient that one uniform valuation be established of lands and heritages in Scotland, according to which all public assessments leviable, or that may be levied, according to the real rent of such lands and heritages may be assessed and collected, and that provision be made for such valuation being annually revised." The term "real rent" there is used as in contrast with the old valued rent. The valuation is made under the statute for the purpose of fixing the value with reference to all assessments that are levied on what may be called actual value, or the real rent of the lands, as opposed to the artificial or ancient value known under the technical name of valued rent. The first important section in the statute for the present purpose is the 6th, which really repeats the words in the 37th section of the Poor-Law Act so far as regards the estimate of the annual value. It says,—“In estimating the yearly value of lands and heritages under this Act, the same shall be taken to be the rent at which, one year with another, such lands and heritages might, in their actual state, be reasonably expected to let from year to year.” That I take to mean the gross rent of lands—the amount of the actual rent paid if there be any, or the equivalent of that, by calculation or estimate, if there be not. And, while these words themselves are quite sufficient to shew that the entry in the Valuation-roll is to be an entry of gross rent, that is made still more clear by a subsequent part of the section, which provides that “Where such lands and heritages are bona fide let for a yearly rent conditioned as the fair annual value thereof, without grassum or consideration other than the rent, such rent shall be deemed and taken to be the yearly rent or value of such lands and heritages in terms of this Act.” It is quite plain, therefore, that the intention of the statute is that where lands are let on lease, and the rent stipulated in the lease is the full payment made for the possession of the lands, that is to be taken as the “yearly value in terms of this Act,” and that, of course, must be gross rent. Then, this matter of ascertaining the value is carried through by the machinery which is provided in the Act, which lays the estimating of the value on the assessor, the estimate of the assessor being

No. 69. subject to review by the Commissioners of Supply of every county and the magistrates of every burgh under the 8th section of the statute, whose determination upon an appeal "shall be final and conclusive, and not subject to review." Jan. 14, 1887. It may be as well to mention in passing, that, by subsequent statutes (80 and 31 Vict. c. 80, and 42 and 43 Vict. c. 42), the Commissioners may be asked to state a case for the opinion of two Judges of the Court of Session, and the determination of the two Judges is declared to be, as the judgment of the Commissioners was, final and conclusive, and not subject to appeal. So that, wherever the value of lands and heritages has been thus ascertained under these Acts, it is final, and not subject to appeal, and the entry in the Valuation-roll necessarily remains for a year, and is the ruling estimate for that period. The matter cannot be carried any further.

Magistrates of
Glasgow v.
Hall.

The clauses to which I have hitherto been referring are applicable to what may be called ordinary lands and heritages. But there are certain kinds of lands and heritages, which, being of a very peculiar description, especially as regards annual value, require a different arrangement, and, accordingly, in the case of railways and canals, there is a special provision in the 22d section. It is very difficult to estimate railways and canals according to the rule prescribed in the 6th section, because the subjects are not generally let, or capable of being let, and, accordingly, to ascertain their annual value by reference to the yearly rent at which they may be expected to let is not a very good criterion. Accordingly, a special provision is made by the 21st section for the case of railways and canals—the leading object of that section being, however, to enable the assessor to divide the cumulo value of the whole subject between the different parishes through which the railways and canals pass. But for this purpose there is a rule provided by the 22d section, a purely artificial rule, requiring that there shall first of all be an ascertainment of cumulo value, and a certain deduction made in respect of the stations, wharves, docks, and such like things, which form part of the composite subject, and it is needless to pursue that further. It is enough to say that the rule there established, although it is not perhaps the best that could be devised, has been acted on for a long time, and seems to work well enough.

But the subject we are dealing with here is not a railway or a canal, although it is a subject of a kind in some degree resembling a railway or a canal, because it is situated in a variety of parishes. Accordingly, section 23 provides for the case of such works,—“Where any water company or gas company, or other company, having any continuous lands and heritages liable to be assessed in more than one parish, county, or burgh, shall desire to have such lands and heritages assessed by the assessor of railways and canals, under this Act, it shall be competent to such water or gas or other company to make intimation in writing of such desire, . . . and thereupon such assessor of railways and canals shall be exclusively charged, subject to appeal as herein provided, with the valuation of the lands and heritages in Scotland of such water or gas or other company in terms of this Act.” And the assessor is to inquire into and fix in cumulo the yearly rent and value, “in terms of this Act.” Now, that certainly can mean nothing else than to inquire into and fix the gross rent or value, because in the leading section, section 6, that is the thing to be ascertained, and entered upon the Valuation-roll; and the object of this section is to ascertain the same thing in regard to those special kinds of lands and heritages, which are not very easily brought within the rule of the 6th section. Accordingly, the words “in terms of this Act" must be held to refer back to that 6th section. Then the section goes on further to provide that, having ascertained the cumulo rent or value, the assessor is "to set forth in such Valuation-roll, in columns, the yearly rent or value, in terms of this Act, in cumulo, of the whole lands and heritages in Scotland belonging to or leased by each such water, gas, and other company respectively, and forming part of its undertaking, the names of the several parishes, counties, and burghs in which its said lands and heritages, or any part thereof, are situated, and also the yearly rent or value, in terms of this Act, of the portion in each such parish, county, and burgh, separately and respectively, of the lands and heritages belonging to or leased by each such water, gas, and other company respectively, and forming part of its undertaking." Then, in case the company which is applying under the 23d section to have the lands valued should be dissatisfied with the determination of the assessor of railways and canals, there is a provision for an appeal to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, and in this appeal the Lord Ordinary on the Bills is made final, just as in the ordinary case the two Valuation Judges are.

No. 69.

Jan. 14, 1887.
Magistrates of
Glasgow v.
Hall.

Before observing further upon the effect of these clauses, it is necessary to take into account section 33, which provides, "Where, in any county, burgh, or town, any county, municipal, parochial, or other public assessment, or any assessment, rate, or tax under any Act of Parliament is authorised to be imposed or made upon or according to the real rent of lands and heritages, the yearly rent or value of such lands and heritages as appearing from the Valuation-roll, in force for the time under this Act, in such county, burgh, or town, shall, from and after the establishment of such valuation therein, be always deemed and taken to be the just amount of real rent for the purposes of such county, municipal, parochial or other assessment, rate, or tax, and the same shall be assessed and levied according to such yearly rent or value accordingly, any law or usage to the contrary notwithstanding." Now, taking these sections together, it appears to me that when the valuation has been made, either under the 6th by the ordinary assessor, or under the 22d or the 23d section of the statute by the assessor of railways and canals, and where that has been acquiesced in, or taken to appeal and finally determined, in the one case by the Valuation Judges and in the other case by the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, it is impossible to go back in any way on what has been done. The assessment, if acquiesced in, of course puts an end to every such inquiry, and if there is an appeal, in the one case or in the other, the judgment of the Court of appeal is final, and cannot be reviewed by any Court.

The natural conclusion to be drawn from these clauses appears to me to be that, when there is presented to us an entry in the Valuation-roll, according to which the assessment has been laid on, either with or without deduction, as may be the case with the particular assessment in question, we are bound to take the entry in the Valuation-roll as conclusive evidence of what is the gross rent or annual value of the lands and heritages in question. We have no jurisdiction to inquire whether the Valuation Judges, in the one case, or the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, in the other, has been right or wrong in affirming or altering the determination of the assessor. It would be to review their judgment if we were to consider how they arrived at the result, or whether they arrived at it rightly; and that is specially excluded by the provisions of this Act of Parliament, which declare their determinations to be final. Therefore the simple ground on which I reach the conclusion that the answer made to the complainers is irrelevant is

No. 69. this, that it is impossible for anyone here in this process to impugn the entry in the Valuation-roll for the year in question. It is conclusive, and it does not matter whether it was rightly arrived at or not, because the statute says it shall be held to be right—there shall be no review of it—it is final and conclusive.

Jan. 14, 1887.
Magistrates of
Glasgow v.
Hall.

Therefore, I think we should be overstepping our jurisdiction altogether, if we inquired in what manner this entry in the Valuation-roll was arrived at. It stands as for the year—the ascertained gross yearly rent or value of the subject; and according to the 37th section of the Poor-Law Act, the person assessed is entitled to have certain deductions made from that gross rent or value. This is sufficiently apparent upon the face of the statute, as I have read it, but to remove all doubt upon the subject there is section 41, which provides that nothing in the Valuation Act shall alter or affect any classification, or any deduction or allowances, or power of making deductions or allowances from gross rental, made or possessed by anyone entitled to impose or levy assessments, but the same shall not affect the value to be inserted in the Valuation-roll in terms of this Act. Therefore, I am clearly of opinion that we cannot touch the entry in the Valuation-roll, or inquire in any way in what manner it was ascertained or reached. Upon these grounds, I am for substantially adhering to the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD MURE.—I am also for adhering to the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, and I have no difficulty in concurring with what your Lordship has said as to the finality of the decision of the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, when acting as an Appeal Judge under the Valuation Act in cases which come before him upon appeal from decisions of the railway assessor. We cannot get behind the valuation fixed by the assessor, which is final when not appealed, or behind that fixed by the Lord Ordinary on the Bills upon appeal. In either case it is the valuation so fixed which regulates the imposition of assessments, as provided in the Valuation Act; and I think this Court has no jurisdiction to interfere, or to inquire into the way in which the Lord Ordinary on the Bills proceeded, or as to what he actually did. The amount fixed by him, however, is to be subject, in respect of the provisions of the 41st section of the Valuation Act, to the deductions which may have been allowed by any other Act of Parliament to be made from gross rental in imposing the assessment.

In illustration of that view, it appears to me that when we look at the 6th section of the Valuation Act, it will be found to contain precisely the same provisions up to a certain point as the provisions of the 37th section of the Poor-Law Act. That is to say, it contains the provisions of section 37 up to that part of the section where the deductions are specified. In the 6th section of the Valuation Act, there is no provision about making deductions; so that when the assessor under the Valuation Act makes up his roll in terms of the 6th section, it is, in the ordinary case, a roll of the gross rental; and from that roll so made up the deductions specified in the 37th section of the Poor-Law Act may still be made in laying on the assessment. Indeed the board are bound to make them. That, I think, is the fair reading of the 6th section of the Valuation Act, as compared with the 37th section of the Poor-Law Act; and that point was, I conceive, decided in the case of the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company v. Meek, 3 Macph. 229. If, therefore, a proposal had been here made to get behind the valuation made up by the ordinary assessor, it is clear to me that we should have had no jurisdiction to entertain it, for the assessor's valuation is final. No. 69.

Jan. 14, 1887.
Magistrates of
Glasgow v.
Hall.

In the same way, in the case of railways and canals, if an appeal is made from the special assessor's valuation to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills his decision is final. At first I had some difficulty in this case on the point whether the Valuation-roll made up under the provisions of the 21st, 22d, and 23d sections of the Act relative to railways and canals could be said to be made upon gross rental in the sense of the statute. By the 41st section of the statute, it is only valuations made upon the gross rental that are to be subject to the deductions. That is the expression in the 41st section, and my difficulty was this, that what is fixed as gross rental under the 6th section is itself by section 22 made subject to deductions. The 20th section provides for the appointment of an assessor. Of section 22 the rubric is this:—"Mode in which the yearly rent or value of railways and canals is to be ascertained," and it defines the mode of ascertaining the yearly value of railways and canals. The provisions are:—"The yearly rent or value, in terms of this Act, of the lands and heritages in any pariah, county, or burgh belonging to or leased by any railway or canal company, and forming part of the undertaking of such company, shall be ascertained as follows"—not in terms of the 6th section but "as follows"; "that is to say, there shall be deducted, in the first place, from the cumulo yearly rent or value of the whole lands and heritages in Scotland as aforesaid of each such railway or canal company," and so on. Now, that directs deductions to be made from the cumulo value of the lands. The difficulty I had was whether a roll made up, beginning with a deduction of 3 per cent, can be said to be a Valuation-roll setting forth the gross rental mentioned in the 41st section, the deduction having been expressly appointed to be made under section 22 from the cumulo yearly rental. What therefore is thus brought out as the value of railways and canals can scarcely, strictly speaking, be called gross rental (as in section 41), but a reduced rental, as provided in the 22d section. I thought that a point of considerable nicety. But I have come to be of opinion that it is practically settled by the decision in Meek's case to which I have already referred. There the Court unanimously held that a deduction was to be made in the case of a railway company. That railway company was assessed by the assessor of railways, and the provisions to which I have referred were necessarily before the Court when they pronounced their decision. I think that decision is applicable here, and it seems to settle the point that from the valuation made up by the assessor of railways and canals the same deductions have to be made as those that fall to be made from the valuation of the assessor who acts under the 6th section.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the decision of the Lord Ordinary should be affirmed.

LORD SHAND.—I am of the same opinion. I think the judgment of the Lord Ordinary ought to be affirmed.

It seems to me to be plain, as the result of section 33 of the Valuation Act, that the rent which is brought out by the assessor of railways and canals, or by the commissioners who deal with such valuations in the ordinary case, is to be taken as conclusive for the purpose of any parochial assessment. The clause expressly provides that the amount of rent so fixed shall be deemed and taken to be the just amount of real rent for the purpose of such parochial assessment.

No. 69. Jan. 14, 1887.
Magistrates of
Glasgow v.
Hall.

That being so, we have thereby provided the first term required by those who are imposing an assessment under the Poor-Law Act. We have the rent thereby fixed; and all that the persons who are imposing that assessment have to do thereafter is to proceed to make the deductions which the Poor-Law Act itself authorises. I agree with your Lordship in thinking that we must take what we find in the Valuation-roll as conclusively fixing the real rent, and that we have no authority to inquire into the particular mode in which that rent was reached, or to consider what deductions the assessor or the Lord Ordinary dealing with the matter took into view. Upon that ground I agree with your Lordships in thinking that the judgment should be affirmed.

I am, however, bound to say further that counsel for the reclamer have entirely failed to satisfy me that the view taken by Lord Kinnear is unsound in fixing the real rent as he did. They have not satisfied me that he has in any true sense made the same deductions which it was said are now asked for a second time. Certainly his Lordship in reaching the sum which he thought right, and fixing the valuation, did not profess to make deductions from rent. His Lordship, on the contrary, was seeking to arrive at the rent, and not, having ascertained the rent, to make deductions from it. The mode in which he proceeded was to look at the income and to make certain deductions from income or revenue as the means of reaching what he regarded as the gross rent to be entered in the Valuation-roll. A deduction for any such purpose is, in my opinion, not a deduction from rent in the sense contended for here; and therefore, if it were competent to go into that question at all, I should agree with the Lord Ordinary in the view expressed by him in this case.

I shall only say this further: A desire was expressed on the part of the reclamer that there should be an expression of opinion as to the soundness of the judgments of Lord Kinnear and the other Judges who have dealt with this matter of valuation in the Bill-Chamber. Even if it were competent to give such an expression of opinion, I should be very slow to do so, for this amongst other reasons, that the question that has been discussed before the Court was not whether the Valuation-roll originally made up and settled by Lord Kinnear was a right valuation. The argument was directed to another purpose, and any incidental argument in reference to the judgment of Lord Kinnear in the Valuation Court would not be exhaustive on a question of this kind.

But I am clear that, as the statute makes the Lord Ordinary sitting in review of the assessor of railways and canals final in the matter of valuation, he must be the judge of that matter, and this Court has no power to deal with it; and I think it would be improper that we should express any opinion upon it. If the parties should be advised that considerations have not been hitherto laid before the Lord Ordinary who deals with these valuations, which might affect his judgment, the proper course to pursue is to bring that under the attention of the Judge by a new appeal when the proper time comes. The parties must judge for themselves whether there are other circumstances or new arguments which have not hitherto been presented which might lead to a refusal to give deductions which have hitherto been allowed. With these matters we cannot deal, and I do not think the desire which the reclamer expressed to have an opinion from this Court on that subject can be acceded to in this case.

LORD ADAM.—The yearly rent or value of the subjects in this case was ascertained by the Assessor of Railways and Canals under the 23d section of the No. 69.

 Lands Valuation (Scotland) Act. In my opinion the rent or valuation was ascertained by the assessor as the yearly rent or value which, under section 33 Jan. 14, 1887.
 of the Act, must be taken as the rental for assessment in all cases where the Magistrates of assessment is upon real property. Therefore it is beyond all question that the Glasgow v.
 yearly rent or value, as specified in the 33d section, is gross rent; and if that is Hall.
 so, it seems to me necessarily to follow that the Water-Works Commissioners are entitled to the deductions specified in the 37th section of the Poor-Law Act. Upon these grounds I have no hesitation in coming with your Lordship to the conclusion that the interlocutor must be upheld. The case is quite clear.

As to whether the Lord Ordinary is right in the matter of making the deductions in questions, I have not the slightest idea. The matter is so entirely artificial, and it is so impossible to suppose a hypothetical tenant who would pay rent when he was debarred from making profit, that I have not an idea whether the deductions are properly made or not. I am glad to say it is out of my province to deal with this matter, because the Lord Ordinary is final.

I am therefore of opinion the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be adhered to.

THE COURT adhered.

MILLAR, ROSSON, & INNES, S.S.C.—W. & J. BURNES, W.S.—Agents.

TRUSTEES OF THE FREE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND, First Parties.—Balfour— No. 70.
C. J. Guthrie.

LADY RAMSAY GIBSON MAITLAND AND OTHERS, Second Parties.—
R. V. Campbell—Wood.

FREDERICK CHARLES MAITLAND AND OTHERS (Maitland's Trustees).—
 Third Parties.—R. V. Campbell—Wood.

Jan. 14, 1887.
 Trustees of the
 Free Church of
 Scotland v.
 Maitland, &c.

Succession—Testament—Construction—Extrinsic evidence.—In the construction of a will and codicils, the Court is entitled to have regard to the state of the testator's circumstances at the dates when they were written, but not to indications of intention appearing in jottings or memoranda by him.

Succession—Testament—Double legacy.—A testator in his settlement, dated in June 1862, bequeathed (subject to his widow's liferent, which extended over the whole estate) a sum of £6000 to the General Trustees of the Free Church of Scotland, towards an endowment of the Free Church College, subject to certain discretionary powers given to the General Assembly of that church. He bequeathed the residue to three nephews, to whom also he gave special legacies of £2000 each. In a codicil to the settlement executed in March 1864 he directed his trustees that "in addition to all sums therein bequeathed by me, and particularly in addition to the sum of £4000 therein bequeathed by me to my brother F. C. M., to pay to him the annual interest on the sum of £6000, and if they see cause to do so, to set apart the said sum for his liferent use and behoof; . . .
 and at decease of both these liferenters," namely, F. C. M. and his widow, "to pay the said principal sum of £6000 to the General Trustees of the Free Church of Scotland for the benefit of the Free Church College in Edinburgh, to be applied in such manner as the General Assembly of the said Free Church may direct."

In a special case presented by the General Trustees of the Free Church, who

No. 70. claimed two legacies of £6000, and the residuary legatees, it appeared that the testator had entered annually in his books an estimate of his estate. The memorandum of January 1862 shewed a residue available for residuary legatees of £1931, 0s. 10d.

Jan. 14, 1887. Trustees of the Free Church of Scotland v. Maitland, &c. The memorandum of 20th January 1864 (being three months before the date of the codicil) shewed a residue available for residuary legatees of £3176, 3s. 2d. The testator died in September 1865.

The effect of the codicil as in 1864, assuming it to have created a new legacy of £6000, would have been to extinguish the residue and to diminish the prior legacies pro rata, including the legacy to F. C. M.

Held that the codicil could not be construed as giving a second legacy of £6000 to the Free Church.

1st Division. B. MR JOHN MAITLAND, sometime Accountant of the Court of Session, died on 6th September 1865, survived by his wife, who died on 8th February 1886.

Mr Maitland left a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 12th June 1862 and registered 12th September 1865, by which he conveyed his whole means and estate to trustees for certain purposes. These purposes were,—(First) For payment of debts and expenses; (second) for delivery to Mrs Maitland of all the furniture and other articles which belonged to him; (third) for payment at the first term after his death of legacies to Mrs Maitland (£1000) and her two sisters (£500 each); (fourth) for payment to his wife, in the event of her survivance, of the free annual income or proceeds of the residue of his means and estate; (fifth) for payment at the first term after the death of the survivor of himself and his wife of various legacies, all free of legacy-duty, to the persons afternamed,—“To the said Frederick Charles Maitland, my brother, the sum of £4000, to Mrs Helen Maitland or Hog, my sister, widow of James Maitland Hog, Esquire, of Newliston, . . . the sum of £4000; to the said Sir Alexander Charles Gibson Maitland, Baronet, my nephew, and the heirs of his body, the sum of £2000; to the said George Ramsay Maitland and the heirs of his body the sum of £2000; to the said Keith Ramsay Maitland and the heirs of his body the sum of £2000; to my niece, Mrs Jean Hamilton Maitland or Bulwer . . . the sum of £2000” (here followed four legacies of £250 each to other relatives); “and to the General Trustees of the Free Church of Scotland, also free of legacy-duty, (first) the sum of £2000 to be placed to the fund for Aged and Infirm Ministers of the Free Church of Scotland; (second) the sum of £6000 to be employed by them towards the endowment of the Free Church College at Edinburgh, and the free annual proceeds of which sum shall be applied by said General Trustees (subject to such conditions and directions as the General Assemblies of said Free Church shall see fit to impose) either to the principal or principal librarian of said college, or to any one of the permanent professors, or as remuneration to any party to be named by said General Assemblies, and connected with the said college as a lecturer therein or otherwise, or partly to two or more of such persons, or the said proceeds may be otherwise applied separately, or in conjunction with, or as a supplement to the proceeds of any other endowment fund belonging to the said college as the said General Assemblies may direct; and with power to said General Assemblies, from time to time as circumstances may in their opinion require or render expedient, to recall, vary, or alter the application of said principal sum and proceeds thereof, or to add the said fund to and merge the same in any other fund or endowment belonging to the said college, but so as that the same shall always be applied in connection with the said Free Church College at Edinburgh, it being my wish and intention by this bequest to advance the influence and usefulness of the said college by aiding in making a suitable provision for one or more distinguished ministers, missionaries, or members of the Free Church connected, or whom the General Assemblies may connect, with the said college at Edinburgh." The sixth purpose provided for payment of the residue of the estate to Sir Alexander C. G. Maitland, Bart. (now deceased), George Ramsay Maitland (also now deceased), and the said Colonel Keith Ramsay Maitland, and their respective heirs, executors, and successors per stirpes.

No. 70.

Jan. 14, 1887.
Trustees of the
Free Church of
Scotland v.
Maitland, &c.

On 7th March 1864 the testator executed the following holograph codicil to his settlement, which was registered on 12th September 1865,—“I, John Maitland, Accountant of the Court of Session, with reference to the trust-disposition and settlement executed by me on the 12th day of June in the year 1862, do hereby direct my trustees therein named and designed, and those who may be hereafter named by me or assumed by them, as therein mentioned, and that, in addition to all sums therein bequeathed by me, and particularly in addition to the sum of £4000 therein bequeathed by me to my brother Frederick Charles Maitland, to pay to him the annual interest on the sum of £6000, and if they see cause to do so, to set apart the said sum for his liferent use and behoof, but still so as to preserve the liferent thereof to my wife, Mary Isabella Wood or Maitland, in the event of her surviving my said brother; and at decease of both of these liferenters, namely, Frederick Charles Maitland, and, in the event of her survivance, my said wife also, I direct my said trustees, after the death of both of these parties, or at my death, in case I should survive both, to pay the said principal sum of £6000 to the General Trustees of the Free Church of Scotland for the benefit of the Free Church College in Edinburgh, to be applied in such manner as the General Assembly of the said Free Church may direct.—In witness whereof,” &c.

After Mrs Maitland's death a question arose as to the amount bequeathed to the trustees of the Free Church, and a special case was accordingly presented by these trustees as first parties, the residuary legatees as second parties, and the trustees under the settlement and codicil as third parties. The question put to the Court was,—“(1) Are the first parties hereto entitled, under the said trust-disposition and settlement and codicil, to two legacies of £6000 each, or only to one?”

The first parties maintained that in addition to the legacy of £2000 under the settlement they were entitled to two separate legacies of £6000 each under the settlement and codicil respectively. The second parties maintained that the first parties were entitled only to one legacy of £6000, and that the true intent of the codicil was merely to subject the sum of £6000, given by the settlement to the first parties, to a liferent in favour of the testator's brother, Mr Frederick Charles Maitland, preferential to Mrs Maitland's existing liferent of the same sum.

It was admitted that the gross value of the estate at the date of the testator's death was £39,742.

It was further stated by the second parties in the case that the testator was in the practice from the year 1847 till his death of keeping a private cash-book and ledger, and of making up in the latter balance-sheets of his affairs as at 20th January in each year. Further, on the same date in each of the four last years of his life, the testator prepared “annual memoranda,” which he entered in his ledger, in which he estimated the value of his estate at each date, deducting legacies and other burdens,

No. 70. and bringing out the balance available for the residuary legatees.* All these were holograph of the testator.†

Jan. 14, 1887. The first parties admitted the accuracy of the above statement, but Trustees of the Free Church of Scotland v. Maitland, &c. disputed the competency of taking the memoranda into consideration in the construction of the settlement and codicil.

The first parties argued ;—(1) The presumption, when there were two separate gifts of the same amount to the same person in separate documents, was in favour of a double legacy. That had been settled by Muir's case,¹ and the present case was, in one respect at least, stronger, because here the settlement was referred to by its date in the codicil, and in Muir's case it was considered not improbable that the first deed had been forgotten when the second was executed. Besides, the second bequest

* The residuary fund so brought out in the memoranda on 20th January 1862, was £1931, 0s. 10d., on 20th January 1864, £3176, 3s. 2d., and on 20th January 1865, £6536, 16s. 4d. The value of the estate as at 20th January 1862 was estimated at £41,431, 0s. 10d., at 20th January 1864, £42,676, 3s. 2d., and at 20th January 1865, £39,536, 16s. 4d. In the last year the testator excluded a sum of over £6000, which he had expended on account of the Free Church Offices in Edinburgh, and which had appeared on both sides in previous balance-sheets.

† The annual memorandum for 20th January 1864, being immediately before the execution of the codicil, was—

"As at the 20th Jany. 1864.

"1st. As affecting residuary legatees—

Total estate as on 20th Jany. 1864, pr. valuation col., p. 121,	£42,676	3	2
Deduct burdens pr. Settlement, debts and expenses, as before stated, top of p. 161 (top of right hand page there),	39,500	0	0
Estimate—Remains for Residuary Legatees,	£3,176	3	2

"2d. As affecting provisions to Mrs M.—

1st. In liferent—Legacies, Class 2d, fo. 160 (left hand of that folio),	£26,500	0	0
Residuary fund as above,	3,176	3	2
Sum,	£29,676	3	2
2d. In fee—Legacy £1000, furniture £1000, as before,	2,000	0	0
Estimate, Mrs M.—Together, fee and liferent,	£31,676	3	2"

And for 1865—

"Br. 1st. As affecting my Residuary Legatees—

Total Estate at 20th Jany 1865, pr. valuation col., page 122,	£39,536	16	4
Deduct burdens, pr. Abstract of Settlement, p. 161,	£31,500	0	0
Less J. C. Fraser, since dead,	500	0	0
	£31,000	0	0
Add debt due to F. C. Trustees,	2,000	0	0
	33,000	0	0
Remains for Residuary Legatees,	£6,536	16	4"

¹ Royal Infirmary v. Muir's Trustees, Dec. 16, 1881, 9 R. 352; Horsburgh v. Horsburgh, Jan. 12, 1847, 9 D. 329 (Lord Fullerton, p. 382), 19 Scot. Jur. 118.

here differed in three particulars at least from the first,—it was not free of legacy-duty, it was to be devoted generally to the benefit of the Free Church College, and the powers given in regard to it were much wider than in regard to the first. These distinctions strengthened the presumption in favour of a double legacy. Besides, there was no sufficient reason for denying effect to either document. It was true that there were no direct words of bequest in either case,—and that there was in both a mere direction to pay. But the direction in the codicil surely imported much more than a morata solutio. If that had been all that was intended, it could have been done in a much simpler way. So, too, the description in the codicil of the objects to which the fund was destined was not a mere summary by way of reference to the settlement. It was not so worded. (2) It was incompetent to refer to the memoranda and other documents as interpreting the testator's intention. The Court might place themselves in the position of the testator when making his will, or as had been said, might sit in the testator's chair, and make themselves acquainted with his surrounding circumstances. But the documents could not be looked at further than to shew what the circumstances surrounding the testator were.¹ The only case where evidence was allowable was that of a latent ambiguity. It might be legitimate for the Court to have regard to the fact that a gift of a second legacy under the codicil would have left only about £600 to be divided as residue. But provision was made for the residuary legatees by the will; and if the testator had meant to favour them with residuary bequests, he would not have made other bequests to them. Lord Cairns had stated the law as it now stood in regard to the admission of evidence in such matters in the case of Charter.² In Livingston's case,³ the ground for admitting the undelivered letter may have been either that it was of a testamentary nature, or that it was a document of debt. In Ritchie's case,⁴ the letter which was admitted was held to be of a testamentary nature. (3) The memoranda, if they were competent evidence at all, were mere jottings, and threw no real light on the matter.

The second parties argued;—(1) The alleged second bequest in the codicil was merely a reference back to the legacy previously given by the settlement. The language used in the codicil in regard to the disposal of the legacy briefly repeated the longer details of the settlement. The codicil consisted of two grammatically distinct directions; under the first direction, the first parties could have made no claim. The £6000 referred to in the second direction was the same £6000 as was referred to in the first, and that was undoubtedly the £6000 of the settlement. The important matter in the second direction, in the testator's view, was the date of payment, and the testing-clause also afforded evidence of this. The only novelty in the codicil was the imposition of the new liferent. The codicil all through referred back to the settlement, and the two ought ¹ Campbell v. Campbell, July 8, 1880 (H. of L.), 7 R. 100; Wilson v. O'Leary, March 7, 1872, L. R., 7 Chanc. App. 448; Scott v. Sceales, Feb. 5, 1864, 2 Macph. 613, 36 Scot. Jur. 298; Jarman on Wills, 425; Thoms v. Thoms, March 30, 1868, 6 Macph. 704, 40 Scot. Jur. 364; Glendonwyn v. Gordon, July 20, 1870, 8 Macph. 1075, aff. May 19, 1873, 11 Macph. (H. of L.) 33, 45 Scot. Jur. 183; Catton v. Mackenzie, July 19, 1870, 8 Macph. 1049 (Lord President, p. 1055), 42 Scot. Jur. 618, (H. of L.), March 1, 1873, 10 Macph. 12; Gray v. Gray's Trustees, May 24, 1878, 5 R. 820.

² Charter v. Charter, June 1874, L. R., 7 Engl. and Ir. App. 364 (Lord Chancellor Cairns, p. 376-7).

³ 3 Macph. 20.

⁴ 8 R. 101.

No. 70. really to be read as one deed. But even if they were distinct deeds, the slightest indication of a contrary intention on the part of the testator appearing on the face of the document would overcome the presumption in favour of a double legacy.¹ It had been held that merely small points of difference were not effectual as indicating separate legacies.² (2) In construing the deed, the Court was entitled to have regard to all the facts and circumstances which were before the testator. The memoranda were admissible to shew that the testator had counted up his funds, and had ascertained that the residue would amount in each year to a certain sum.³ They were further admissible to shew that the testator had taken no account of the second legacy of £6000, assuming that it was bequeathed.

Jan. 14, 1897.
Trustees of the
Free Church of
Scotland v.
Maitland, &c.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question raised in this special case arises out of the settlement and codicil left by the late Mr John Maitland. The competing parties are one of the special legatees on the one hand, and the residuary legatees on the other, and the inquiry is, whether the special legatee, the first party, is entitled under the operation of the settlement and codicil to one legacy of £6000, or to two legacies of that amount. The legatees maintain that the settlement gave them a legacy of £6000, and that the codicil gives them an additional legacy of the same amount.

In determining a question of this kind we have one general rule to guide us, namely, that where a settlement gives in express terms a legacy of any particular amount, and a subsequent codicil gives another to the same person of a like amount, without there being anything to shew a contrary intention, both legacies will be payable, and not one only. The question, therefore, comes to be, is that rule applicable in the present case, or is there anything to take it out of the general rule?

A variety of facts and circumstances have been submitted by the second parties under reference to which they seek that this settlement and codicil shall be construed. Some of these statements appear to me to be admissible in evidence, while others clearly are not. Anything in the nature of a declaration of intention, or any statement of the testator's from which an inference can be drawn, subsequent to the execution of his testamentary papers, appears to me to be quite inadmissible. On the other hand, we are entitled to inquire into the facts affecting the position of the testator at the time when he made his settlement, and also at the time when he made his codicil. We are entitled to know, for example, what was the amount of his estate at each period according to his own estimate, because considerable light may be thus obtained in ascertaining his intention as expressed in his testamentary writings under reference to the fact that his estate was of greater or less value at one period and at another. To this extent, and to this extent only, I give effect to the statement which is set forth by the second parties.

¹ Horsbrugh v. Horsbrugh, 9 D. 329 (Lord Jeffrey, p. 387).

² Whyte v. Whyte, 1873, L. R., 17 Eq. 50; cf. also Barclay v. Wainwright, 1797, 3 Vesey, 461; Moggridge v. Thackwell, May 1792, 1 Vesey, 464; Tatham v. Drummond, 1864, 33 L. J. Chanc. 458; Chancy v. Wootton, 1725, 2 White and Tudor's Leading Cases, 356; Hooley v. Hutton and Ridges v. Morrison, 1 Brown's Chanc. Cas. 389, 391; Allan v. Callow, 1796, 3 Vesey, 289; Russell v. Dickson, 1853, 4 Clark's House of Lords Cases, 293 (Lord Chancellor Cranworth, p. 304); Kippen v. Darley, 1858, 3 Macq. (H. of L.) 203.

³ Dickson on Evidence, i. 154, 166; Williams on Executors, i. 170; Livingston v. Livingston, Nov. 7, 1864, 3 Macph. 20, 37 Scot. Jur. 10; Ritchie v. Whish, &c., Nov. 19, 1880, 8 R. 101; Smith v. Smith's Trs., Nov. 26, 1884, 12 R. 186.

No. 79.

JAN. 14, 1887.
Trustees of the
Free Church of
Scotland v.
Maitland, &c.

By his principal settlement the testator makes provision for certain legacies, to be paid to his wife and her sisters, and for a liferent of the whole residue in favour of his widow. These small legacies which are first provided are to be paid immediately, and are not to be subject to the liferent. The legacies which are given under the fifth purpose are to be paid on the death of the survivor of the spouses. The objects of his benevolence under that purpose are, in the first place, certain of his relatives, and in the second place, the trustees of the Free Church. He had a brother and a sister, to each of whom he bequeathed, by this fifth purpose, a sum of £4000, and four nephews and a niece, to whom he left £2000 a-piece. He then gives to the Trustees of the Free Church a sum of £2000 for the fund for Aged and Infirm Ministers of the Free Church, and then a sum of £6000, to be employed towards the endowment of the Free Church College in Edinburgh. With regard to this latter sum he expresses his intention in the settlement at very considerable length as to how it is to be applied, although he leaves a good deal to the discretion of the General Assembly of the Church, but he makes it a fundamental condition of the gift that it is to be applied for the promotion of the influence and usefulness of the Free Church College. It is important to observe that the testator's directions as to the application of this bequest are very precise and full. As regards the residue of his estate, he leaves it to his three nephews, his apparent intention being to make up to them the difference between the amount of the legacies bequeathed to his brother and sister on the one hand, and to his nephews and niece on the other. So stands his settlement, and it is to be kept in mind that at the time when it was executed in 1862 the testator had left for his residuary legatees according to his own estimate, and after providing for all the primary purposes of the trust, £1931. His estate was thus fully disposed of by the settlement, and we find that the residue was of small amount when compared with the sum which was bequeathed in special legacies.

We now come to the codicil, which is certainly expressed in terms which are, to say the least of it, ambiguous, as regards the testator's purpose and intention. It may be naturally divided into two parts, the first of which has reference to the bequest to his brother, Frederick Charles Maitland, and is in these terms:—"I, John Maitland, . . . with reference to the trust-disposition and settlement executed by me, . . . do hereby direct my trustees, . . . in addition to all sums therein bequeathed by me, and particularly in addition to the sum of £4000 therein bequeathed by me to my brother, Frederick Charles Maitland, to pay to him the annual interest on the sum of £6000, and, if they see cause to do so, to set apart the said sum for his liferent use and behoof, but still so as to preserve the liferent thereof to my wife, Mary Isabella Wood or Maitland, in the event of her surviving my said brother." I do not think that as regards the practical effect of these words there can be much difficulty. The testator's intention is, that there shall be given to his brother, Frederick Charles, a liferent of a sum of £6000 preferential to the liferent of that sum which his widow would have enjoyed. At the same time he preserves his widow's right subject only to that preferential liferent. But there are certain words which have been founded on on both sides—I mean the words "in addition to all sums bequeathed by me." It seemed to be contended on the part of the first parties

No. 70. that these words expressed a leading idea in the testator's mind, operating not only as regarded the first, but also as regarded the latter half of the codicil. But
Jan. 14, 1887. I do not attach importance to them, because I think their meaning is satisfied Trustees of the when we find that an additional sum is given to Frederick Charles beyond what Free Church of he received under the original settlement. Nothing more is meant than that Scotland v. the testator has a purpose and intention, which is otherwise clearly brought out,
Maitland, &c. to give to Frederick Charles, in addition to the bequest made to him in the settlement, a liferent, preferential to that given to his widow.

But there are other words which demand attention—I mean the words “the sum of £6000.” If the testator had added after them the words “therein bequeathed to the trustees of the Free Church,” all ambiguity would have been at an end. It is the omission of some such words as these which creates the ambiguity, and this too by way of contrast, because in speaking of the £4000 the testator calls it “the sum of £4000 therein bequeathed by me to my brother,” but in speaking of the £6000 he uses no such words. But I think this may be accounted for by the fact that in the settlement there are two sums of £4000 and only one sum of £6000, and in speaking of the £4000 the testator naturally enough distinguishes it as the sum “therein bequeathed to my brother,” while in speaking of the £6000 he did not require to apply any distinguishing terms, because there is only one such sum mentioned. So much for the language of the first part of the codicil, and it is to be observed that both it and the latter part are expressed in the form of directions to pay. The words used are not properly words of bequest, and yet the first direction has all the force of a bequest.

The second part of the codicil is as follows:—“And at decease of both of these liferenters, namely, Frederick Charles Maitland and, in the event of her survivance, my said wife also, I direct my said trustees after the death of both of these parties, or at my death in case I should survive both, to pay the said principal sum of £6000 to the General Trustees of the Free Church of Scotland for the benefit of the Free Church College in Edinburgh, to be applied in such manner as the General Assembly of the said Free Church may direct.” If it was here intended by the testator to give an additional bequest of £6000 over and above the £6000 contained in his settlement, one cannot but feel that he has expressed himself ambiguously, for there can be no doubt that this part of the codicil is capable of two readings. It may mean that he gives an additional £6000 besides the £6000 bequeathed in his settlement; it may mean that he merely gave the direction for the purpose of making it clear that, while the original £6000 was to be liferented by his brother, it was to go, as already provided, upon the death of both liferenters, to the Free Church College. And this identity of the two sums is supported in some degree by contrasting the very short way in which in the codicil he refers to the object to which that sum is to be applied with the very lengthy and special way in which he describes that object in the settlement. The former is, in fact, just a very short summary of the second part of the fifth purpose of the settlement. This does not, perhaps, go for very much, but it tends to increase the ambiguity and the difficulty of arriving at the testator's true intention in the matter.

The way in which this question presents itself to my mind is not exactly the same as in many cases of double legacies. It is not whether the legacy is additional or substitutional; it is rather whether the testator meant by it to give a legacy at all, and whether he did not mean the legacy to stand as it was left in the settlement, with a direction, notwithstanding the alteration in the first part No. 70/ of the codicil, to carry out its application in the manner there described.

That being the nature of the question, we are entitled to consider the position of the testator at the date of the codicil as affecting the question of intention. I have mentioned that, at the date of the settlement, the residue of the testator's estate, according to his own estimate, was £1900. I see that at the date of the codicil it amounted to £3176, assuming that there was not a second legacy of £6000. If there was a second legacy of £6000 bequeathed by the codicil, then not only would there be no residue, but there would be a deficiency, which would require to be made up by a proportional abatement from the legacies in the settlement. Now, that is a fact affecting the position and purpose of the testator which we are well entitled to take into account. Is it probable that, after making his nephews his residuary legatees—there being a small surplus over at the time of his original settlement—the testator should by the second part of his codicil not only wipe out the surplus, but actually create a deficiency, which could only be met by an abatement of all the legacies contained in the fifth purpose of the codicil? I think that this is a very improbable result, especially considering that, as regards the nephew Frederick Charles, whom the codicil was certainly intended to benefit, the testator would there be giving with the one hand a liferent of £6000 and taking away with the other a part of his original bequest to him of £4000, to which he expressed his intention of making an addition. Assuming that the codicil is difficult to read, and that there is a plain ambiguity about it, I think this is a consideration sufficient to turn the balance, and to lead us to the conclusion that it was not the intention to give a second bequest of £6000, but that the second purpose of the codicil was truly a direction that the £6000, after the liferent in favour of the testator's brother, and the further liferent in favour of his widow, was to go to its original destination, namely, for the benefit of the Free Church College.

I am for answering the question in accordance with these views, and for finding the first parties entitled to only one legacy of £6000.

LORD MURK.—I am of the same opinion, and your Lordship has given so full an exposition of the clauses of the settlement and codicil, and of the rules of construction applicable to them, that I have very little to add. As to the general rule, by which the Court should be guided in cases of double legacy, there can be no difficulty after the decision in the case of Muir's Trustees (9 R. 352). The rule which was there adopted was that where two legacies identical in amount, are made in two different writings, both may be claimed, unless there are expressions to be found in the instruments, or something in the surrounding circumstances which may competently be brought into consideration, and which are sufficient to shew that the testator did not intend to make two bequests. In the two short testamentary writings, which we were called upon to construe in the case of Muir's Trustees, there was nothing to shew that it was not the testator's intention to make a double legacy. In the present case there is not much more light to be got from the documents themselves than there was in the case of Muir's Trustees, but we are entitled to look at those surrounding circumstances, and the conditions of things which would necessarily be present to the mind of the testator at the dates when he executed the respective deeds, and to judge from these whether the second £6000 was to be cumulative or in substitution of the first.

Jan. 14, 1887:
Trustees of the
Free Church of
Scotland v.
Maitland, &c.

No. 70.

Jan. 14, 1887.
*Trustees of the
 Free Church of
 Scotland v.
 Maitland, &c.*

I agree with your Lordship in thinking that the position of the testator's estate and the amount of it, at the dates to which I have referred, have an important bearing upon the solution of the question raised in the present case. We have under the testator's own hand an account of the state of his funds from year to year, and it is plain that when he came to make the additional provision for his brother, which is contained in the codicil, he had to consider deliberately, having regard to his general settlement, where it was to come from, and what the fund was to be out of which he was to give this additional provision. It is also clear that there was no sufficient amount of residue out of which he could make a second legacy of £6000. As your Lordship has explained, the result of making a second bequest of such a sum would, as at the date of the codicil, have been not only to produce a deficiency, but to lead in addition to an abatement from all the legacies left under the settlement. This is not a likely thing for an experienced man of business, as Mr Maitland undoubtedly was, to have done. The two sums which he required to have chiefly in view in making the codicil were the £4000 bequeathed to his brother and the £6000 bequeathed to the Free Church. He designates the £4000 as the sum already destined to his brother, and he does this because there is another sum of £4000 bequeathed in the settlement, from which it was necessary to distinguish it. There is, however, only one sum of £6000 in the settlement; and consequently he did not require to identify it further than by mentioning it as the £6000, the interest on which was to be paid to his brother during his lifetime, instead of to his own wife, so that his brother was to have a liferent of that sum, preferential to the liferent of it which he had already given to his wife, while the principal of the same £6000 was after the death of both liferenters to go to the Free Church. This appears to me to produce a consistent reading of the two deeds; and in the surrounding circumstances I think that it is the disposition of his property which the testator would naturally have made. I am therefore of opinion that the first parties are not entitled to two legacies of £6000, but that the sum of £6000 mentioned in the codicil is the same as that bequeathed by the settlement.

LORD SHAND.—The question in this case is one of considerable difficulty. It is this, whether under the codicil the testator gave an additional legacy to the trustees of the Free Church besides the £6000 bequeathed by his settlement, or whether the £6000 mentioned in the codicil was in substitution of the former legacy, or merely imported a reference to it. I do not think it has been argued that the case is one of substitution, and accordingly the point is narrowed to this, Is the £6000 mentioned in the codicil a reference to the legacy given by the original settlement, or is it a new legacy?

There is undoubtedly in both cases a direction to pay the sum of £6000, and, accordingly, I think the rule applies, which was laid down in the case of Muir's Trustees, and previous cases, that where two legacies of the same amount are given to the same person by two different testamentary writings, both are effectual, unless, looking to the terms of the writings themselves, taken with the surrounding circumstances, there is enough to shew that the testator did not intend to give a double legacy. The question here is whether, notwithstanding the directions to pay which we find in the two deeds, it was really not intended that two legacies should be given. I am of opinion that on a sound construction of the terms of the codicil a double legacy was not given.

No. 70.

A question has been raised as to how far the Court is entitled to take into consideration certain documents and memoranda which have been brought under our notice by the second parties. It appears that the testator was in the habit of making up a balance-sheet of his affairs, and of entering in his cash-book an annual estimate of his means. It has been contended that we may look at such facts as this, which appears in the estimate or memoranda dated 20th January 1865. There is an entry there to this effect,—“Remains for residuary legatees, £6536, 16s. 4d.” The codicil in question is dated 7th March 1864. And if a second legacy of £6000 were bequeathed by the codicil, it is clear that there would have remained for the residuary legatees only a sum of £536 and not the much larger sum mentioned in the entry. I am of opinion that the Court cannot look at this entry for the purpose of drawing any conclusion from it bearing on the controversy between the parties. The result of holding otherwise would be that a mere jotting in the handwriting of the deceased (having no claim to the character of a testamentary writing) would be allowed to control the effect of a regular testament or codicil. I think this document must be entirely laid aside; and for my part, I place it entirely out of view and out of mind.

Jan. 14, 1887.
Trustees of the
Free Church of
Scotland v.
Maitland, &c.

But while the Court is not entitled to look at these memoranda, I think that in judging of the testator's meaning in the disposal of his estate by the terms used by him, we are entitled to know what the pecuniary circumstances of the deceased were. We have very full information about this. Because we know the state of the funds of the deceased, and how he was situated precisely from time to time, under the testator's own hand. There are two circumstances of importance, which may be noted before coming to the construction of the deeds themselves. The settlement is dated 12th June 1862. By it he gave a legacy of £6000 in addition to a sum of £6000, which he had actually expended for assisting to build certain offices in Edinburgh for the Free Church. The codicil is dated a year and nine months later, and there was no substantial addition in the meantime to the testator's funds. He had not acquired any increase of means out of which he could have provided a second legacy of £6000, and there was no change in his circumstances such as would suggest the probability of such a bequest being made. There is another consideration which is even more material. If there were a second legacy under the codicil, the result would be that in order to meet it it would be necessary to encroach on all the other legacies. The testator was not in possession of funds to pay such a legacy at the time when the codicil was made without making an abatement from all his bequests.

Taking these circumstances into consideration in construing the two deeds, I think there is enough in the terms of the codicil itself to lead us to the conclusion that the testator had no intention to give a double legacy. It is plain that the reference to the £6000 in the early part of the codicil, as an addition to the legacy in the settlement, is limited to the giving an addition to the liferent in favour of Frederick Charles Maitland. The words “in addition to all sums bequeathed by me,” are inserted as a parenthesis in the first direction, and are applicable to it alone, and that direction was merely to enlarge the liferent of Frederick Charles Maitland by giving him the interest on the sum of £6000, in addition to his legacy of £4000. When we come to deal with the second direction regarding the payment to the trustees of the Free Church, the words I have quoted have no bearing upon it. There is no indication in the second direction

No. 70. as in the first that an addition is intended to be given, and the absence of this, in contrast to what is said in the first direction, is very significant. Where the testator means to give an addition he says so; when in a farther and substantive direction he refers to the previous legacy given he omits any reference to an addition. There the language by which "the said principal sum of £6000" is described is just a short summary of the much longer description of the legacy in the principal deed. It is no doubt true that there is a presumption in such a case as the present in favour of a double legacy, but very slight circumstances indeed may sometimes displace that presumption. I think the presumption is here displaced, and I am therefore of opinion that the first parties are not entitled to more than one legacy of £6000.

Jan. 14, 1887.
Trustees of the
Free Church of
Scotland v.
Maitland, &c.

LORD ADAM.—I think this is a very difficult and a very narrow case. I quite approve and adopt the law as expressed by your Lordship in the case of Muir's Trustees, to the following effect:—"One rule, at least, is well settled, and that is, that when exactly the same amount is given twice in the same paper, the presumption is that it is a mere repetition arising from some mistake or forgetfulness; but where the same amount is bequeathed in two distinct testamentary papers, both equally formal, then both legacies are payable, unless it can be shewn from the settlement of the deceased, or by other competent evidence, that his intention was to give one legacy only." I think that is a distinct and accurate statement of the law.

We have heard an argument upon the competency of the evidence as to the testator's position and circumstances at the dates of the execution of the settlement and subsequent codicil, and I agree with Lord Shand in the opinion which he has expressed in regard to that matter. I think the rule of law applicable to it is accurately stated in the passage which has been quoted from Mr Jarman's book on Wills (i. 425-430), to the effect that evidence to prove intention as an independent fact is inadmissible. The Court is not entitled to look at contemporaneous jottings or other writings for the purpose of arriving at the testator's intention as expressed in his testamentary papers. These are not competent. But it is not only competent, but in the present case it is most material, to look at the memoranda which have been produced for the purpose of seeing the amount of the testator's estate at the two dates of the making the will and the codicil. In the latter document the testator tells us what addition he intended to make to the provisions under his settlement. The addition consists of a liferent in favour of his brother of a sum of £6000. That is the only addition specified in the codicil. There is further a direction to pay the £6000 to be liferented to the Free Church Trustees after the death of the two liferenters, but this latter direction is not, as matter of construction, affected by the words contained in the first portion of the codicil as to its being "in addition." Yet, if it were to be treated as an additional legacy, it would be a much greater addition than that which the testator has particularly specified. I think the contention that the second £6000 is the same as that previously conferred by the settlement must be given effect to.

THE COURT answered that the first parties were entitled to only one legacy of £6000.

COWAN & DALMAHOY, W.S.—MAITLAND & LYON, W.S.—Agents.

JAMES M'KECHNIE, Pursuer (Appellant).—Shaw—Salvesen.
 THOMAS COUPER, Defender (Respondent).—Darling—Guy.

No. 71.

Jan. 20, 1887.

Reparation—Precautions for public safety—Relations of wheeled vehicles to foot-passengers.—Foot-passengers on a country road with footpaths on either side are entitled to walk upon the road itself, and the drivers of vehicles are bound to keep clear of them.

JAMES M'KECHNIE, a labourer, forty-seven years old, brought an action 2D DIVISION.
 to recover damages for injuries received by him in consequence of having been knocked down by a milk-cart belonging to the defender, Thomas Couper, in the early morning of 8th February 1886. It appeared that the pursuer had left his house at Torrance of Campsie that morning between five and six to walk into his work in Glasgow. The roads were very slippery in consequence of a slight thaw following on a frost. As M'Kechnie was walking on the road, at a point where it is thirty feet broad, with a narrow footpath on either side, he was overtaken by the defender's cart, driven by a lad of seventeen, and knocked down, his leg being injured. The footpaths had no kerb. Sheriff of Stirlingshire.

The defender pleaded that his servant had exercised due care, and that the pursuer had contributed by his own carelessness to the accident.

The boy had not been driving the cart above five or six miles an hour, but both the Sheriff-substitute (Mitchell), who awarded the pursuer £10 of damages and expenses, and the Sheriff (Muirhead), who only gave him £5 and Small Debt Court expenses, were of opinion that the accident had been caused by the failure of the driver to keep a proper look-out.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session. The Court intimated to counsel for the pursuer that he need not argue the question of fault. His argument was confined to the question of the amount of damages and expenses. The defender's counsel argued that there was no fault, and that the damages were sufficient in any event.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It appears to me that instead of the Sheriff's judgment being too favourable to the pursuer, the proper view of the case would lead to a different conclusion. The pursuer was doing nothing but what he was entitled to do, and the driver of the milk-cart was bound to take precautions to avoid a foot-passenger in the middle of the road, where he was entitled to be. I am of opinion that he did not take sufficient precautions.

There is no doubt as to the relations between wheeled vehicles and persons on the road. We have had occasion to determine these more than once. There is no doubt that it lies on the driver to keep clear of foot-passengers. If a person is guilty of such fault as to increase the burden of that obligation, that is another matter, but the primary obligation is undoubted—to keep clear of foot-passengers.

I am quite unable to understand in what view the Sheriff made the alteration he did. On the contrary, I think the Sheriff-substitute was rather niggardly in the sum he awarded. My opinion is that we should give £20 and expenses in both Courts.

LORD YOUNG, LORD CRAIGHILL, and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that early in the morning of 8th February 1886 the pursuer, while walking on the public road between Torrance of Campsie and Glasgow on his way to his work, was knocked down and severely hurt by a cart be-

No. 71.

Jan. 20, 1887.
M'Kechnie v.
Couper.

longing to the defender; (2) that he was so injured by the fault and negligence of the defender's servant in charge of the cart in driving it rapidly in the dark without any precautions taken for the safety of persons using the road; (3) that the accident was not caused by any fault or neglect on the part of the pursuer: Find in law that the defender is liable to the pursuer in damages for the injuries sustained by him as aforesaid: Therefore sustain the appeal: Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 19th July last, and interlocutor of the Sheriff of 27th October following: Assess the damages at £20," &c.

GILL & PRINGLE, W.S.—CARMENT, WEDDERBURN, & WATSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 72.

Jan. 21, 1887.
Magistrates of
Glasgow v.
Farie.

MAGISTRATES OF GLASGOW, Pursuers (Respondents).—

Sol.-Gen. Robertson—J. C. Thomson—G. W. Burnet.

ALLAN FARIE, Defender (Reclaimers).—D. F. Mackintosh—C. S. Dickson—Ure.

Property—Compulsory sale—Water-Works Clauses Act, 1847 (10 and 11 Vict. c. 17)—Railways Clauses Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 33)—Mines and Minerals.—Held (dis. Lord Mure, rev. judgment of Lord M'Laren) that the provision of the Water-Works Clauses Act, 1847, excluding from conveyances of lands purchased under the Act (when not expressly included) "mines of coal, ironstone, slate, or other minerals" applied to minerals of every kind which the seller might find it profitable to work, and therefore applied to ordinary clay having a commercial value.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord M'Laren.
M.

THE LORD PROVOST AND MAGISTRATES OF GLASGOW, as Commissioners under certain Glasgow Water-Works Acts, were authorised by an Act of Parliament passed in 1866 to make certain reservoirs and other works on part of the lands of Farne and Westthorn belonging to Mr Farie. The Commissioners agreed with Mr Farie to pay him £11,000 for the lands acquired, and in 1871 Mr Farie executed a disposition in their favour conveying the lands to them,—"Excepting always and reserving to me and my forebears the whole coal and other minerals in said lands, in terms of the clauses relating to mines in 'The Water-Works Clauses Act, 1847.'"

* The Act 10 and 11 Vict. c. 17, sec. 18, provides that the undertakers shall not be entitled to any mines of coal, ironstone, slate, or other minerals under any land purchased by them, except only such parts thereof as shall be necessary to be dug and carried away, or used in the construction of water-works, unless the same shall have been expressly purchased, and all such mines, excepting as aforesaid, shall be deemed to be excepted out of the conveyance of such lands, unless they shall have been expressly named therein and conveyed thereby.

Sec. 22 provides that if the owner, lessee, or occupier of any mines or minerals lying under the reservoirs or buildings of the undertakers desires to work them, he is to give notice to the undertakers thirty days before he commences to work. If the undertakers think that the working is likely to damage their undertaking, and if they are willing to make compensation to him for the mines, "then he shall not work the same." The amount of compensation is to be fixed as in other cases of disputed compensation.

Sec. 23 provides that if before the thirty days are out the undertakers do not intimate their willingness to treat, the owner, lessee, or occupier, may work the mines and drain them, "so that no wilful damage be done to the said works, and so that the said mines be not worked in an unusual manner."

These clauses are nearly identical with the 70th, 71st, and 72d clauses of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 33).

The extent of land acquired was twenty-one acres. After entering on the land the Commissioners constructed reservoirs, &c., occupying about fifteen acres. The rest continued to be used for grazing.

Mr Farie had for some years been working a seam of clay in his adjoining lands, and in March 1885, having come within about thirty feet of the land acquired by the Commissioners, he intimated to them that he proposed to work the clay in the lands acquired by them, unless they were to avail themselves of their right to prevent him by paying him compensation for the clay. The clay was worked from the surface by open cast workings, the greatest depth in the workings being between twenty and thirty feet.

The Commissioners then raised an action against Mr Farie, concluding for declarator that they were, as proprietors of the land conveyed to them, proprietors also "of the seam of clay lying in or upon the said pieces of ground, and that the said seam of clay is not comprehended or included in the clause of reservation contained in the said disposition of the whole coal and other minerals in said lands, in terms of the clauses relating to mines in 'The Water-Works Clauses Act, 1847,' nor comprehended under or included in any other words or clause of reservation in the said disposition, but is the absolute property of the pursuers." They further asked for declarator that the defender was not entitled to work or win the "said clay contained within the boundaries of the pieces of ground disposed to the pursuers as aforesaid, either by mines or quarries, open cast or otherwise, or by any means whatever." Finally, they concluded for interdict against his entering on their lands for the purpose of working the clay.

They averred;—"The pursuers, in December 1865, caused pits to be dug to a depth of about six feet upon the lands on which they proposed to construct their said operations, and found the subsoil, at a depth of about two feet from the surface, to consist of the ordinary clay which is known to extend over the whole of this district, and which they considered most suitable for the construction of their said works. The pursuers further applied for and obtained permission from Mr Farie, in or about January 1866, to make borings in said lands for the purpose of ascertaining the nature of the strata underneath. The result of these borings shewed that, at about two feet below the surface (which consisted of ordinary soil and loam), the subsoil consisted of ordinary red clay, which reached, in the boring made in the centre of the ground on which it was proposed to construct the reservoirs, to a depth of about six fathoms, with about nine fathoms of mud and sand below. In giving such permission, Mr Farie, who was well aware that the subsoil of the said lands consisted mainly, if not entirely of clay, stipulated that the rock beneath the clay should not be pierced, in order to secure that the surface water should not flow into the old coal workings below."

The defender admitted that he knew there was clay under the lands, but quoad ultra denied this statement.

The pursuers further averred;—"The works authorised by the pursuers' Act have cost in all about £100,000, of which about £52,000 has been expended in or upon the lands so acquired from Mr Farie. The purpose for which the lands were acquired was well known to the said Mr Farie, who was also well aware that the existence of clay below the surface was the principal inducing cause for the pursuers making the said purchase; and the said reservoirs were constructed in his knowledge, and without any objection by him, and have been used by the pursuers, as commissioners foresaid, since their completion several years ago. It was understood and agreed between the defender's author and the pur-

No. 72.

Jan. 21, 1887.
Magistrates of
Glasgow v.
Farie.

Nq. 72: suers that the whole clay in the lands was included in the said purchase, and that the clause reserving coal and other minerals did not comprehend clay.”

Jan. 21, 1887.
Magistrates of
Glasgow v.
Farie.

The defender denied this.

The pursuers also averred ;—“ If the said workings are extended into the pursuers' lands the soil will be lost, and the ground will cease to have any agricultural or feuing value. It will also be rendered useless for the construction of reservoirs by the pursuers, owing to the removal of the clay which is necessary for that purpose, and any reservoir which could possibly be constructed in the bottom of the excavation left by the defender would be at too low a level for the pursuers' purposes.” They made no statement as to the commercial value of the clay.

The defender estimated the value of the clay which he would be prevented from working if the pursuers obtained decree at £10,000.

The pursuers pleaded ;—(1) The pursuers being proprietors of the lands disposed to them by the foresaid disposition, and the said seam of clay not being within the clause of reservation therein contained, are entitled to decree of declarator and interdict, with expenses, as concluded for. (2) It having been well known to the defender's author that the undisturbed possession of the clay in the land acquired by the pursuers from him was essential to the purpose for which the purchase was made, and the clay having been included in the subjects sold by him, the defender is not entitled to adopt the proceedings now complained of. (3) Separatim, The exercising of the claim made by the defender to work the clay in the pursuers' lands being incompatible with the safety of the pursuers' works, or with further construction necessary in connection therewith, the pursuers are entitled to decree, as concluded for.

The defender pleaded ;—(1) The pursuers' averments are irrelevant. (3) The pursuers not being proprietors of the said seam of clay, but the same being within the clause of reservation in the said disposition, the defender should be assoilzied. (4) The defender being proprietor of the said seam of clay, et separatim, being entitled to work and win the same (subject to any right the pursuers may have to have the same left unworked on paying compensation therefor), the defender should be assoilzied. (5) Esto that the working of the clay in question by the defender would be injurious to the pursuers' property, they are not entitled to prevent the same except on condition of their paying compensation to the defender in terms of the statute.

The Lord Ordinary (M'Laren), on 16th December 1885, found, decerned, and declared in terms of the second declaratory conclusion of the summons, and also in terms of the conclusions for interdict.*

* “ OPINION.—The pursuers purchased the subjects condescended on for the purposes of their undertaking. The subjects are, in part at least, not in actual use, but are said to be adjacent to one of the reservoirs of the Commissioners, and to be required for the extension of their works. The conveyance reserves to the seller the property of the coal and other minerals, in terms of the ‘Water-Works Clauses Act,’ an Act which, in the clause referred to, provides for the future compulsory acquisition of the minerals by the undertakers, in case the owner of the reserved estate shall signify his intention of working the minerals.

“ In the present case the owner is desirous of excavating a bed of clay forming the subsoil of the portion of land referred to, and the question is whether he can work the bed of clay or compel the Corporation to pay for it ; in other words, whether the bed of clay is part of his reserved mineral estate.

“ It is agreed on all hands that in the application of such statutory provisions the parties are entirely outside the common law rights and obligations which, in the absence of contract, regulate the use of the reserved mineral estate.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The sections of the Water-Works No. 72
 Clauses Act being identical with those of the Railway Clauses Act, the

Jan. 21, 1887.
 Magistrates of
 Glasgow v.
 Farie.

"The statute has taken away or displaced the common law right of support by substituting for it a right of compulsory purchase.

"I am not sure that it is possible to give a universally applicable definition of what is included in a reservation of mines and minerals. For the defender it is contended that the word 'minerals' is to be understood in its widest sense, as including everything contained in the substance of the earth, and capable of being worked to profit. I think that this definition is too wide, and that the expression must be interpreted with reference to the ordinary use of language in private agreements, and not in its geological or natural history meaning. A nearer approach to a definition would be—everything that is usually wrought under the denomination of mineral, and capable in the particular case of being profitably worked.

"For example, a grant of minerals, or a reserved right of working minerals, in this country would not, in my opinion, carry with it the right of digging sand or gravel out of the surface of the ground, and thereby destroying the estate in the surface. But a grant of minerals in California or Australia might reasonably and probably be understood to confer the right of digging and turning over the auriferous sands which are the objects of mining enterprise in these parts of the world.

"In our country the fire-clay which is associated with coal in the coal measures is commonly wrought along with the coal and ironstone where it is of good quality. I have no doubt that the right of working it would pass under a grant in the terms of the conveyance in question; and this, not because it is mineralogically different from ordinary clay, but because it is one of the things ordinarily wrought as a mineral, and is thus within the fair meaning of the term, as used in a deed or contract. The right of mining would of course include the right of removing what crops out at the surface. So also a grant of minerals in a private deed has been held to include the valuable china clay of Cornwall, which is produced by the decomposition of the granite rocks, and is peculiar to that district.

"Here, however, the thing which the defender claims to work is the common clay which constitutes the subsoil of the greater part of the land of this country, which never can in any locality be wrought by underground working, but under all circumstances is only to be won by tearing up and destroying the surface over the entire extent of the workings. When such a right is claimed against the owner of the surface, I ask myself—Did anyone who wanted to purchase or acquire a clay field, whether by disposition or reservation, ever bargain for it under the name of a right of working minerals? In the case of a voluntary sale of land with reservation of minerals, I am satisfied that we should not permit the seller to work the clay to the destruction or injury of the purchaser's estate, because we should hold that the conversion of the estate into a clay field was not within the fair meaning of the reservation. That being so, I see no reason for concluding that the statutory reservation of minerals means anything different from a reservation of minerals in a private deed. The consequences of the reservation are different, but the thing to be reserved is, to my mind, essentially the same, being neither more nor less than the right to work such substances and strata as are ordinarily known by the denomination of minerals in contracts between sellers and purchasers, or superiors and feuders.

"I was referred to a reported case in which Mr Justice Kay held that clay was included in the term 'minerals,' as used in the 'Railway Clauses Act.' I have the greatest respect for the opinion of that learned Judge, but the decision of a single Judge of a co-ordinate Court does not relieve me from the necessity of acting on my own opinion clearly entertained. I was also referred to the decisions of Judges of this Court, to the effect that, in the particular cases, freestone wrought for the purposes of building, and limestone for calcination, were minerals within the meaning of the statute. I do not mean to express any doubt as to the soundness of these decisions, because my opinion in this case is

No. 72.

Jan. 21, 1887.
Magistrates of
Glasgow v.
Farie.

cases decided under one Act were authorities for the construction of the other. The result of the cases was that there was no obligation on the mineral owner except to win the minerals properly.¹ The company bought no right of support at first: they were only obliged to do that when the owner came to work his minerals and so threaten their support. That destroyed the analogy between the present case and cases of ordinary sales, for there undoubtedly a right of support existed. The owner then was entitled to work the clay if it was a mineral. In England it had been held to be, both at common law² and under the statutes.³ In Scotland freestone had been held to be a mineral,⁴ so had limestone worked from the surface,⁵ and in the case of Nisbet Hamilton,⁶ the test appeared to be taken which had been approved by Lord Justice Mellish in Hext's case—viz., capacity of being wrought to profit. That test was undoubtedly satisfied here. To take any other test would lead to absurdity, e.g., it was said that the test was whether the substance required to be reached by mining or not. That would not do as a test, for coal or ironstone might crop out on the surface.

Argued for the pursuers;—The nature of the subject sold, and the use to which it was to be put, took this case out of the English rule. The ground had been bought for a reservoir just because it was clayey, and the soil itself was to be used for a reservoir, instead of something being laid upon it as in the case of railways. The local situation of the clay was such that it came within the conveyance to the Commissioners, and that brought it under the rule of Nisbet Hamilton's case, where stone in a cutting had been held to be at the disposal of a railway company.⁷ But in any event the statutory reservation would not apply unless clay was a mineral. What was a mineral? The statute in its 18th section started by using the expression "mines." That struck the note for the whole section: a mineral was a substance recovered by mining. The definition in *Hext v. Gill*⁸ was obviously too broad for, according to it, if you had clay or other substances coming to the top the railway company would acquire them, if there was a thin line of soil they would not. In Bennett's case⁹ the minerals could easily be separated from the under-rested entirely on the essentially superficial character of the stratum proposed to be wrought, and the known use of the terms 'mining' and 'minerals' in this country, terms which are confined, as I think, to strata ordinarily wrought by underground workings, and only by removal of the surface in these exceptional cases where the lie of the strata makes this the more economical mode, or it may be the only mode, of working them.

"I may add that I have not thought it necessary to investigate this case by a proof—(1) because there is no dispute as to the subject being the ordinary subsoil clay (I assume of a superior quality, and workable to profit); and (2) because the question of the meaning of the statute is one as to which proof appears to me to be unnecessary or inadmissible."

¹ Great Western Railway Co. v. Bennett, 1867, L. R., 2 E. & L. App. p. 27.

² Hext v. Gill, 1872, L. R., 7 Ch. App. 699; Attorney-General of Man v. Mylchreest, 1879, L. R., 4 App. Ca. 305.

³ Midland Railway Co. v. Checkley, 1867, L. R., 4 Eq. 19; Midland Railway Co. v. Haunchwood, &c., Co., 1882, L. R., 20 Ch. Div. 552; Loosemore v. Tiverton, &c., Railway Co., 1882, L. R., 22 Ch. Div. 25.

⁴ Jamieson v. North British Railway Co., Dec. 18, 1868, 6 S. L. R. 188.

⁵ Per Lord Adam (Ordinary) in Caledonian and Glasgow and South-Western Railway Coa. v. Dixon, Nov. 13, 1879, 7 R. 216.

⁶ Nisbet Hamilton v. North British Railway Co., Jan. 15, 1886, 13 R. 454.

⁷ L. R., 7 Ch. App. 699.

⁸ L. R., 2 E. & L. App. 27.

taking, not so here. The series of English cases started from a rule of the common law different from ours. Hart v. Gill was their common law rule. Ours was laid down in the cases of *Menzies*¹ and of the Duke of Hamilton.² In the former freestone was held not to be included in "mines and minerals." In the latter "coals and other metals, fossils, and minerals" was held not to include freestone.

No. 32.
Jan. 21, 1887.
Magistrates of
Glasgow v.
Farie.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The circumstances of the case are very simple. The land in question was taken by the pursuers by notice in common form under the Lands Clauses Act, and the matter of compensation was referred to arbiters. Ultimately, however, parties settled the amount of compensation without going to the arbiters. Upon that a disposition was granted by Mr Farie to the Water Commissioners conveying to them this piece of land they had agreed to take, and containing this reservation—viz., "Excepting always, and reserving to me and my foreaids, the whole coal and other minerals in said lands, in terms of the clauses relating to mines in 'The Water-Works Clauses Act, 1847.'" It is necessary, therefore, to resort to these clauses of the Water-Works Act, because on the construction of them the whole question turns.

The first of them is the 18th; it provides,—“The undertakers shall not be entitled to any mines of coal, ironstone, slate, or other minerals under any land purchased by them, except only such parts thereof as shall be necessary to be dug or carried away or used in the construction of the water-works, unless the same shall have been expressly purchased, and all such mines, excepting as aforesaid, shall be deemed to be excepted out of the conveyance of such lands, unless they shall have been expressly named therein and conveyed thereby.”

Then the 22d section provides that, “except when otherwise provided for by agreement between the undertakers and other parties, if the owner, lessee, or occupier of any mines or minerals lying under the reservoirs or buildings belonging to the undertakers . . . be desirous of working the same,” he shall give notice of his intention to do so thirty days before the commencement of the working. If it shall appear to the undertakers after inspection that the working of the minerals is likely to damage their undertaking, and if they are willing to pay compensation for the minerals, they shall not be worked, the amount of compensation being settled as in other cases of disputed compensation.

The 23d section is the only other section to which it is necessary specially to refer; it provides that “if before the expiration of such thirty days the undertakers do not state their willingness to treat with such owner, lessee, or occupier for the payment of such compensation, it shall be lawful for him to work the said mines and to drain the same by means of engines or otherwise, as if this Act and the special Act had not been passed, so that no wilful damage be done to the said works, and so that the said mines be not worked in an unusual manner.”

I confess that I do not see much difficulty in construing these clauses and applying them to the present case. Everything that can be called a mineral is reserved in this statutory transference. It is an absolute reservation, and so complete is it that the owner's right to work his minerals comes into operation

¹ Menzies v. Earl of Breadalbane and Holland, July 17, 1822, 2 Sh. App. 225.

² Duke of Hamilton v. Bentley, June 29, 1841, 3 D. 1121, 13 Scot. Jur. 499.

No. 72. to the effect of destroying altogether the works for which the land has been acquired, unless the undertakers intimate that they desire part of the minerals to remain unworked and offer compensation therefor.

Jan. 21, 1887.
Magistrates of
Glasgow v.
Farie.

The only restrictions upon working are those introduced by the 23d section, viz., first, that no wilful damage shall be done to the works, i.e., no damage that is not necessary to the working out of the minerals, and second, that the owner shall not work in any unusual manner. With these restrictions, the owner's right to work is absolute. Now, the mode of working the minerals will depend upon their situation. Some are worked by deep mining, some from the surface by means of open cast workings. If the latter be the method, the obvious result will be to destroy the reservoir in the case of water-works.

That is the proper construction of these clauses on the face of them, but there is a very authoritative judgment of the House of Lords which places the matter beyond doubt. I mean the case of the Great Western Railway Company v. Bennett (1867, L. R. 2 E. and L. App. 27). That was the case of a railway, but the clauses regulating the case of a railway in the Railways Clauses Act are substantially the same as those in the Water-Works Act; there is no real distinction between them.

The judgment in that case was given by three very eminent lawyers, Lord Chancellor Chelmsford, Lord Cranworth, and Lord Westbury, and it is only necessary to read a sentence or two from their opinions to shew what their view of the matter was. The Lord Chancellor says,—“This section,” viz. the 78th, “appears to me to leave the mine owner to work his mines exactly as he would if the surface belonged to him, unless the railway company chooses to prevent him by expressing willingness to make him compensation.” Lord Cranworth says,—“Independently of the statute, I think the contention of the company would have been unanswerable. I should be extremely sorry if this case should at all bring into doubt the doctrine which was enunciated and acted upon by this House in the case of the Caledonian Railway Company v. Sprot,”—that was a case which occurred before the passing of the Railways Clauses Act—“which doctrine is this, that if I sell my land for the purpose of a railway being made upon it, I impliedly sell all necessary support, both subjacent and adjacent, that is required for the purpose of supporting that railway . . . But the difficulties which had arisen upon this subject were, I presume, what gave rise to these provisions of the Railways Clauses Act which are now under discussion. It was obviously the intention of the Legislature, in making these provisions, to create a new code as to the relation between mine owners and railway companies, where lands were compulsorily taken for the purposes of making a railway. The object of the statute evidently was to get rid of all the ordinary law on the subject, and to compel the owner to sell the surface, and if any mines were so near the surface that they must be taken for the purposes of the railway, to compel him to sell them, but not to compel him to sell anything more. The land was to be dealt with just as if there were no mines to be considered, nothing but the surface. That being so, justice obviously requires that when the mine owner thinks it beneficial to him to work his mines, and proceeds to do so, he should be just in the same position as if he had never sold any part of the surface at all.” Lord Westbury's opinion is expressed in substantially the same terms.

The effect of that judgment seems to be to put the construction of these clauses beyond all doubt. The mine owner is to go on when he finds it convenient to work out the minerals adjacent or subjacent just as if he had not sold the surface to the undertakers. If his workings are to be open cast, it will be in his power to open them on the very bed of the reservoir or the line of the railway company as the case may be.

No. 72.

Jan. 21, 1887.
Magistrates of
Glasgow v.
Farie.

At first sight this seems to be a great hardship, but in truth it is no hardship at all. The operation of the statute is very beneficial to the undertakers. It does not put them under the necessity at first of taking more than the surface, they are not required to pay for any support either adjacent or subjacent, and so they escape from the payment of money which otherwise they would have had to pay. It is only when the necessities of the mineral owner compel him to approach the undertaking with his works that it becomes necessary for the undertakers to come forward and pay for so much of the minerals as is necessary to give them support. The case of Bennett was a case of coal mining, but the coal required to be worked out in such a way as to withdraw support from the surface.

The only question that remains then is,—whether clay is a mineral in the sense of the Water-Works Act. Upon that matter I think there can be no doubt at all. The minerals contemplated are not confined to any particular species of the substances which constitute the crust of the earth. There is no doubt that freestone is included. That was decided by Lord Kinloch in the case of Jamieson (6 S. L. R. 188). So is limestone. That was decided by Lord Adam in the case of Dixon (7 R. 216), and in like manner, Mr Justice Kay in the case of the Haunchwood, &c. Company (L. R., 20 Ch. Div. 552), decided that the reservation comprehended clay. In short, the term “mineral” appears to me to have been interpreted to mean everything under the surface, however deep or shallow its situation, that can be worked to profit, i.e., is of commercial value.

The case of Dixon (7 R. 216) is a case of considerable importance, for although the point was not carried to the Inner-House, it was very clearly raised. I see there that there had been negotiations between the mineral tenant and the railway company as to the purchase of limestone, which could only be worked from the surface, and the railway company, in order to try the question as to whether the mineral tenants were entitled to work it out by open cast working, presented a note of suspension and interdict in the Court of Session. Lord Adam in his note gives this account of these proceedings,—“In the month of June 1878 the respondents’ workings had been carried up to within ten feet of the centre of the railway. Thereupon the complainers, the railway company, presented a note of suspension and interdict, in which they sought to have the respondents interdicted from quarrying or working the limestone lying under the railway by means of open cast workings, or otherwise so as to destroy the surface of the railway. They did not dispute the respondents’ right to work otherwise than by open cast workings. On the 16th July 1878 the Lord Ordinary on the Bills passed the note, and interdicted the respondents from quarrying or working the limestone by means of open cast workings. This interlocutor was adhered to by the Second Division of the Court on 26th October 1878.” (That was merely a judgment passing the note to try the question.) “The case came thereafter to depend in the Court of Session, and was finally disposed of by an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, of date 11th February 1879, deciding the case against the complainers, and refusing interdict.”

Now, as Lord Adam, the Lord Ordinary in this case, was Lord Ordinary in

No. 72. the previous case also; I take his account of it as perfectly authentic. There is a judgment by him applicable, I think, directly to the present case; that was a case of limestone workable only by open cast working, and so the undertaking of the company required to be absolutely taken possession of and destroyed. The case of the Haunchwood, &c. Company (L. R., 20 Ch. Div. 552), was decided practically on the same grounds.

Jan. 21, 1887.
Magistrates of
Glasgow v.
Farie.

The subject in the present case is a large bed of clay, which has been wrought for a long time and has continued to be worked down to the present time. The workings have now reached the neighbourhood of those water-works, and Mr Farie proposes to work on, unless the Commissioners propose to purchase the clay. They say it is their property, and even if it is not, that he is not entitled to work it. If the construction of the Water-Works Act be what I have said, and there is a mineral to be worked, I cannot see how either of these propositions can be maintained.

In the case of Nisbet Hamilton (13 R. 454) the judgment of the Court contains a passage which has a pretty distinct bearing on this matter. Lord Adam, who delivered the judgment, in which we all concurred, says, with reference to the 70th section of the Railways Clauses Act, "the word 'minerals,' as there used, is necessarily subject to construction. Common earth and sand are minerals, but nobody will contend that they are intended to fall within the description of minerals in that 70th section. Stone may or may not fall within it according to its quality and value. Where it is valuable, it certainly does, as was decided in the case of Jamieson v. The North British Railway Company (6 S. L. R. 188). But, where the stone is of such a quality or description as to be of no merchantable value, I am of opinion that it does not."

That is, I think, a just distinction, on which we must proceed here. The question is, is this clay of merchantable value? The parties differ as to what it is worth, but it is not disputed that it is of merchantable value. Mr Farie says that the value of the clay which he would be prevented working is £10,000. Even if that be an exaggeration, it is plain that money can be made of it, and therefore, I think, it is a mineral in the sense of the statute.

I am for assoilzieing the defender.

LORD MURE.—I have found the question here raised, as to whether the bed of clay in dispute is part of the defender's reserved mineral estate, to be attended with a good deal of difficulty; but after considering it in all its bearings I have not been able to see my way to any other conclusion than that at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived.

The main leading facts on which the question depends are as follows:—The twenty acres of ground, on which the pursuers' reservoirs and works are formed, were acquired by them from the predecessor of the defender in 1871 under a disposition in which there is reserved to the defender "the whole coal and other minerals in the lands, in terms of the clauses relating to mines in the Water-Work Clauses Act, 1847." The subsoil of the ground so acquired consisted mainly of a bed of ordinary clay, beginning at about two feet below the surface and extending to a considerable depth.

It appears from the statements in the record as now amended that the pursuers and the late Mr Farie were both aware of the existence of this bed of clay; and it further appears that before the transaction was concluded the pursuers, who considered such a subsoil very suitable for the construction of their reservoirs, obtained permission from Mr Farie to make borings on the ground for the purpose of ascertaining the nature of the strata underneath. This they accordingly did, when they ascertained that the depth of the clay at the place where they proposed to construct their reservoirs was about six fathoms; and they were informed at a meeting which took place between Mr Farie and their engineer that the seam of coal lying nearest the surface of the ground had all been worked out, but that the lower seams of coal remained unwrought. It is further stated that when this permission was granted Mr Farie stipulated that the rock underneath the clay should not be pierced, in order to prevent the risk of any surface water getting down to the coal workings below. These allegations as to the meeting with Mr Farie and the result of the borings are denied by the defender, but I understood that the pursuers were ready to instruct them.

No. 72.

Jan. 21, 1887.
Magistrates of
Glasgow v.
Farie.

Having thus ascertained the general character of the ground, and that it was suitable for the purposes of the reservoir and works which they had in view, the pursuers took the necessary steps for concluding a purchase, and obtained a conveyance of the ground from Mr Farie for the sum of £11,000—being at the rate of between £500 and £600 an acre. Matters having been so arranged, the pursuers proceeded to construct their works in the manner set out in the third article of the amended record; and it is pretty plain, from the description there given of the way in which the reservoirs were constructed, that the body of water was made to rest upon the clay formation, which had been dug into and used as the most suitable solum for the reservoir.

So standing the facts as to the acquisition of the ground, the construction of the reservoirs, and the object for which they were constructed, intimation was given to the pursuers on the part of the defender in the year 1885, that he was desirous of working out the bed of clay under the ground acquired by the pursuers, and requiring them to state whether they would avail themselves of their right to prevent him from working out the clay by making compensation in terms of the statute. The pursuers say they are not bound to make compensation; and the practical result appears to be this, that unless the pursuers are prepared to pay to the defender £10,000, or such other sum as the value of the clay underneath the twenty acres may amount to, the defender proposes to proceed to carry his clay workings into the pursuers' lands, and so to endanger, if not to destroy, the whole of the pursuers' reservoirs and works.

It is not denied that the clay in question can only be worked by open cast; so that it is plain that, if the defender's clay workings are carried on in the way they have hitherto been, which it is intended to continue, the removal of the clay to the extent of from twenty to thirty feet below the land purchased will involve the destruction of the pursuers' reservoirs and works, and even the agricultural value of the ground. And the question raised for consideration under this reclaiming note, is whether that is a proceeding which the defender is in law entitled to have recourse to.

I am humbly of opinion that he is not, because I do not think that the terms of the clause of reservation are sufficient in the circumstances of this case to include seams of clay of the nature here in question. Dealing with the case as one falling to be disposed of by the rules of common law, and without reference to the provisions of the Water Clauses Act, to which I will immediately advert, I hold it to be settled by the decisions to which we have been referred, that a mere general reservation of "mines and minerals" in a disposition does

No. 72.

Jan. 21, 1887.
Magistrates of
Glasgow v.
Farie.

not necessarily include substances, such as stone, clay, or sand, although these substances may, in a geological and scientific sense, sometimes be described as minerals. Such a reservation must I apprehend be held to be restricted to those substances which, in common parlance, are understood to be "minerals," viz., substances usually got by mining, as distinguished from quarrying or open working. If the intention be to reserve every kind of substance that can be said to come in any view under the description of a mineral, the granter of the disposition ought I conceive to make those substances matter of special reservation. That I think is the fair import of the decisions I have mentioned.

The first is that of Menzies v. Lord Breadalbane, reported in the Faculty Collections, June 10, 1818, and in the House of Lords, July 17, 1822, 1 Sh. App. 225. The clause of reservation in that case was very comprehensive, and bore that "the haill mines and minerals which may be found within the bounds of the said lands, of whatever nature and quality, with the liberty of digging, winning, and away leading the same," were excepted. But it was held that these words did not include what was described as "a vein of stone of a rare species, peculiarly fitted for architectural purposes." The report shews that the case was very deliberately and anxiously considered, and the usual arguments for maintaining that such a stone was a mineral appear to have been used, and, in particular, the argument that "all substances under the soil from which rent and profit may be derived fall under the legal description of minerals." That argument was however rejected, and the Court, altering the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, held—one Judge dissenting—that the stone was not such a substance as fell within the reservation. The report further bears that, on a reclaiming petition against that judgment, four of the Judges thought the interlocutor right, while the remaining Judge still doubted, and the interlocutor altering that of the Lord Ordinary was adhered to.

On appeal this last interlocutor was affirmed, and the Lord Chancellor (Eldon), on giving judgment, and after shortly explaining the difference as to the principles that are to be applied to the construction of a feu and a lease in such a matter, thus expresses himself:—"On the other hand, in the case of a feu everything is given that is not specially reserved. It does appear to me to be the better opinion, that mines and minerals in this feu did not mean stone quarries, and that the opinion of the majority of the Judges is therefore right."

In the other case, viz. that of the Duke of Hamilton v. Bentley, June 29, 1841 (3 D. p. 1121), the same question was raised, and the same decision pronounced, relative to a clause which reserved to the Duke "the liberty of working coal and other fossils and minerals," and under which it was held, on the authority of the case of Menzies, that freestone was not comprehended in the reservation.

It appears from the report that pretty much the same arguments were maintained on the respective sides as those used in the case of Menzies, and it was in addition contended, on the part of the Duke, that the case was distinguishable from that of Menzies, inasmuch as there could be no doubt that freestone was a "fossil," which was a word not used in the reservation in the case of Menzies. It was, however, on the other hand, contended, on the part of the defender, that a reservation of "fossils, mines, and minerals in a Scotch deed of conveyance did not comprehend freestone quarries, the term 'mineral,' in particular, being one to be used in a popular, and not in a strictly scientific, sense." It was further contended that where it was intended to reserve freestone quarries it was the practice to reserve this expressly, and the reference given to the No. 72.

Juridical Styles of the period shewed that to be the case.

On considering these arguments the Lord Ordinary gave effect to those of the Magistrates of Jan. 21, 1887.
defender, and the Court, on the case coming before them on a reclaiming note, Glasgow v. Farie.
unanimously adhered; and, as the opinions of the Judges seem to me to be very important, I must ask your Lordships' attention to them somewhat in detail. Justice-Clerk Boyle says,—“Though I doubted in the case of Menzies v. Lord Breadalbane, my opinion was overruled, and that case was affirmed in the House of Lords; and it seems to me to establish a principle affirmative of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. I think that, under a fair construction of the clause of reservation, the defender is entitled to work a freestone quarry, and that a principle was meant to be established in Lord Breadalbane's case, which decides this case.” Lord Meadowbank was “of the same opinion. Whether right or wrong, the House of Lords having given a certain meaning to the exceptions in question, you are bound to adopt the same meaning. But if you go to common parlance, I do not think that freestone quarries are to be comprehended under mines and minerals.” Lord Medwyn agreed, and said,—“I consider this a stronger case than the one referred to. If you were to ask anyone whether a common freestone quarry comes under a reservation of mines and minerals, they would answer that it did not.” And Lord Moncreiff added,—“I am of the same opinion. I do not see that it is possible to distinguish the case of Lord Breadalbane from the present.”

The decisions in these two cases appear to me to settle in the most authoritative manner that by the law of Scotland, as adjudicated in the Court of last resort, a reservation of “mines and minerals” in a disposition of property does not comprehend a reservation of freestone, or of a right to work freestone within that property. That being so, the question at once arises whether, if the proposal here made had been to work a quarry of freestone instead of a bed of clay under the land in question, in respect of this general reservation of “minerals,” I could, consistently with the law laid down in these cases, give effect to that proposal. I am of opinion that I could not, and that I should, in respect of those decisions, have been bound to reject it.

And, if I am right in this, the next question which arises is whether on principle any different rule can be laid down and applied in the case of clay. I am of opinion that it cannot. In a popular sense, or, to use the expression of Lord Meadowbank and Lord Medwyn in the case of The Duke of Hamilton, in “common parlance,” I do not think that common clay is ever classed under the words “mines and minerals” any more than common, or uncommon, freestone, as the freestone in the case of Menzies is said to have been; and if in selling a property the seller intends to reserve a right to prevent the purchaser from making use of portions of that property, which both the clay and the freestone are, and which are not generally understood to be minerals, he is, I think, bound to make this a matter of express and special reservation.

In the opinion which I have just read of Lord Justice-Clerk Boyle in the case of the Duke of Hamilton, he speaks of the principle laid down in the case of Menzies, which he considered himself bound to adopt and give effect to. Now, as I read the case of Menzies, as decided in the House of Lords, the main principle given effect to there is that of requiring a clause of “special reservation” of the particular substance intended to be reserved, wherever that substance is not generally and popularly understood to be a mineral. Lord Eldon's

No. 72.

Jan. 21, 1887.
Magistrates of
Glasgow v.
Farie.

words are, "in a feu everything is given which is not specially reserved," and he adds—"It does appear to me to be the better opinion that mines and minerals in this feu did not mean stone quarries." In the present case, however, there was an omission on the part of the defender's predecessor to give effect to this broad principle of "special reservation." Instead of doing so, he has used the general words the "whole coal and other minerals," and in respect of this omission the defender is, I think, now precluded from insisting on the claim he is making to work out the clay under the pursuers' property. I think that clay was disposed to the pursuers absolutely, and that no reservation of it was made to the defender.

Such being the conclusion I have come to in dealing with the case as one of Scotch conveyancing, I do not consider it necessary to go into any detailed examination of the English decisions mainly relied on by the defender.

Your Lordship has referred to the opinion of Lord Kinloch in the case of Jamieson against the North British Railway Co. I have great respect for any opinion of Lord Kinloch; but I consider myself bound by the higher authority of the cases to which I have referred, and which have remained unchallenged since 1841. I am quite unable to look upon the opinion of a Judge sitting as Lord Ordinary in the Outer-House as sufficient to supersede deliberate decisions of this Court and of the House of Lords which do not seem to have been brought under his consideration. The same observation applies to the opinion of Lord Adam in the case of Dixon against the North British Railway Co. It is said that I concurred in the result of the judgment of this Division in the case of Nisbet Hamilton. But I am not aware that by doing so I am to be held responsible for all the observations which may have been made argumentatively in delivering judgment in that case. In my view of the case, it was not necessary to decide whether freestone was a mineral or not; and as I read the case, the point was not actually decided. It appears to me therefore, notwithstanding these recent decisions, that, upon the authority of the cases of Menzies and of Hamilton, a reservation of "mines and minerals" in a disposition of heritable property in Scotland cannot, on sound construction, be held to apply either to freestone or to clay; and that the defender has no right to take up the position he has here done.

But your Lordship has, as I understand, indicated an opinion that the words of the Railway and Water-Works Clauses Acts must be interpreted as extending the common law rules, and as meaning mines and minerals of every description, and under any scientific denomination. I am obliged to differ from your Lordship in that respect. For as I read the words of reservation in those Acts, which are "coal, ironstone, slate, or other minerals," they are in no respect more comprehensive than the words "mines and minerals." They are not so comprehensive as those used in the case of Menzies, and I am not aware that it has ever as yet been decided that a wider construction must be given to such words when used in a disposition of property under either of those Acts than when they are used in a disposition of property at common law.

There are, no doubt, most material provisions in the Water-Works Clauses Act, following the Railway Clauses Act, as to the way in which, under a reservation of mines and minerals, the minerals are to be worked. That is where these Acts alter the common law; but they do not, as I apprehend, alter the common law in any other respect; and I am unable to find any expressions in the opinions of the Judges in the case of Bennett (2 E. and I. Appeals, 27) which are calculated to shew that they held the re-reservation under the Railway Clauses Act to include minerals which were not covered by a reservation of "mines and minerals" at common law. I am myself very clearly of opinion that it does not; and I cannot assume, in the absence of any express provision to that effect, that it was the intention of the Legislature, in providing for the mode in which minerals were to be worked under or near a railway, to alter the common law rules as to what a reservation of minerals was intended to cover, and so to supersede decisions that had been deliberately pronounced as to what substances a reservation of "mines and minerals" could be held to include. The judgment in the case of Bennett was pronounced to regulate the mode of working coal, under the Railway Clauses Act. There was no question there raised as to what was covered by the word "mineral." The only question was as to how the coal was to be worked; and I think the observation of the Lord Ordinary in this respect is quite correct when he says that the "statute has taken away or displaced the common law right of support, by substituting for it a right of compulsory purchase." In all other respects it appears to me that the statute has left the common law as to mines and minerals where it was.

No. 72.
Jan. 21, 1887.
Magistrates of
Glasgow v.
Farie.

Reference has been made to the case of Hext v. Gill (L. R., 7 Chan. App. p. 699), where a peculiar kind of clay, called China clay, was held to be a mineral. But that was done after an investigation into the character of the substance there in question; and, after a careful investigation, the Court came to the conclusion that that particular kind of clay was a mineral. But while they came to be of opinion that it was a mineral, they took very good care to prevent the owner of the reserved right from doing any injury to the property in which it was found, and they granted an injunction against working the mineral, because it could not be worked without destroying the substance of the property from which they proposed to take it. So that practically the decision was in favour of the owner of the ground. In examining that decision it appears to me to have been pronounced mainly in respect of the previous case of Bell v. Wilson (L. R., 1 Chan. 303), where the Lords Justices, altering Vice-Chancellor Kindersley, held freestone to be a mineral. In giving judgment in the case of Hext, Lord Justice Mellish refers to Bell v. Wilson as a leading authority on the subject, and seems to have considered himself bound by that decision; and, applying the rule there laid down as to freestone to the case of China clay, held upon the evidence that the clay was a mineral. It is clear, therefore, that in deciding the case of Hext the Lord Justices started with quite a different rule from that laid down in the judgment of the House of Lords in the case of Menzies, and of this Court in the case of the Duke of Hamilton. I am of opinion, therefore, that a decision such as that of Hext, proceeding as it does upon the decision of Bell v. Wilson, which is directly at variance with what I conceive to be the rules of the law of Scotland in such matters, cannot be regarded as an authority in Scotland in dealing with a question of this description.

In the case of Hext Lord Justice James, in concurring with the judgment, though not I think very cordially, says,—“But for these authorities,” i.e., Bell v. Wilson, and others, “I should have thought that what was meant by ‘mines and minerals’ in such a grant was a question of fact, what these words meant in the vernacular of the mining world, and commercial world, and landowners, at the end of the last century, upon which I am satisfied that no one at that time would have thought of classing clay of any kind as a mineral.” In these

No. 72.
 Jan. 21, 1887.
 Magistrates of
 Glasgow v.
 Faria.

observations I entirely concur, but I think that his Lordship should not have stopped at the end of the last century ; for I believe the impression to which he has referred prevailed to a much later date, and that if, even at the present time, the question were put to any of the same classes of persons whether clay was considered to be a mineral, the answer of the great majority would be that it was not. But even if I am wrong in that, it ought, I think, to have been proved that the clay here in question was a mineral. In the English cases to which we have been referred there was inquiry, and particular ingredients appear to have been found in the clay which led to its being held to be a mineral. Here, however, there has been no such inquiry ; the substance in question is just ordinary clay, and there is no evidence to shew that ordinary clay is a mineral.

In the case of the Duke of Hamilton Lord Moncreiff refers, in his opinion, to various authorities as to the meaning of the word "fossil." That suggested to me to look into the usual sources of information as to the meaning of the word "clay," and I thought I could not do better than endeavour to ascertain what Dr Johnson said in his Dictionary as to the ordinary understanding of mankind as to the meaning of the word. In the larger edition of his Dictionary I find clay divided under three heads, and defined (1) unctuous and tenacious earth, "such as will mould into a certain form ; (2) earth in general ; (3) dirt or moistened earth" ; and in the smaller edition it is defined as a "common sort of earth." In the Imperial Dictionary the definition is "a species of earth which is firmly coherent and compact." So that these compilers describe clay as being earth or a species of earth ; and if clay is, in these circumstances, to be dealt with as a mineral, in the sense in which the words "mines and minerals" are used in a reservation in a deed of conveyance, it appears to me that sand, gravel, and even some kinds of subsoil, must also be held to be reserved. That is a very startling result for all railway and water companies, and for all owners of property in the disposition of which mines and minerals are reserved. For it will necessarily expose them to the risk of being obliged to give up considerable parts of their property, or to pay large sums in compensation, wherever the holder of the reserved right can shew that he can make a profit by working and disposing of substances which have, in my opinion, never before been held in Scotland to be covered by such a reservation.

This is a risk against which such proprietors are, I think, entitled to be protected upon the authority of the two leading decisions I have referred to ; and I am therefore for adhering to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD SHAND.—I concur not only in the judgment which your Lordship proposes should be given in this case, but also in the reasons contained in your Lordship's opinion.

The property with which we have to deal in this case consisted, as it was conveyed to the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Town-Council of Glasgow as Commissioners under the Glasgow Corporation Water-Works Act, of an area of about 21 acres, and it appears from the statement of the parties—indeed from the statement of the Water Commissioners themselves—that of these 21 acres they have occupied for the purposes of their statute about 15 acres, so that there remains 6 acres of this property so conveyed unoccupied by works of any kind, while the powers of the company to make any extension of their works under their statutes have expired. And as we are told by the pursuers in article 3 of the condescendence, the northern portion—that is, the 6 acres which are referred to in the same article, which have not been used,—not being at present required for the pursuers' works, is let by them for grazing purposes. The parties are agreed that the ground does contain clay, the defender alleges clay of a valuable character, for his statement is, that it is estimated, upon his view of the case, that the clay in the lands in question, which he would be prevented from working if the pursuers were to obtain the decree they ask, is worth not less than £10,000. That is not admitted by the pursuers, but the argument was taken on the concession, which could not be withheld, that this clay was of commercial value—a circumstance which is put beyond question by the fact that Mr Farie, the defender, has been working the very same seam, and is working it now to profit on the lands immediately adjoining, the workings being in such a position that they are now approaching close to the line of the property held by the Commissioners.

No. 72.

Jan. 21, 1887.
Magistrates of
Glasgow v.
Farie.

Now, that being the state of the property and the character of the substance contained in it, the conclusion of this action is for declarator that the Water Commissioners are proprietors of the whole of the land, and for a declarator, further, that the defender is not entitled to work or win any part of the clay which it contains, and for an interdict in these broad terms. I am clearly of opinion with your Lordship that no such declarator or interdict can be granted. If, as following upon the result of this decision, the defender should in the course of working the clay—taking out the substance in question—infringe any particular right which the pursuers may have, by the mode of working, or by the way in which an approach is made, and should thus exceed the rights reserved, a right to interdict will still remain with the Water-Works Commissioners, but that must be maintained in a different action from this, not in an action for interdict against the defender working any part of the clay, but in an action raising a special question and founding upon particular circumstances which it could be shewn would be a violation of rights belonging to the pursuers.

That being so, the question raised by the action is, whether this clay throughout the whole extent of ground is the property of the Magistrates, and has been conveyed to them by the conveyance quoted in the summons. The conveyance expressly bears to be granted with this exception:—"Excepting always and reserving to me and my foresaids the whole coal and other minerals in said lands, in terms of the clauses relating to mines in the New Water-Works Clauses Act, 1847." Now, the argument presented on the reclaiming note (and I rather fancy for the first time), and which has moved, if I am not mistaken, my brother Lord Mure to differ from the opinion which your Lordship has expressed, was rested upon certain old cases which occurred in this country, having reference to the interpretation of private grants, as between superior and vassal, of property containing a reservation of mines and minerals. Upon these cases I have simply to say that I hold that they are entirely away from any question as to the meaning of the terms "mines and minerals" contained in a conveyance to a railway company under the Railway Clauses Act, or to a water company under the Water-Works Clauses Act. It appears to me that an entirely different question will arise as to the interpretation of the terms "mines and minerals" in an ordinary conveyance (not to a public company under the Clauses Acts), or in a lease, it may be, of a landlord, and that other considerations, which do not arise in such a question as we have here, must enter into the decision of cases which arise upon such conveyances or

No. 72.

Jan. 21, 1887.
Magistrates of
Glasgow v.
Farie.

leases. There is certainly at the outset this broad distinction between the two classes, settled by the authorities, that in the ordinary case, notwithstanding the reservation of mines and minerals, there is an obligation of support, and nothing is more clearly settled than this, that there is no such obligation in the case of a conveyance to a railway company, or to a water company under the statutes. The circumstance that the reservation is given in the terms of the statutes, and in reference to the provisions therein contained, has been distinctly held to result in this, that there is no such right of support given, but that, on the contrary, if the right of a support is desired in a case in which minerals are in the ground, that must be bought and paid for in a subsequent transaction. There, to begin with, there is a vital difference between all such cases of private transaction and the case of a conveyance under these statutes. But this matter is put beyond all question, as it humbly appears to me, by what their Lordships in the House of Lords have laid down in the leading case of Bennett, which has ruled a great many cases since its date. In that case, as your Lordship has already pointed out, there had been an argument founded upon the House of Lords' decision previously given in the case of the Caledonian Railway Company v. Sprott, and Lord Cranworth takes care to say,—“Independently of the statute, I think the contention of the company would have been unanswerable,” and he goes on to say,—“The difficulties which have arisen upon this subject were, I presume, what gave rise to these provisions of the Railway Clauses Act which are now under discussion.” So that the statute was intended for the very purpose of obviating any questions which could have been raised upon such decisions as were founded upon in the argument for the pursuers upon this branch of the case. “It was obviously,” his Lordship adds, “the intention of the Legislature to create a new code as to the relation between mine owners and railway companies where lands were compulsorily taken for the purpose of making a railway.” The opening passage of Lord Chelmsford's opinion is also worthy of notice. But it appears to me that there is a further argument upon this branch of the case to be derived from the decision in the case of Nisbet Hamilton v. The North British Railway Company. It was pleaded before us that a reservation of mines and minerals such as we have here, a reservation in these terms, did not include freestone, but that the freestone had been conveyed to the company, and the question between the parties was whether it was so. Miss Nisbet Hamilton in raising that action contended that the stone which formed part of the embankment of the line was reserved. The company, on the other hand, raised the opposite argument. And what was the view which was there stated by the Court in the opinion as delivered by Lord Adam? It was in these words,—“The word ‘minerals’”—that is, the word “minerals” as used in the Railway Clauses Act—“is necessarily subject to construction. . . . Stone may or may not fall within it according to its quality and value. Where it is valuable it certainly does, as was decided in the case of Jamieson v. The North British Railway Company; but where the stone is of such a quality and description as to be of no merchantable value, I am of opinion it does not.” Now, if it could have been successfully contended upon the authority of cases applicable to the common law that freestone did not fall within the exception, there was no occasion for the proof or a great part of the argument which took place in that case. The real argument proceeded upon the assumption that freestone would fall under the reservation; it certainly does, as I humbly think, if it be of a valuable nature, and upon that view the decision of the Court proceeded. No. 72.

 That was an unanimous decision, and it appears to me a direct authority by Jan. 21, 1887.
 this Division of the Court, that the contention which was maintained on the Magistrates of Glasgow v. Farie.
 authority of these older cases, that freestone is not, within the meaning of the Railway Clauses Act, a mineral, cannot succeed.

But I may further notice that the Lord Ordinary in the judgment he has given does not seem to have given any countenance to the argument which was presented on the reclaiming note, for I observe that with reference to this matter of freestone he does not take the view, or indicate the view, that "minerals," in the sense in which it is used here, is to be confined to metaliferous substances. What his Lordship says is this,—“I was referred to the decisions of Judges of this Court to the effect that in the particular cases freestone wrought for the purposes of building, and limestone for calcination, were minerals within the meaning of the statute. I do not mean to express any doubt as to the soundness of these decisions, because my opinion in this case is rested entirely on the essentially superficial character of the stratum proposed to be wrought.” So that his Lordship does concur in thinking that freestone is a mineral within the meaning of the clauses, but adds—“and upon the known use of the terms ‘mining’ and ‘minerals’ in this country, terms which are confined, as I think, to the strata ordinarily wrought by underground workings, and only by removal of the surface in these exceptional cases where the lie of the strata makes this the more economical mode, or it may be the only mode, of working them.” The ground of judgment of the Lord Ordinary, therefore, is that, according to his view, the exception includes only substances which are to be removed by mining, and will not cover subjects wrought from the surface. There is no indication of opinion that freestone is not included in the term minerals; on the contrary, his Lordship is of opinion that it is.

Now, having said so much upon the leading argument which was presented on the part of the Commissioners, I shall only add a few words as to the view I take of the law as applicable to this case. It appears to me to be the result of Bennett's case with reference to the particular code which the Railway Clauses Act and the Water-Works Clauses Act lay down for the decision of questions of this kind, where lands contain any substance below the surface which can be got and removed so as to produce profit, that (first) there is given a right to the surface only, including such parts of any mines, or coal, freestone, slate, or other minerals under the surface, as shall be necessary to be dug or carried away, or used in the construction of the works; and (second) that there is no right to support given,—that is, no right which can prejudice or affect the right of the proprietor granting the conveyance to get and remove any substance underneath the surface which can be got and removed so as to produce profit. It appears to me that the authorities upon that subject in the law are clear, following upon the case of Bennett, which no doubt dealt with coal only, but which still is a clear authority for the determination of any question of this kind. We have in this Court the case of Jamieson, to which your Lordship referred, and which was approved by the unanimous judgment of the Court in the recent case of Nisbet Hamilton, and in addition to that we have the case which your Lordship mentioned, decided by Lord Adam, applying to limestone, and putting that in the same position as a mineral which was excepted from the conveyance. Then again in England we have a stream of cases. One of the leading authorities is the case of Hertz, which was cited in the argument, in which there is a very

No. 72. clear description by Lord Justice Mellish of what is to be held as comprehended under the term "minerals." There is the case of the Attorney-General of Man (4 App. Ca. 305), in which Judges of great eminence gave the same extensive meaning to the word "minerals"; and finally there is the valuable and clear judgment by Lord Justice Kay (in which I beg to express my entire concurrence) in which it seems to me he dealt with the very point the Court is now deciding, and decided it in accordance with the opinion your Lordship has expressed. It is quite true, as has been observed, that although the China clay in the ground in the case of Hext had been reserved, the proprietor was not held entitled to work the clay, but the reason of that, as stated by the learned Judges, was that, taking the grant as a whole, they were of opinion that it was so expressed that the only right of working given to the landowner was here and there to open places by which he could get the materials so as to work underneath and take it away, whereas the right, if exercised in the way the proprietor contended for, would have removed the substance altogether, and taken away the whole ground, including the whole surface; and the Court, while holding that the China clay was embraced in the term "minerals," refused to allow the whole of the subject to be removed as was proposed, because there was a defect in the expression of the title, from which it was clear that the proprietor was not to be entitled to take away the very substance he had sold. In regard to the case of The Midland Railway Company v. The Haunchwood Brick and Tile Company, it is true that, while that was a case in which the clay in question was simply used for making bricks, it appears that the bricks were of more value than usual, because there was a certain strain of iron to be found in the clay. But it is quite clear, upon reading the report, that the judgment did not rest upon any special view of that kind, but that Mr Justice Kay's judgment would equally apply to the case of any clay which was of commercial value for the purpose of making bricks, such as the clay in question in this case undoubtedly is.

Jan. 21, 1887.
Magistrates of
Glasgow v.
Faria.

The judgment which your Lordship proposes is, I think, very much supported by the consideration of what occurs when questions of compensation are raised by proprietors who demand compensation from a water company or a railway company taking their land. If the railway, to take that case in the first instance, is to carry its works entirely upon the surface, and it is quite clear that it is a level surface, and there is to be no cutting, what does the company pay for? The railway company takes and pays for the surface, and the surface only. There is nothing in the statute entitling them, or at least requiring them, to take more, for the statute expressly bears that the undertakers shall not be entitled to any mines, &c., except only such parts as are necessary to be dug, carried away, or used in the construction of the works. If, again, the company have to make excavations or deep cuttings, then what do the company pay for? I take it, simply for the surface to be occupied by them down to the formation level, as was explained by Lord Adam in the case of Nisbet Hamilton, and nothing more; and in that case they take, and are entitled to take away what is used in the construction of the works—what is dug and used in the construction of the works. If companies had at once to take and pay for clay, sand, or gravel, or other minerals to a great depth, claims of compensation would be made on quite a different principle, and the hardship to public companies would be very great. I have only further to add that it is, I think, impossible to read the words of section 18 of the Water-Works Clauses Act, and the corresponding section to the Railway Clauses Act, as limited to mines in the sense which the Lord Ordinary seems to adopt, that they must refer only to underground workings, working by shafts and underground mines. The statute reserves the right to two separate things in the expression used. It says the undertakers shall not be entitled to any mines of coals, ironstone, slate, and adds, "or other minerals," and the words "or other minerals" in that sense surely must mean something more than metals such as ironstone, or minerals limited to such substances as coal. And that it certainly does mean more is, I think, very clear when you look at what follows. They are not to be entitled to any mines of coal, ironstone, slate, or other minerals under any land purchased by them except only such parts thereof as shall be necessary to be dug or carried away or used in the construction of the water-works. Now, can it be suggested that the company would ever use coal, ironstone, or slate in the construction of their works, or that a railway company in making its railway has to use coal, ironstone, slate, or other minerals? It seems to me very plain that what the Legislature must have had in view is other minerals or substances than coal, ironstone, and slate, because neither of these can be used in the construction of the works; and the very first substance that occurs to one in reference to a cause of this kind as embraced under the word "minerals" which the company would be most likely to use is freestone or other stone, and if stone, then clay and gravel and sand, all of them substances of value which may be dug up and taken away and used by the undertakers in the construction of their works. Accordingly, I hold with your Lordship that the word "minerals" in this case is not to be taken in any narrow sense which would exclude freestone, the very substance of all others which the company might find useful in making embankments and bridges, but must include that, and on the same principle everything which is of value, if one be right in holding that the company really paid for the surface only, and did not pay for support. If it happen that the property does not contain any valuable substance below the surface, the company no doubt will get support, but in that case they do not get support because they have bought and paid for it, but from the circumstance that it is not worth the proprietor's while to proceed to take away what lies under the surface. Accordingly, I entirely concur with the observation made by Mr Justice Kay in the case of the Midland Railway Company that the whole question as to the right of working the substance on the part of the owner who has reserved it depends upon his being able to shew that it is of commercial value. If it be not of commercial value, then it would not be a bona fide proceeding on his part to give notice that he was to take away the substance lying under the surface—if his purpose was to harass the railway company, and not to use anything valuable to himself, and I cannot doubt in that case that the owner who had reserved his minerals would not be entitled to execute any working which would affect or take away the surface. But if an owner who has reserved his minerals, and has not given any obligation of support, under these statutes desires to remove the freestone, coal, ironstone, sand, clay, or gravel, which may be worked to profit, it appears to me that each of these substances are in the same position—that they are reserved to the owner; and accordingly I concur with your Lordship in holding that we should give judgment to the effect which your Lordship proposes.

LORD ADAM.—As I was the Lord Ordinary in the case of Dixon (7 R. 2'

No. 72. and as I was also chiefly responsible for the judgment of the Court in Nisbet Hamilton's case (13 R. 454), there can be no doubt about my opinion in the present case.
 Jan. 21, 1887.
 Magistrates of Glasgow v. Farie.

The lands here were disposed under this reservation :—"Excepting always and reserving to me and my forefathers the whole coal and other minerals in said lands, in terms of the clauses relating to mines in 'The Water-Works Clauses Act, 1847.'" These clauses are admittedly in substance identical with the corresponding clauses in the Railway Clauses Act, and it follows therefore that all decisions pronounced upon the Railway Clauses Act apply to similar questions raised under the Water-Works Act. No distinction can be taken between the two classes of cases.

Lord Mure and the Lord Ordinary are of opinion that this case must be disposed of just as if it were the case of a voluntary sale with a reservation, and their Lordships think that the fact that it is a statutory sale with a statutory reservation makes no difference.

In my humble opinion it is there that the Lord Ordinary has gone wrong. If this had been the case of a voluntary sale I should probably have come to the same conclusion as the Lord Ordinary, but a statutory sale is something quite different.

In considering the question I think we must consider what the intention of the Legislature was in enacting the clauses as to mines and minerals in the statute. All that railway companies and water-work commissioners require for the purposes of their undertakings is the use of the surface and the necessary support. It would be altogether out of the question to compel them to buy valuable mines and minerals under or near their undertaking, before the owners required to work them. While the provisions of the statute are therefore of great advantage to the railway company, they are of no disadvantage to the owner, for he is entitled to work the mines and minerals just as if the company was not there. When he wants to work them he must give notice, and then he may either proceed to work them or obtain compensation.

The reason of the Act applies just as much to clay or other valuable substance or material in or under the ground, as it does to ironstone or coal. The Act, I think, ought to receive a liberal interpretation in this respect. Clay is a mineral, for it is neither an animal nor a vegetable, and if it is a mineral it falls under the purpose and intention of the Legislature. We must look therefore at this case in an entirely different light from the case of a voluntary sale and a voluntary reservation.

Now, looking at it as a case of statutory sale, is clay included in the terms "mines and minerals"? In the Haunchwood Co.'s case (20 Ch. Div. 552) to which your Lordship has referred, there was a bed of clay very much in the same position as the clay here. It was about three or four feet below the surface, and all that was said of it was that it was "of some value."

There was another case of clay to which your Lordship did not allude—I mean the case of Loosemore v. Tiverton, &c. Railway Co. (22 Ch. Div. 43.) There was a proof in that case, and Lord Justice Fry says,—"On the balance of testimony I have come to the conclusion that this clay, although it does not appear to have been worked before, and although it does not appear to have been worked in the neighbourhood, was nevertheless clay of commercial value, and was therefore a mineral within the meaning of section 77."

That is the very point which we have here. All that was said is that it was of some commercial value, and therefore it is a mineral within the meaning of No. 72. the Act, and that brings out the very point which is involved in the present case.

Jan. 21, 1887.
Magistrates of
Glasgow v.
Farie.

There are two other cases which illustrate the point that "commercial value" is the true test, although not occurring under the general Acts. The first is the case of the Midland Railway Co. v. Checkley (4 Eq. 19). That was the case of a canal, and it was under a private Act of Parliament, but its clauses were very similar to the clauses of the general Act. The rubric there is, "Held that the reservation of mines and minerals within and under the land included everything below the surface available for agricultural purposes, which could be made useful for any purpose, and included the right of quarrying, as well as underground mining."

Lord Romilly, M.R., says,—“Stone is, in my opinion, clearly a mineral; and in fact everything except the mere surface which is used for agricultural purposes; anything beyond that, which is useful for any purpose whatever, whether it is gravel, marble, fireclay, or the like, comes within the word ‘mineral,’ when there is a reservation of mines and minerals from a grant of land. . . .”

The other case is that of Hext v. Gill (7 Ch. 699), which was a case of China clay. That was a special case, because it was the case of a voluntary sale, and the principle applied was that the grantor of the conveyance was bound to do nothing to derogate from his grant. If that were the principle to be applied here the Commissioners would probably be protected, but it does not apply to a case like the present.

As to the method of working, it is superfluous to say anything. The law is established by the case of Bennett (2 E. & L. App. 27), and it is that the owner of the mines and minerals is entitled to work them just as if the lands had not been sold to the Water-Work Commissioners under the restrictions specified in the 23d section of the Water-Works Act—viz., that no wilful damage is to be done, and that there is to be no working in an unusual manner.

In the present case no question can be raised on either of these points. It is a matter of admission that the clay has been worked for a considerable time, and it is because it has been worked up to the margin of the property acquired by the Commissioners that the question has arisen; there is no allegation that it is being worked in an unusual manner.

I am of opinion that the clay is of commercial value, and that being so that it falls under the reservation.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and assolizied the defender.

CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—HAMILTON, KINNAR, & BEATSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 73.

Jan. 21, 1887.
Murray, &c.
v. Gregory's
Trustees, &c.

THOMAS GRAHAM MURRAY AND OTHERS, First Parties.

HENRY JOHN HOOD AND ANOTHER (Mrs Gregory's Trustees), Second Parties.—Pearson—Murray.

DOROTHY JANET GREGORY AND OTHERS (Dr Gregory's Heirs-at-law), Third Parties.—C. J. Guthrie.

ROBERT ARTHUR WHITTING AND OTHERS (Frederick W. Gregory's Trustees), Fourth Parties.—C. J. Guthrie.

SIR ARCHIBALD ALISON, BART., AND OTHERS, Fifth Parties.—
D.-F. Mackintosh—Low.

Succession—Vesting—Effect of ulterior destination of residuo to "nearest of kin."—In a postnuptial contract of marriage the spouses conveyed, "each of them to the other, in case of his or her survivancy, in liferent," and to the children of their marriage in fee, divisible as after mentioned, their "whole estate and effects, heritable and moveable," it being declared "that the said funds and estate hereby settled upon the children of the present marriage in fee in manner above mentioned shall be divisible amongst such children in such shares as their father should appoint, and failing such appointment, equally." The deed further declared "that in the event of the dissolution of the said marriage by the predecease of any of the said spouses without leaving children, or of the decease of all such children during the lifetime of the survivor," then "it shall be in the power of the said married parties severally to dispose by testament of the proper share of the said funds and effects belonging to the said parties severally, but such disposition not to take effect until the decease of the longest liver of the said married parties, and failing any such disposition, then, and in that case, the said whole funds and estate settled by these presents shall, after the decease of the said parties, suffer division in manner after mentioned,—that is to say, the whole funds and estate above mentioned belonging or which may belong to" the husband "shall fall to and become the property of his own nearest of kin," and the wife's property to her nearest of kin. Then followed a declaration that the surviving spouse should, in the event of a second marriage, have power to settle the half of his or her estate on the spouse and children of the second marriage.

The husband was survived by his wife and by one child, who predeceased his mother.

In a competition for the husband's estate raised after the death of the surviving spouse between the representatives of the husband's nearest of kin at the date of his death and those nearest of kin to him at the date of his widow's death, held (dies. Lord Shand) (1) that the husband's estate did not vest in the legatees till the death of the surviving spouse; and (2) that the persons then called to the succession were his nearest of kin as at that date.

Question, whether the nearest blood relations or those entitled to succeed as heirs in mobilibus would have been entitled to take under the destination to "nearest of kin," if the same persons had not represented both classes.

1ST DIVISION.

M.

ON 25th March 1840 a postnuptial contract of marriage was executed by Dr William Gregory, Professor of Medicine in the King's College of Aberdeen (afterwards Professor of Chemistry in the University of Edinburgh), and Mrs Lisette Scott or Makdougall Gregory, his wife. The deed bore,—“The said Dr William Gregory and Mrs Lisette Scott or Gregory . . . do hereby mutually and reciprocally give, grant, assign, and dispose, each of them to the other in case of his or her survivancy, in liferent during all the days of the lifetime of such survivor, and to the children of their marriage in fee, divisible as after mentioned,” their whole heritable and moveable estate “at present belonging to either of them the said married parties, or in which they have at present any vested rights or interests, or which may pertain or belong, or become due or indebted to either of them during the subsistence of their marriage." No. 73.

Jan. 21, 1887.
Murray, &c.
v. Gregory's
Trustees, &c.

Then followed a special conveyance by Dr Gregory in favour of his spouse in liferent and the children of the marriage in fee of his share in certain testamentary funds in which he had an interest, and a similar conveyance by Mrs Gregory in favour of her husband "in liferent, for his liferent use allenarly, and to and among the children of the marriage in fee."

Then followed a declaration "that the said funds and estate hereby settled upon the children of the present marriage in fee, in manner above mentioned, shall be divisible amongst such children, in such shares and proportions as the said Dr William Gregory shall direct and appoint by any writing under his hand, and failing such division, shall fall and belong to the said children, equally divisible among them, share and share alike, the shares belonging to the said children being payable to them severally upon their attaining majority in the case of sons, or attaining majority or being married in the case of daughters, whichever of the said events shall first happen; but declaring that after the decease of the longest liver of the said Dr William Gregory and Mrs Lisette Scott or Gregory, and until such provisions shall become payable to their said children severally, it shall be in the power of the trustees after named to advance to and for the maintenance, support, and education of such children such proportion of the interest or annual revenue arising from their said provisions as may seem expedient to them, or the whole of such interest or annual revenue if necessary, and even to advance to or for the behoof of any of the said children, being sons, the whole or such proportion of their several provisions as may be necessary for establishing such children in a profession even before their attaining majority."

The deed then proceeded,—“In the event of the dissolution of the said marriage by the predecease of any of the said spouses without leaving children, or of the decease of all such children during the lifetime of the survivor of the said married parties, then, and in either of these cases, it shall be in the power of the said married parties severally to dispose by testament of the proper share of the said funds and effects belonging to the said parties severally, but such disposition not to take effect until the decease of the longest liver of the said married parties, and failing any such disposition, then, and in that case, the said whole funds and estate settled by these presents shall, after the decease of the longest liver of the said married parties, suffer division in manner after mentioned,—that is to say, the whole funds and estate above mentioned belonging or which may belong to the said Dr William Gregory shall fall to and become the property of his own nearest of kin, and the whole funds and estate above mentioned belonging to or which may belong to the said Mrs Lisette Scott or Gregory shall fall to and become the property of her own nearest of kin, as also declaring that in case after the dissolution of the said marriage by the predecease of either party leaving children, the survivor of the said married parties shall enter into a second marriage, then, and in that event, notwithstanding of the above provisions, it shall be in the power of such party so contracting a second marriage to settle and secure the one just and equal half of the proper means and estate above mentioned, belonging to or that may be acquired by such party upon his or her spouse and children in such second marriage.” Then followed a nomination of certain persons “to be trustees for the purpose of carrying the provisions of the marriage settlement into execution.”

Dr Gregory died on 24th April 1858, survived by his wife and

No. 73.

Jan. 21, 1887.
Murray, &c.
v. Gregory's
Trustees, &c.

James Liebig Gregory, the only child of the marriage. James Liebig Gregory died on 5th May 1863, survived by his wife and by an only child, Henry Makdougall John Fairfax Gregory, who died on 21st June 1881 while still in minority. Dr Gregory's widow died on 24th May 1885.

This was a special case, which raised a question depending upon the construction of the above quoted provisions of the marriage-contract as to the right to the price of certain subjects in Princes Street, Edinburgh, which had been bought by Dr Gregory in 1848, and to which he had made up a title. After his death his widow made up a title to the subjects on the assumption that she was vested in the fee, and in 1877 the subjects were sold for £7500, an agreement being entered into between Mrs Gregory and her grandson, H. M. J. F. Gregory, of the first part, and the purchasers, of the second part, by which the purchasers agreed to accept a conveyance from Mrs Gregory with the consent of her grandson, for all interest he might have, the price to be held by certain trustees, viz, Mr T. G. Murray, W.S., and others, for behoof of those who should be found to have right to the subjects under the marriage-contract. These trustees granted a declaration of trust to the effect that the sum in question was to be held as a surrogatum for the house.

H. M. J. F. Gregory left a general disposition and settlement in which, in the event of his predeceasing his grandmother, he bequeathed to her all right which he might be found to have had to the £7500.

The parties to the special case were (1) the trustees under the declaration of trust; (2) the trustees under Mrs Gregory's will; (3) the heirs-at-law of Dr Gregory and of H. M. J. F. Gregory, as at the date of Mrs Gregory's death, and their guardians; (4) the trustees of H. M. J. F. Gregory's heir-at-law, as at the date of the death of the former on 21st June 1881, their contention being that, assuming he had any right to the £7500, it was incompetent for him to test upon it during his minority; and (5) Dr Gregory's next of kin as at the date of Mrs Gregory's death.

The question asked was,—“To which of the parties hereto does the price of the said subjects belong?”

The second parties maintained that they had right to the price in one or other of the following ways, viz.—(1) The fee of the subjects was in Mrs Gregory, and they had right to the price under her last will and testament; (2) the fee was in James Liebig Gregory, and on his death descended to H. M. J. F. Gregory, and he, by his general disposition and settlement, validly bequeathed the price of the subjects to Mrs Gregory, and they had now right thereto under her last will and testament; (3) the fee was in the next of kin of Dr Gregory—the next of kin falling to be ascertained as at his death—that is, in James Liebig Gregory, was then taken up by H. M. J. F. Gregory, and the right to the price passed to Mrs Gregory's trustees as in case 2.

The third and fifth parties maintained that Mrs Gregory took only a liferent of the subjects, with a fiduciary fee for the ultimate beneficiaries, and that the vesting of the beneficial fee was suspended until her death.

The third parties maintained, separately, that they, being the heirs-at-law of Dr Gregory as at the death of Mrs Gregory, were entitled to the price of the subjects.

The fourth parties maintained that if the fee of the subjects was in H. M. J. F. Gregory they, as representing his heir-at-law, were entitled to the price of the subjects, it having been incompetent for him while in minority to test on the price.

The fifth parties maintained, separately, that they, being the next of kin of Dr Gregory as at the death of the said Mrs Gregory, were now entitled to the price of the subjects. No. 73.
Jan. 21, 1887.
Murray, &c.
v. Gregory's
Trustees, &c.

It was admitted that the fifth parties were Dr Gregory's next of kin as at the date of his widow's death, whether according to the blood relationship of each individual to the testator, or according to the lines of succession in moveables by the common law of Scotland.

Argued for the second parties ;—(1) A conveyance to a parent in life-rent and the children nascituri in fee, as a rule implied a fee in the parent. But in the case of a conveyance between spouses in a marriage-contract it was no doubt different.¹ The Lord President (Inglis) had stated in *Cumstie's case*² that the decision in the case of *Frog's Creditors*³ would not be further extended. It was not therefore contended that the fee had been in Mrs Gregory, and their first alternative contention was departed from. But the fee had vested in her son, and was carried through her son to her grandson, and by him conveyed to her. Vesting took place at Dr Gregory's death without his having made a will. The words "failing any such disposition" were the key to the second branch of the clause. A clause of return or destination over to next of kin did not suspend vesting. That argument was removed by Balderston's case.⁴ The death of the surviving spouse was a mere period of distribution. It was said that the reserved power to make a settlement suspended the vesting, but in any case, as regarded Dr Gregory's estate that reserved power came to an end on Dr Gregory's death. The case might have been different if the father had been the surviving spouse, or if there had been no child alive at his death. (2) But even if vesting was postponed, the next of kin when the succession opened to them were to be sought for as at the date of Dr Gregory's death. It was not likely that the testator should look for persons to succeed at an indefinitely late period. The decision in Wannop's case (Haldane's Trustees v. Murphy)⁵ could not stand alongside of the decision in the case of *Mortimore*⁶ in the English Courts. The present was a contrast to Wannop's case, for there, the fee being destined to the children of the life-renters, or of one of them, if they or either of them should marry, which neither of them did, it was impossible to say until the death of both who would take. There was nothing of that kind here to suspend the vesting after Dr Gregory's death.⁶

It was maintained that a person in minority, as H. M. J. F. Gregory was when he executed his will, could not test upon heritable subjects. But the state of the facts was that he had made up his title. The subjects had been sold, and he tested upon the price of them. A minor might test upon moveables and might sell heritage.

The third parties argued ;—Vesting was postponed until Mrs Gregory's death. Upon that question they adopted the argument of the fifth parties. "Nearest of kin" was a flexible term, and meant nearest blood relations according to the nature of the succession, and that being in this case heritage it must go to Dr Gregory's heirs-at-law as at the date of

¹ Mackellar v. Marquis, Dec. 4, 1840, 3 D. 172.

² Cumstie v. Cumstie's Trustees, June 30, 1876, 3 R. 921.

³ Frog's Creditors v. His Children, Nov. 25, 1735, M. 4262.

⁴ Balderston v. Fulton, Jan. 23, 1857, 19 D. 293, 29 Scot. Jur. 293, contrasted with Robertson v. Houston, May 28, 1858, 20 D. 989, 30 Scot. Jur. 590 ; Haldane's Trustees v. Murphy, Dec. 15, 1881, 9 R. 269 (Lord President, p. 279).

⁵ Mortimore v. Mortimore, May 15, 1879, L. R., 4 App. Ca. 448.

⁶ Jarman on Wills, ii. 129 ; Ferrier v. Angus, Jan. 21, 1876, 3 R. 396.

No. 78. *Mrs Gregory's death.*¹ What was conveyed was a universitas, which was to be distributed according to the quality of the succession. The testator's intention was the guide in all such questions, and in none of the cases cited for the second parties did the contingencies exist which it was contended suspended the vesting here.

Jan. 21, 1887.
Murray, &c.
v. Gregory's
Trustees, &c.

The fourth parties argued that assuming that the fee vested in H. M. J. F. Gregory, it was undisposed of by his will, which was incompetent to convey heritage,—it having been executed while he was in minority. The £7500 was expressly stated in the case to be a surrogatum for the subjects sold.

The fifth parties argued;—The vesting was postponed here until the widow's death, and upon that event the estate vested in those who would have been Dr Gregory's next of kin had he died at that date, as conditional institutes under the deed. The presumption of vesting a morte testatoris was overcome if it could be shewn from the terms of the deed that the testator had a different intention. There was here a destination in favour of the next of kin, who were personæ predilectæ and came in as institutes.² If, in place of the words "next of kin" the destination had been to A, B, C, or to a class, there would have been no question.³ The fee after Dr Gregory's death might have been in Mrs Gregory as fiduciary fiar, subject to defeasance, or it might have remained in Dr Gregory's hereditas jacens. Either of these views met the feudal difficulty. But this was not an invocation of the law of intestate succession, and it was only in such a case that one went back to the date of the testator's death to ascertain who the next of kin were. The view taken by the majority of the Court in Wannop's case was in point here. Nearest of kin meant nearest in blood at the date of the testator's death.⁴ The fact that the estate which was being dealt with here was heritage shewed that the next of kin must be personæ predilectæ, otherwise the destination would have been to heirs-at-law. The case was not one of intestacy.⁵ The cases of Balderston and Mortimore had been cited on the other side. But these were cases where the testator had really invoked the law of intestacy. "Nearest of kin" included all those entitled to the office of executor, but did not include heirs in mobilibus.⁶

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The decision of the question raised in this special case depends upon the construction of the postnuptial marriage-contract entered into between Dr and Mrs Gregory, which is in some respects a peculiar deed. There is no trust,—there are no doubt persons named as trustees to see to the execution of the deed, but there is no conveyance to trustees, and no directions

¹ Mitchell's Trustees v. Waddell, Dec. 7, 1872, 11 Macph. 206, 45 Scot. Jur. 150; Nimmo v. Murray's Trustees, June 3, 1864, 2 Macph. 1144, 36 Scot. Jur. 571; Connell v. Grierson, Feb. 14, 1867, 5 Macph. 379, 39 Scot. Jur. 196; Boyd v. Denny's Trustees, Dec. 15, 1881, 9 R. 299.

² Donaldson's Trustees v. MacDougall, July 20, 1860, 22 D. 1527, 32 Scot. Jur. 684, H. L., Feb. 14, 1862, 4 Macq. 314, Paters. App. 1108.

³ Haldane's Trustees v. Murphy, 9 R. 269 (Lord President, p. 278).

⁴ Young's Trustees v. Janes, Dec. 10, 1880, 8 R. 242; Haldane's Trustees v. Murphy, 9 R. 269 (Lord Deas, p. 281).

⁵ Maxwell v. Maxwell, Dec. 24, 1864, 3 Macph. 318 (Lord Kinloch's note), 37 Scot. Jur. 153; Connell v. Grierson, Feb. 14, 1867, 5 Macph. 379 (Lord Kinloch's note); Cockburn v. Dundas, June 10, 1864, 2 Macph. 1185, 36 Scot. Jur. 594; Stodart's Trustees, March 5, 1870, 8 Macph. 667, 42 Scot. Jur. 330.

⁶ Young's Trustees v. Janes, &c., Dec. 10, 1880, 8 R. 242.

are given to them. The conveyance is by the spouses, "each of them to the other in case of his or her survivancy, in liferent during all the days of the lifetime of such survivor, and to the children of their marriage in fee, divisible as after mentioned," and then follow words of general description, comprising the whole of their estate. Then comes a particular conveyance by the husband to the wife of certain funds, and in like manner the wife conveys to the husband her proper share of certain funds. There is further a declaration that the fee of the funds settled upon the husband and wife is to be equally divisible among the children of the marriage unless there is an apportionment in virtue of the powers conferred by the deed, and there is a provision for an advance for the maintenance and education of the children. Then comes the provision and declaration upon which the decision of the case more particularly turns. But before considering that provision, it is important to notice one or two facts in the history of the parties, which have given rise to the present question.

The first event, of course, was the marriage. The husband died in 1858. There was one child of the marriage, James Liebig Gregory, who died in 1863, survived by an only son, who was born in 1862 and died in 1881 leaving a settlement in favour of his grandmother. She died in 1885, also leaving a settlement, and her testamentary trustees are the second parties to this case. The other parties are the heirs-at-law of the husband, who are the third parties, and the heirs-at-law of his grandson, who are the fourth parties. The claims of the third and fourth parties proceed upon the footing that Dr Gregory's estate, so far as here in question, was converted into heritage, that it vested in his son and then in his grandson, and so passed to them either as heirs-at-law of himself or of his grandson. With reference to this contention, it is enough to say that the purchase of the house in Princes Street could not have the effect of operating conversion so as to affect his succession as regulated by this deed. For reasons to which I shall refer, the parties of the third and fourth part are also excluded upon a construction of the deed itself. But in the first place it is clear that the subject we are dealing with is not a heritable subject. The competition, accordingly, comes to depend between Mrs Gregory's trustees, and the fifth parties, who were Dr Gregory's next of kin as at the date of the death of the survivor of the spouses.

The view upon which the claim of Mrs Gregory's trustees is founded is that at Dr Gregory's death the fee of his estate passed to his son, that on the death of the son it passed to his grandson, Henry, by the operation of whose will it now comes into the hands of his grandmother's trustees. Of course that contention depends upon the assumption that the estate vested at Dr Gregory's death in his only son, and that on his death it vested in his child, and in order to ascertain whether this is a correct assumption or not it is necessary to construe the provision and declaration of the clause to which I have referred. It provides that "in the event of the dissolution of the said marriage by the predecease of any of the said spouses without leaving children, or of the decease of all such children during the lifetime of the survivor of the said married parties, then, and in either of these cases, it shall be in the power of the said married parties severally to dispose by testament of the proper share of the said funds and effects belonging to the said parties severally, but such disposition not to take effect until the decease of the longest liver of the said married parties." Pansing there, it is very clear that there is no vesting in the children of the marriage until the decease of the last survivor of the spouses, because there is a

No. 73.

Jan. 21, 1887.
Murray, &c.
v. Gregory's
Trustees, &c.

No. 73.

Jan. 21, 1887.
Murray, &c.
v. Gregory's
Trustees, &c.

destination over in the event of the child or children of the marriage predeceasing the last survivor of the spouses. As regards Mrs Gregory's share of the joint estate, no question arises, because she has exercised the reserved power of disposal, which she had as well as her husband, in favour of her testamentary trustees, who are the parties of the second part. But the disposal of the share which belonged to her husband depends upon the construction to be placed upon the words which follow those I have just read. The share is to be disposed of by testament, but the disposition of it is not to take effect until the decease of the longest liver of the spouses. It is right to observe that there is just one point of time which in the contemplation of the parties has to do with the regulation of the disposition of the estate. The date of the death of either the one or the other is immaterial. It is the death of the longest liver only which is mentioned as the period when the disposition shall take effect. In this respect the present case resembles that of Donaldson's Trustees (22 D. 1527, H. of L., 4 Macq. 314), to which the key was at last found in the consideration that the testator had only one period of distribution in his mind, which was the death of the last survivor of the spouses. Here, too, the death of the last survivor is the regulating period. When that event happens "the said whole funds and estate settled by these presents shall . . . suffer division." That means that down to that period the estate is a joint estate in terms of the first clause of the contract under which the spouses disposed their whole estate jointly to one another to be enjoyed by them mutually during their joint lifetime and by the survivor afterwards. The estate is to suffer division only upon the death of the survivor in manner after mentioned, "that is to say, the whole funds and estate above mentioned belonging or which may belong to the said Dr William Gregory shall fall to and become the property of his own nearest of kin." It seems to me that the true construction of these words is that the death of the longest liver of the spouses is to be not only the period of distribution, but also the period of vesting, and that nothing could vest in the children or in any one else until the death of the longest liver.

The question therefore is, dealing with Dr Gregory's share, who is entitled, upon the occurrence of the period of vesting, to take under the circumstances which have occurred? The children all died before the period of vesting, and no one can take in right of them. But the deed provides that in that case Dr Gregory's "own nearest of kin" shall be preferred. I need hardly say that these words cannot be construed as meaning his heirs in mobilibus. That is well settled, and I need only refer in support of that construction to the case of Young's Trustees (8 R. 242). The term "nearest of kin," as here used, refers to a class of selected legatees, and the general rule is well settled that where a residuary or other fund falls by a deed to be divided among a class of persons at a time fixed by the deed, the period of vesting and distribution is to be looked at in order to see who answer the description at that date, and who then constitute the class who are called to the succession.

The result in this case is that the persons who are Dr Gregory's "nearest of kin" on the death of Mrs Gregory are the persons entitled to his succession, and we have been given to understand that the parties of the fifth part answer this description as being his "nearest of kin" in whichever of the two ways the term is construed,—that is, whether as the persons who would be Dr Gregory's next of kin as at the date of Mrs Gregory's death according to the common law rules of moveable succession, or whether as his nearest blood relations as at the same date. The phrase "nearest of kin" covers both these classes, and if it were necessary to determine between the two—whether the term in the deed applies to Dr Gregory's nearest in blood or to his nearest descendants as being preferable to collaterals and ascendants—I think we should require to hear further argument. But as the fifth parties answer both descriptions, we are saved further trouble, and in this respect also the present case is similar to that of Young's Trustees, where the same thing occurred.

No. 73.

Jan. 21, 1887.

Murray, &c.
v. Gregory's
Trustees, &c.

I am therefore for preferring the fifth parties to the fund in question.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND.—The question raised in this case is I feel attended with much difficulty. There are these important distinctions between this case and that of Young's Trustees (8 R. 242), that in the case of Young's Trustees (1) the estate had been conveyed to and was held by trustees; and (2) the provision in regard to residue was made expressly in favour of persons who should be alive at the death of the survivor of the two testators. The words of the provision were that one half should go "to the nearest in kin equally amongst them of me, the said Peter Young, and the other half to the nearest in kin equally amongst them of me, the said Maitland M'Culloch or Young, who shall be alive at the time of the death of the survivor of us two." In the contract of marriage of Dr and Mrs Gregory these important words, "who shall be alive at the time of the death of the survivor of us two," do not occur. Now, the difficulty I have in concurring with your Lordships is that the decision which your Lordships are about to pronounce seems to me to read into the deed after the words nearest of kin (referring to the nearest of kin of Dr Gregory) the words "who shall be alive at the death of the longest liver of the spouses," while no such terms are there. I have found myself unable to concur in this view, more especially in construing a deed which contains no conveyance to trustees to hold the fee of the estate till it should come to be distributed, but a conveyance only directly to the parties favoured. It is true that in prescribing the time of division of the residue it is said that the estate is to "suffer division after the decease of the longest liver of the said married parties." The estate of each of the spouses is then to be separated from that of the other, and is to be distributed as directed. But I am not prepared to hold that the period of division having been postponed as it was simply to protect the liferent of the surviving spouse, necessarily postponed vesting in the nearest of kin of both of the spouses till the death of the survivor.

Dr and Mrs Gregory had a son. Suppose there had been no child of the marriage, or that his son had predeceased him, and that (as was the fact) Dr Gregory left no special settlement affecting his separate estate, it would, I think, have been impossible to maintain successfully that his next of kin had no right vested on his death, but that because of his widow's liferent only those of his next of kin who survived her would take any right, or, in other words, that his next of kin were to be ascertained as at that date and not as at the testator's own death. The case would have been simply one of a liferent and fee without even a trust to suspend vesting, which, indeed, would not have been suspended even if there had been a trust.

If this view be sound,—and I confess I see no reason to doubt it,—the only consideration left which can be founded on as leading to an opposite result is the fact of the survival of Dr Gregory's son till 1863, and of his grandson till

No. 73.

Jan. 21, 1887.
Murray, &c.
v. Gregory's
Trustees, &c.

1881. The conveyance is to "his own nearest of kin," in the event of his dying without leaving children, or of the death of all such children during the lifetime of the survivor of the married parties. In my opinion the nearest of kin thus called to the succession are the persons having that character at his death, at which date vesting took place, subject to defeasance if Dr Gregory's son or grandson survived Mrs Gregory, the liferentrix, and thereby acquired an indefeasible right. The destination of the fee by Dr Gregory put shortly is in favour of his children, whom failing, by their predeceasing himself or predeceasing his widow, should she survive him, to his next of kin. The case is not one of suspension of vesting, because either (1) of a clause of destination to survivors of a class, as in the leading case of Donaldson's Trustees (4 Macq. 314); or (2) of a destination over; and the fee is given by conveyance to the next of kin directly without the intervention of a trust. These considerations are in my view sufficient to shew that the next of kin called are those at Dr Gregory's death, and not those who may happen to survive the liferentrix. Suppose that Dr Gregory's son had died without issue the year after his father died, can it be doubted that the next of kin then alive would have acquired right to the estate? The existence of the liferent was no good reason against vesting, and no other reason could be suggested to suspend vesting. It seems to me that the existence for a time of a son, and afterwards of a grandson, neither of whom took an indefeasible right, did not suspend vesting either in the next of kin of the testator at his death, or postpone vesting till the death of the liferenter.

In a question of this kind I do not think any sound distinction can be drawn between persons called as the testator's "nearest heirs," or as "nearest in kin." In the one case he refers to those nearest in the line of legal succession, in the other to those nearest in blood, but in both cases he means to call persons nearest to himself at the time of his death. So closely do the expressions resemble each other that the opinions in the case of Young's Trustees (8 R. 247) expressly reserved the question whether the words "nearest of kin" meant "nearest according to the precise relation of each individual to the testator, or according to the lines of succession in moveables by the common law of Scotland." The presumption is strong to the effect that a testator refers to his next of kin at his own death, and those who maintain a contrary intention—the intention to call next of kin as at the time of distribution of estate on the death of a liferenter—must be able to shew expressions or clear indications to this effect. There are, I think, no such expressions or indications in this deed. The case of Wannop (Haldane's Trustees) (9 R. 269) has been strongly founded on as shewing that even if the destination here were to the testator's nearest heirs these must be ascertained, not at the testator's death, but at the termination of the liferent. Unfortunately, as I think, that case was not appealed, for it has left the law in an unsettled and unsatisfactory condition. I remain of opinion, as your Lordships who took part in the decision I believe also do, that the case was not rightly decided, and it is not easy to reconcile Lord Deas' opinion with his judgment in the case of Balderston v. Fulton. In the absence of any trust and of any clause of survivorship or destination over, I think the destination in this case, even if it had been in favour of a class such as the testator's nephews, would still have operated vesting a morte testatoris, subject to defeasance if the child or grandchild of the testator survived the liferentrix, and that the estate would not have gone to nephews only who so survived. But even if this were not so, it seems to me that "next of kin" in a question of this kind are no more to be regarded as a "class" than nearest heirs would be. In both cases the testator has in view persons nearest to himself, and to both cases I think the same rule should apply. That being so, I refer to the opinions of your Lordship, Lord Mure, and myself in the case of Wannop for the principle and the authorities which should, I think, determine the question in this case. The authorities there referred to (and particularly the case of Balderston v. Fulton), and cited also in my judgment in the case of Snell's Trustees, 4 R. 709, make it farther clear that if the next of kin called are those at the death of the testator, it is no good reason against holding the testator's son to be his next of kin, that he was called to the succession as the testator's child in the first instance with a title defeasible by death during the liferenter's life. The property in question here is heritage, and whether next of kin refers to nearest in blood entitled to moveables or to heritage is of no moment, for the only son was nearest in both senses. On the whole, I think the next of kin called were the testator's next of kin at his death, and that the property in question descended from Dr Gregory's son to his grandson, and was carried by his settlement to Mrs Scott or Gregory, and by her settlement to her trustees. In any view I can see no reason for holding that vesting could be suspended after the death of Dr Gregory's grandson in June 1881.

No. 73.

Jan. 21, 1887.
Murray, &c.
v. Gregory's
Trustees, &c.

LORD ADAM.—The event which has occurred here is the dissolution of the marriage by the predecease of one of the spouses, and the death of the only child of the marriage and of his only child during the lifetime of the survivor of the spouses. The husband died without exercising his reserved power of disposal of his portion of the joint estate, and accordingly the question comes to be who is entitled to that estate on the death of his widow, which is the period of distribution pointed out in the deed.

It is provided that after the decease of the longest liver of the said married parties, Dr Gregory's share of the estate "shall fall to and become the property of his own nearest of kin." I regard these words as implying a proper destination over in favour of a selected class. The term "nearest of kin" certainly does not designate or imply either heirs-at-law or heirs in mobilibus. "Nearest of kin" means a selected class, and I think the effect of a destination over in favour of such a class is to suspend the vesting until the period of distribution. That, I think, is the ordinary rule applicable to such cases.

The question accordingly is, who are the next of kin in the present case; and, in my opinion, the decision in the case of Wannop (9 R. 269) is directly in point. The opinions of the majority of the Court in that case proceeded upon the footing that there was a destination over to a selected class to be ascertained at the time when the distribution fell to be made. The period of vesting and of distribution were there held to be the same. I accordingly agree with your Lordship that the question here ought to be answered in favour of the fifth parties.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The ground of my opinion in the case of Wannop (9 R. 280) was "that the residue of Miss Haldane's estate vested at her death in her nearest heirs in mobilibus, who would have taken if she had died intestate quoad the residue." If I had been of opinion that the parties called to the succession were not the heirs in mobilibus of the testatrix, I should have con-

No. 73. curred with the majority of the Court in the view that, the gift being in favour of a selected class to be ascertained at the time when the distribution fell to be made, vesting was postponed until that date.

Jan. 21, 1887.
Murray, &c.
v. Gregory's
Trustees, &c.

LORD ADAM.—I should probably have been of a different opinion in the present case if the parties called to the succession had been the heirs in mobilibus.

THE COURT found and declared the fifth parties entitled to the price of the subjects in question.

TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—J. S. & J. W. FRASER TYTLER, W.S.—Agents.

No. 74. THE DUKE OF MONTROSE, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—D.-F. Mackintosh—Murray—Dundas.

Jan. 25, 1887.
Duke of
Montrose v.
Provan's
Trustees.

JAMES PROVAN AND ANOTHER (Provan's Trustees), Defenders (Respondents).—Pearson—W. Campbell.

Superior and Vassal—Entry—Taxed entry—Assignees.—By a feu-contract dated in 1631, the Earl of Montrose feued to three of his kindly tenants and their "aires whatsomever (or assignayes, wha shall not exceed three chalders victual in yeirlie standant rent)" a certain parcel of lands, the vassals binding themselves not only to pay the feu-duties, but to attend the Earl in time of war, and at frays and followings. The superior bound himself to receive the vassals and their heirs in and to the said lands, and also, "ony tennant that shall happin to buy the same frae the saids persons, or ony of them or yr fords (the buyers yrof not exceeding the rank above wryttine) . . . for payment of tenn pounds money for yr entrie to ilk five shilling land forsaid, and accepting ane new conquerer yrintill." In 1886, after the feu-right had been more than once sold, the superior demanded a year's rent of the subjects as composition from a singular successor in the feu, entered by implied entry under the Conveyancing Act, 1874. The vassal tendered £10 Scots, and maintained that he was entitled to the benefit of the taxed entry. The only other heritable property belonging to him was a subject in Glasgow, the agricultural value of which was trifling, although it was valuable in other ways.

Held (1) that although the superior had no longer an interest to exclude vassals above the rank of three chalders men, a vassal of that rank was yet entitled to claim the benefit of the taxation, and (2) that the defender was entitled to the benefit of the taxed entry, (a) because "assignayes" was intended to include any disponees of the real right after infeftment, and (b) because the agricultural value of their property was the only measure by which the "three chalders victual in annual rent" could be determined.

2D DIVISION. THIS was an action of declarator and for payment of a composition under the Conveyancing Act of 1874, raised by the Duke of Montrose, superior of the lands of Auchingilzian, against the trustees of Moses Provan, who were infeft in the lands. It was not disputed that a composition was due by the defenders in consequence of the deaths of the last entered vassals, the question between the parties being, whether, by the terms of the feu-right under which the lands were held, the composition was taxed to £10 Scots, or being untaxed was to be taken as a year's rent.

Lord Kinnear.
M.

By the original feu-right the whole of the twenty shilling land of Auchingilzian was given out; the parties to the contract, which was dated 25th August 1631, were James, Earl, afterwards Marquis of Montrose, who was then a minor, with the advice and consent of the Earl of Wigton, Archibald, Lord Napier of Merchistoun, Sir William Graham of Claverhouse and his other curators, of the one part, and John Wair, Archibald Buchanan, and George M'Indoe, of the other part. John Wair took a ten shilling land, and each of the other feuars a five shilling land. The present action had reference to these two five shilling lands, in which Provan's trustees had come to be infeft. No. 74.

The present rent of the first of these two parcels was stated by his Grace to be £87 per annum, and the net composition, after making the proper deductions, £60, 18s. 10d. The rent of the second parcel was stated to be £13, and the net composition £8, 14s. 8d. Jan. 25, 1887.
Duke of Montrose v.
Provan's
Trustees.

The defenders pleaded that they were liable only in the taxed composition mentioned in the feu-contract.

This contract set out with this recital:—"Forsuameikleas the saids Three persons possessors & kyndlie tenents of the forsaid Twentie shilling land of Auchingillian ilk ane for yr owne pairts yrof as is afterdivyded Hes actuallie contented payed & delyvered to the said Noble Earle James Earle of Montros in name of few entrie silver for fewing of the forsaid Twentie shilling land to ym as is after speit. certain great sowmes of money for performing of certain his Lo/ bussines & affairs Whairof his Lo/ with advyce & consent forsaid holds him weill contented and satisfied in numerat money And exoners and Discharges the saids John Wair, Archibald Buchanan, & George McIndoe, & ilk ane of ym yr aires exers. or assignayes of the samen soume for now & ever be their pnts."

The deed then proceeded to set forth that the Earle "hes sett & in few ferme and heretadge perpetuallie Dimitts as be thir pnts. setts & in few ferme & heretadge perpetuallie Dimitts to the said John Wair & his aires whatsoever (or assignayes wha shall not exceed Three Chalders victuall in yeirlie standant rent) heretable perpetuallie & Irredimable All & Hail that Ten shilling land of the said Town & Lands of Auchingilzean presentlie possess be the said John, To the said Archibald Buchanan his aires whatsoever (or assignayes wha shall not exceed the said quantitie of Three chalders Victuall in yeirlie standant rent) All & Hail that Fyve shilling land of the said toun and Lands of Auchingilzean presentlie possess be him To the said George Mcindow & his heirs whatsoever (or assignayes wha shall not exceed the forsaid quantitie of Three Chalders victuall in yeirlie standing rent) All & Hail that Fyve shilling land of the said town & lands of Auchingilzean presentlie possess be him."

After certain conditions and reservations the deed proceeded to set out that the vassals "The saids John Wair yer Archibald Buchanan & George McIndoe Binds & obleiss them their aires & successors In & to the samen lands To Thankfullie content pay & delyver to the said Noble Earle his aires male & successors or to yr factors & chamberlands in yr names the particular Dewtie afterspeit. for the said hail Twentie shilling land ilk ane for yr owne pairts yrof And also to doe & performe the conditiones services & others following." The feu-duty was stated to be £34, 10s. Scots, yearly proportionally among them, and a variety of feudal services were enumerated, e.g.,—"The saids persons fewars of the said Twentie shilling land pro rata According to the extent theirof shall help to cary my Lords household geir frae the place of Mugdock to Dundaff or Glasgow And Frae Glasgow or Dundaff to Mugdock the Fewars of the said Twentie shilling land furnishand three horse Tuiss in the yeir Togithir with three loads of sclaitt & three draughts of timber ance evrie yeir to be led be the fewars of the said twentie shilling land frae the touns of Glasgow or Dumbarton to the said place of Mugdock as they shall be Requyred" . . . as also to help "to leid my Lo/ hay yeirlie to the place of Mugdock as they shall be requyred. . . . Sicklyke The saids persons obleiss them & yr forsaid To compeir at the said noble Earle & his successors yr three head courts yeirlie to be holdine within the said Barronie of Mugdock And yr to give sute & presence And in caice of absence of any ane of them, frae ony of the saids Courts To pay the sowme of Tenn pounds

No. 74.

Jan. 25, 1887.
Duke of Montrose v.
Provan's
Trustees.

money of penaltie and also to compeir in all other the said noble Earle's Courts To be holdine be his Lo/ or his Baillies within the said Barronie upon sex hours wairning There to be ansuerable for all actions of Blood wrang or ryot as shall happin to occur. . . . And In Lyke manner The saids persons obleiss^s them & yr forsaid^s upon yr owne charges & expenss^s to attend & awaitt upon the Earle of Montrose present & to come or yr deputs In tyme of the King's Majestie's weirs & In tyme of trouble & insurrection in the contrie & att Frayes & followings as also shall ryd & gang with his Lo/ & his deputs upon the said Noble Earle his charges for help & defence of his Lo/ and his Friends yr Honnor Lyfe Lands goods and geir.

Then followed the clause which was said by the defenders to tax the composition due by them. It was in these terms, viz. :—"Attour the said Noble Earle with consent forsaid Binds & obleiss^s him his aires & successors to accept and receive the air or aires of the saids John Wair Archibald Buchanan and George Meindow xerve and successive In & to yr particular pairts of the forsd twentie shilling Land with the pertinents as is above divyded And yt be precepts of Clare Constat in dew forme for payment of Fyve merks money for yr entrie for evrie kyndlie air to ilk fyve shilling Land above mentioned And also shall receive In & to the forsaid^s Lands ony tennent that shall happin to buy the same frae the saids persons or ony of them or yr forsd^s (the Buyers yrof not exceeding the Rank above wryttine) And yt be Resignatione Confirmacion or Charter of Alienacione conteneing precepts of seasine To be Holdine as the Resigner or annalzier held of befor For payment of Tenn pounds money for yr entrie to ilk Fyve shilling Land forsaid And accepting ane new conquiseir yrintill."

There then followed this clause,—“The saids persons Fewars Be thir pnts. obleiss^s ym yr aires & successors forsd^s To make good and thankfull payment to the said Noble Earle his aires or successors or yr forsd^s of the forsaid sowme of Threttie Four pounds yeirlie fewdewtie With this provisione & upon this speciall conditione That gif ane termes dewtie runn in ane other unpaid at the leist not reallie offered to the lawll receiver & factor haveing power for the tyme In that caice the failzier to offer & refuser to pay shall heirby Be obleist to pay the Duble of that qlk the fewar left unpaid of the preceeding terme of the said yeirlie dewtie And to this effect The said Noble Earle his aires & successors forsaid^s shall have full & Lawfull power Be themselves or yr factors to call follow & persue the possessors of the saids lands also weill for payment of the Double of the rest of the said yeirlie dewtie As also for the sd Entrie Silver of ilk laull air & new conquiseir in yr owne Courts To be holdine at the place of Mugdock And to obtaine sentances & decreits against ym yrfor and to cause put the samen to execution Be yr owne officers And Notwithstanding of the forsd Benefeit Granted for Entrie of the Laull air & new conquiseir of the forsd^s Lands with the pertinents It shall not be prejudiciall to the said Noble Earle nor his forsd^s But they to take the benefeit of the saids Lands frae ony Intrans who shall obtaine the same be Compryseing conforme to the act of parliat & common practiq of this Realme And the forsaid^s penalties to be exacted in caice forsd shall nae wayes be prejudiciall to the said Noble Earle nor his forsd^s To seek personall execution against the sd^s persons fewars & yr forsd^s Be vertew of this Contract for ony bygaine dewtie yt shall be restand owand at ony tyme heiraftir for the forsd Twentie Shilling Land with the pertinents."

His Grace maintained that the benefit of the taxation of the entry was only given to the heir and to the first singular successors after infirmment, and in any event could not be pleaded by persons who were possessed of heritable subjects exceeding three chalders victual in annual rent. The defenders were proprietors, it was admitted, of a property in Coburg Street, Glasgow, the annual agricultural value of which was less than three chalders victual, although the actual rental was very much larger. No. 74.

Jan. 25, 1887.
Duke of Montrose v.
Provan's
Trustees.

The defenders maintained that all assignees were entitled to the benefit of the taxation, if only they did not exceed three chalders victual in standing rental. This measure had reference to agricultural subjects exclusively. In the course of the case the defenders admitted, that, being infeft in the first parcel of lands, which were of more value than three chalders rent as agricultural subjects, they were liable in an untaxed composition for the second parcel of lands.

It was explained that there were a number of feus held of his Grace under contracts similar in their terms, and that there had been no entry since 1770 or thereby of a singular successor.

On 1st July 1886 the Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds (1) that in consequence of the death of James Provan, designed in the summons, a casualty became due and payable to the pursuer as superior of the lands first described in the summons, amounting to £10 Scots; . . . and (2) that in consequence of the death of Miss Anne Caldwell Holmes, designed in the summons, a casualty became due and payable to the pursuer as superior of the lands second described therein, amounting to £8, 14s 8d sterling, and decerns against the defenders for payment of these respective sums accordingly."*

* "NOTE.—. . . The feu-right is in favour not only of the original vassals and their heirs, but also in favour of their assignees, provided the rental of the assignee does not exceed the specified amount. And there can be no question that the word 'assignee,' contrary to the ordinary usage in charters of that date, is intended to include dispones of the real right, after the infeftment of the original vassal; because the superior, after binding himself to receive the vassals and their heirs respectively and successively, goes on to bind himself to receive also 'in and to the forsaid lands ony tennent that shall happen to buy the same frae the saids persons, or ony of them, or yr fords (the buyers yrof not exceeding the rank above wryttine); and yt be resignaⁿe, confirmaⁿe, or charter of alienaⁿe, contening precepts of seasine, to be holdine as the resigner or annalzier held of befor, for payment of tenn pounds money for yr entrie to ilk fyve shilling land forsaid, and accepting ane new conqueiser yrintill.'

"There can be no doubt as to the meaning of this obligation. The feu-right was created at a time when a vassal could not alienate voluntarily without the consent of the superior, and when no heir or singular successor could complete a title without the superior's interposition. The superior consents by anticipation to alienation on certain conditions, and undertakes to give an entry to the singular successors, either of his immediate vassals or their heirs, provided they satisfy these conditions, on payment of a taxed composition, just as he is bound to enter heirs on payment of relief-duty. But since his vassals are bound to ride with him in times of war, and 'at frays and followings,' he has an interest to secure that his lands shall not come into the hands of persons having larger holdings under other lords, and accordingly, while he obliges himself to receive purchasers not having more than three chalders of victual, he undertakes no obligation to recognise any voluntary alienation in favour of persons who do not answer that description; and he expressly reserves his right 'to take the benefit of the saids lands,' or, in other words, to demand the ordinary composition, 'frae ony intrans who shall obtain the same be compryseing, conforme to the Act of Parliat and common practiq of this realme.'

